Dorms strain leaves 300 in area hotels

By SARA-MEGAN WALSH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts has left 891 students without a dorm to call their own at the start of the fall 2005 semester, according to current estimates.

Roughly 691 students have been placed in temporary housing, despite over 200 juniors and seniors being told to relocate off campus.

Current estimates for undergraduate enrollment this fall stands at 18,500, the highest undergraduate enrollment at UMass since 2001. This yearis incoming freshman class is expected to have 4,400 students compared to the 4,222 freshman who enrolled at the start of fall 2004.

This over-enrollment has stressed the housing capacity available on campus. The current undergraduate housing provides for 10,864 students, only slightly more then half of the 18,500 expected to be enrolled.

Current university policy only guarantees campus housing to freshman and sophomores who completed their housing requests by deadlines. University staff has assured all freshman and sophomores that they will be provided with housing, unless they did not meet these deadlines.

Over 200 juniors and seniors were mailed notices Aug. 8 that they will have to relocate off campus. This group also includes transfer students, off campus students who wanted to return to the dorms and students who did not complete housing applications on time. These students were given just over a month to find off-campus housing.

UMass student kills over a chain necklace

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Several University of Massachusetts students will return to classes today knowing one of their friends will not be joining them.

Franklyn Nwachukwu, 20, a nursing major at UMass, was shot to death July 15 during a robbery in Boston.

"He was very quiet, out going and hardworking," said Franklyn's father, Obi Nwachukwu.

Nwachukwu was just accepted into the nursing program here at UMass. His parents say he always wanted to become a nurse. Those dreams were cut short at 10 p.m. on Friday, July 15 when a robber fired a single shot into his abdomen.

Boston police and Nwachukwu's family said the shooting happened as he left a family friend's house on 22 Lewiston St. in Hyde Park. Police believe he encountered three black men who attempted to take his chain necklace when shots were fired.

Nwachukwu was transported to Brigham and Women's Hospital where he was pronounced dead a short time later.

Police have made no arrests in the case.

Nwachukwu was to begin his junior year by beginning to take summer classes at UMass on July 18, just three days after he died.

A graduate of Hyde Park High School, Nwachukwu began the UMass pre-nursing program in 2003. This summer he was working at St. Katharine Drexel Church, organizing group activities with the Nigerian community. He also worked as an intern at Central Boston Elder Services.

Nwachukwu's family said his excellent grades were proof that he would one day be successful in a nursing career.

"From day one, that's what he planned to do," said Obi Nwachukwu of his son's dream to be a nurse.

Several neighborhood teenagers in Hyde Park say their fondest memories of Nwachukwu were when they played basketball together. One of those teens said Franklyn "always had a smile on his face."

"He was a very, very nice boy," said Franklyn's mother, Anthonia Nwachukwu as she choked back tears. "He died for nothing."

Most UMass students were on summer break at the time of Nwachukwu's death. However, many of his friends from his residence at Washington Hall in Southwest still gave an outpouring of support on Nwachukwu's 'thefacebook.com' profile.

"There isn't a day that goes by without thinkin about all the memories you, me and the fam had. You were one of my closest friends. You always held me down," said one message. A long list of messages to Franklyn is still posted on his thefacebook.com "wall" since he died.

The staff at the UMass school of nursing had kind words for Nwachukwu as well.

"He always made sure he said hi" to me before he left the floor,' said Liz Theroux, the undergraduate secretary at the School of Nursing. "He used to say I always make his day with my smile."

"He was willing to make the sacrifices necessary in order to further his education. He was a cooperative, respectful and public-spirited young man," said Christina Scharhaal, UMass School of Nursing minority advisor.

Nwachukwu's family says officials from UMass Amherst sent flowers, cards and their condolences.

But little can be done to erase the pain for this devastated family.

"He was the smartest person I know," said Franklyn's sister, Lisa Nwachukwu, 16. "There's nobody else like him."

Nwachukwu's family planned to bury his body in their native Nigeria.

Two frats close due to fire, safety violations

By MEGHAN MURPHY AND DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After being cited for repeated fire and health code violations, two fraternities at the University of Massachusetts were suspended July 12. Meanwhile, three new fraternities have been opened.

Alpha Tau Gamma on Sunset Ave. and Sigma Alpha Mu on North Pleasant St. have been suspended for three years and are forbidden to take part in any activity on or off campus.

UMass Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano said the two fraternities that received suspensions had several fire and safety violations.

"Until they demonstrate they deserve to be back at UMass Amherst, I'm in no rush to bring them back," Gargano told the Springfield Republican.

Michael Wiseman, Director of UMass Fraternities and Sororities says the Town of Amherst consistently inspects the premises of each house to make sure it is up to par with regulations.

The Amherst fire department did not give specifics regarding the violations.

Sigma Alpha Mu and Alpha Tau Gamma will be able to reapply for recognition at UMass. Gargano told reporters that as long as the two fraternities do not try to conduct an underground operation, they can probably be reinstated before the three-year suspension ends.

In May, the Collegian reported Sigma Alpha Mu was closed for violations, which included blocked doorways, covered smoke detectors, electrical problems and empty fire extinguishers.

Alpha Tau Gamma was also closed in May due to broken doors, blocked exits and illegal cooking.

Gargano points to student deaths at off-campus housing in other parts of the country as a reason to be more vigilant about enforcing code violations.

'If there were a student death, what would we be saying then?' Gargano said.

ATG Inc. owns both Alpha Tau Gamma and Sigma Alpha Mu. The treasurer of ATG, James E. Mulcahy who is a former member of Alpha Tau Gamma is upset about the suspension.

'I think it's utterly ridiculous,' Mulcahy told the Springfield Republican. 'The violations of the physical nature that were observed by town officials are picayune and insignificant.'

But just after the University shut down two frats, it plans to open three more.

Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity and Alpha Sigma Phi fraternity are slated to open in the spring and fall of 2006, respectively.

Wiseman explains the fraternities are being opened after the University received a presentation from the frats' national chapters.

'The representatives of each fraternity came and met with the administration,' Wiseman said. 'Then, the council discussed the presentations and voted on it.'

Wiseman believes that both the closing and opening of these fraternities demonstrates that the University is paying more attention to the fraternity and sorority system.

'It's not only about addressing ones who violate the codes, but opening new [fraternities] and creating new opportunities for students.'

He says that this will benefit students who have thought about joining a fraternity but had difficulty finding a group they wanted to pledge to.

'Now they will have more options, and this could spur more recruiting,' he said.

In regards to the change in events for the UMass Greek system, Wiseman says, 'This incident is a shot in the arm, or a wake-up call. They know now that the University is serious about this.'

He hopes that the situation will make everyone in the Greek system more aware of requirements so that they will attempt to improve their behavior.

The fraternity closings are the first time in recent memory that a frat house was closed at UMass. However, it is not the first time recently that a sorority house has been closed. The Delta Zeta sorority was closed in February due to 'unspecific drug violations,' according to its national chapter. DZ sorority members vehemently denied any drug activity occurring in the house. However, the house still remains closed.

D.A. asks for DNA sample in UMass murder

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON — A Hampshire Superior Court judge was asked by prosecutors Aug. 12 if a saliva sample could be taken from the man who shot a University of Massachusetts student to death last December.

In addition to the developments in court, more information surrounding the murder of UMass student David E. Sullivan, 22 and the killer, Bryan Johnston, 23 of Westfield has been released.

Johnston admitted shooting Sullivan several times at 12:20 a.m. on Dec. 7, 2004 in Sullivan's Meadow St. apartment in North Amherst. Johnston is being charged with murder.

Johnston and Sullivan were childhood friends who grew up together in the Berkshires. Johnston is from Dalton, population 6,892 and Sullivan is from Washington, population 544. They both graduated from Waconah Regional High School in 2000.

COLLEGIAN ARCHIVES

Bryan Johnston was charged with the murder of high school friend David Sullivan.

Investigators say Johnston, who attended Westfield State College at the time of the homicide, phoned Sullivan and asked him to hang out, but Sullivan refused. Police believe Johnston then drove to Sullivan's apartment, entered unannounced and shot him six times while he sat in his bedroom.

Sullivan's roommate, UMass student Stephen Kubicki, who was home at the time of the shooting, called 911 at 12:26 a.m. Police arrived minutes later to find Sullivan lying in a pool of blood. He was pronounced dead at the scene.

Court documents describe at least six .223-caliber shell casings in Sullivan's room, with blood splattered on the walls, ceiling and his computer.

Police said Johnston drove off in his car immediately after the shooting. He then got hung up on either a log or railroad tie near the Aqua Vitae restaurant on route 9 in Hadley. He was detained in a police car for a short time. Whether it was due to darkness or rain that night, Hadley police did not notice the blood on his clothing or in his car. He eventually phoned a friend who picked him up and drove him back to Westfield a

UMass vanity license plates hit open road

By MELISSA BLANKSTEEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

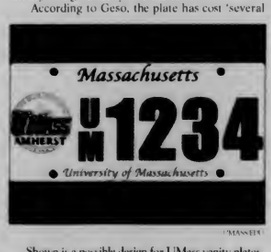
You will probably see them drive into town first on the buses because they will not be on cars yet for a while. But, never fear, they are coming.

Since Spring Commencement, the Alumni Association has been offering new University of Massachusetts vanity license plates, which they will be advertising on the PVTA buses, the Big E, and other sites. The proceeds from the plate will go directly to a new scholarship fund.

'The Alumni Association is very excited to be doing this for the University,' Cristina Geso, Executive Director of the Alumni Association said. 'It's a campus-wide plate. It's a plate for everyone.'

This plate will directly benefit the new 'Drive to Succeed Scholarship Fund' set up by the Alumni Association. The scholarship will look for new 'Road Scholars' from Massachusetts to help them get the keys to a UMass education.

The plates will cost the driver $40 a year. Half of the money will go to the Registry of Motor Vehicles for fees, but every year after that, all the money will go directly into the fund.



According to Geso, the plate has cost 'several thousand dollars to develop' but she seems more than optimistic that all the effort will be well worth it.

"All things are going well," she said. "We're excited."

The Alumni Association has been working with the Chancellor's office and the Registry of Motor Vehicles for several months to come up with the design "that everyone is excited about." an enthusiastic Geso said in her office over the summer.

The plates feature a UMass Amherst decal on the left of the plate, followed by UM and your choice of numbers. The bottom of the plate will read "University of Massachusetts." According to Geso, they could only use four colors, but the design has been finalized.

However, before the Registry of Motor Vehicles can go into production on these new plates, the Alumni Association must sell the first 1,500. Even though they have been on sale since May, no one is looking at this as too much of a challenge.

Fire damages four Puffton apartments

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Pieces of glass and wood now litter the living room floor of Puffton Village apartment 229, after fire severely damaged the unit and three adjacent apartments on Monday, July 18.

Heat and humidity took a toll on firefighters who battled the blaze. A "comprehensive rehab setup" was created for the firefighters so they could receive cold drinks and medical attention. Some firefighters were brought into three air-conditioned ambulances on the scene.

Six fire fighters were treated for heat exhaustion, but none were brought to the hospital. No one was injured in the fire.

Firefighters were called to apartment 230 at Puffton Village, 1040 North Pleasant St., after receiving a report of black smoke. Upon arrival, fire crews found the kitchen on fire.

Fire officials said the fire easily spread to apartment 229 through an empty area that was created when a replacement roof was added over the original roof.

None of the six people who lived inside the apartments affected were home at the time of the blaze. Most of the residents were UMass students.

Amherst fire officials determined the blaze started on a kitchen stove in apartment 230. However, residents originally disputed that anything was on the stove when the fire started.

Stephen Walczak, manager of Puffton Village said the fire caused around $100,000 worth of damage.

Five residents stayed with friends and one stayed in a hotel shortly after the fire. All but one of the residents has received new apartments in Puffton, Walczak said.

Firefighters from Amherst, Belchertown, Northampton and Hadley responded to the fire. The Granby fire department provided an ambulance.

Apartment 229 in Puffton Village made headlines last winter after Amherst police busted its residents for selling drugs. Police seized two pounds of hydroponically-grown marijuana and 20 doses of adderall in a raid March 10. Three of the residents in the apartment, Christopher Masture, 22, Mark A. Koch, 20 and Robert Hayes, 21 were arrested on various drug possession and distribution charges.

Fire shuts down restaurant

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Although original estimates were at $50,000, the cost of a July 7 fire at La Cucina di Pinnochio's restaurant is quickly nearing several times that amount.

"Damages are in the hundreds of thousands of dollars," said Amherst Fire Assistant Chief Lindsay E. Stromgen.

"The electrical damage was much more than we expected," he added.

Apart from electrical damage done to the establishment at 30 Boltwood Walk, the fire destroyed the floor and a wall of the a popular Italian restaurant.

Fire fighters were called to the scene at 1:12 a.m. when a nearby off-duty police officer saw smoke pouring out of the establishment that houses La Cucina di Pinocchio.

18 firefighters, two chief officers, the department's chaplain, and 18 call firefighters responded to the fire.

Stromgen said that when the firefighters arrived at the scene, smoke was billowing out of the building, with so little visibility that firefighters could not see the flames of the fire.

After entering the basement of the building, firefighters discovered that the sprinkler system had been shut off. Whoever shut the system off failed to follow regulations and tell the Amherst Fire Department.

"It's illegal for the sprinklers to be left in the shut off position," Stromgren said.

The room where the sprinkler controls are located is locked sometimes, but unlocked at other times, making it hard to pinpoint who was at fault. Nobody is being fined, according to Stromgen.

After the firefighters turned the sprinkler system back on, firefighters discovered that the fire had burned off the sprinkler head. Once the water was on, the firefighters quickly located the source of the fire. However, the setbacks caused by the smoke and sprinkler system cost the team 20-25 minutes before reaching the center of the blaze.

The Springfield Republican reported that the sprinkler system was outdated, and if it was up-to-date, the fire may have been prevented. New sprinkler systems automatically notify the fire department if a system is shut off.

The Copper Mine, a new tanning salon, which was to be located in the basement of the building, was in the midst of renovating at the time of the fire.

The fire damaged two rooms in the Copper Mine, and spread to the ceiling, which is the floor of Pinocchio's.

No firefighters were hurt during the fire. The sole resident of the building was assisted by the Red Cross.

Amherst Fire determined that the fire was not suspicious, but they could not pinpoint an exact cause.†The fire is now under investigation by the building's insurance companies.

The building is closed until further notice.

Rape charges dropped against local women

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A Northampton judge dropped aggravated rape charges against two Northampton women Aug. 2 due to the alleged victim's unwillingness to testify.

The dropped charges followed the request of the Northwestern District Attorney's office.

Rachel Klobertanz, 23, and Augusta Claire Kendall, 22, both of 104 South St., Apt. 21., were each charged in January with two counts of aggravated rape, three counts of assault and battery and one count each of aggravated assault and battery and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. Klobertanz also faced a charge of violation of an abuse-prevention order.

All charges were dropped after the district attorney's office declared that the alleged victim was continually uncooperative with the ongoing investigation. The victim resides out of state and has reportedly indicated that she would not voluntarily return to testify.

"Additional info that was made after the arrest has substantially affected that commonwealth's ability to meet its burden of proof in the case," Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Susan Loehn wrote in the statement in Kendall and Klobertanz' court files.

District Court Judge Michael Goggins granted Loehn's request to drop the charges.

Prosecutors had alleged that the women handcuffed and raped a 22-year-old female Smith College student on Jan. 14. Kendall was also a Smith student.

The victim reportedly went to Kendall and Klobertanz' South St. apartment where the three drank alcohol and engaged in what began as consensual sex.

Later, the accused allegedly handcuffed the woman, put a knife to her stomach, cut her many times and raped her before letting her go, police reports said.

According to reports, she admitted to having a prior relationship with Klobertanz.

After victim's alleged assault had ended she reportedly went to the Northampton Police Department where she was then transported to the Cooley Dickinson Hospital where she was treated and released. According to Northampton Detective Jody Kasper, the victim had visible lacerations caused by a knife. She also had bite marks and bruises throughout her entire body.

Klobertanz and Kendall were arrested the next day, after the woman reported the incident to police.

Klobertanz and Kendall were not present in court this week when the charges were dropped.

Paluseo to finish sentence in Texas

By Megan Daley

COLLEGIAN ARCHIVES

Jennifer Paluseo seen here being handcuffed after she received a guilty verdict.

NORTHAMPTON — Former University of Massachusetts student, Jennifer Paluseo will soon be able to pursue a new future.

Paluseo was convicted in April 2004 of killing her newborn baby after she pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter. She was sentenced to one year in jail and 10 years of probation by Hampshire Superior Court Judge Judd J. Carhart.

Now, Paluseo's jail-time is up. Her lawyer, Terry S. Nagle asked Judge Bertha D. Josephson of the Hampshire Superior Court to allow Paluseo to finish out her probation in Texas. Josephson okay'd her request on Friday, Aug. 12.

Paluseo has been accepted to Corpus Christi Junior College and has a job awaiting her in Texas. The deceased child's paternal grandparents had no objections to Paluseo's plans, According to First Assistant Northwestern District Attorney Rence L. Steese.

Paluseo was a freshman at UMass when she became pregnant. She kept the pregnancy a secret, gave birth to the child in the James Hall dormitory shower stall, and wrapped her child in a towel before leaving him in a dumpster outside of the Southwest dorm.

Maintenance workers found the 9 pound, 2 ounce baby boy the next day, May 2, 2002. An investigation by Northwestern District Attorney Elizabeth D. Scheibel, UMass police and State police detectives revealed that Paluseo was the mother of the abandoned boy.

Originally, Paluseo pleaded innocent under the Alford plea, which states that a person, while in a state of confusion, remembered being present at the time of a crime, but not committing it.

Nagle told the judge that Paluseo suffered from dissociative disorder, which wouldn't allow her to acknowledge her pregnancy. Paluseo claimed that, though she remembered cramping in the shower, she did not remember giving birth or anything after.

However, Paluseo eventually admitted to wrapping the child in a towel and disposing of the body and was given her sentence.

Texas probation officers will monitor the rest of Paluseo's probation in their state.

Paluseo's case was used in a bid to pass the Baby Safe Haven law in Massachusetts last year. The case was one of about a dozen known baby abandonment cases in Massachusetts since 2002.

Passed on October 29, 2004, the law states that a parent may legally surrender a newborn infant seven days old or younger at a safe place, such as a hospital, police station or manned fire station without facing criminal prosecution. So far, only one baby has been surrendered under the Baby Safe Haven law in Massachusetts.

So far, so good for GEO officials

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

After a year and half filled with bitter debates, failed negotiations and disruptive demonstrations, the Graduate Employee Organization and the University of Massachusetts have finally reached a tentative three-year agreement May 19, ending GEO's three month period of working without a contract.

GEO/UAW Local 2322 members voted overwhelmingly to ratify their sixth contract with the University on May 19 and May 20. The contract will remain in effect from July 1, 2004 to June 30, 2007. The new contract covers all UMass graduate students who are employed as Teaching Associates (TO), Teaching Assistants (TA), Research Assistants (RA), Project Assistants (PA), Assistant Residence Directors (ARD), and Graduate Interns.

The GEO of UMass is a labor union that represents 2,400 graduate employees. UMass graduate students first started to assemble in the late 1970s but have worked as a union for 15 years. Every three years the GEO and the University have worked together to negotiate a new legally binding contract.

On March 1, over 600 members and allies of the GEO held a "Mass March" around the campus

SGA looks ahead to a new school year

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The 2005-06 school year at the University of Massachusetts brings new students, new faculty, and the SGA's implantation of new goals and ideas to be seen across campus, according to leading SGA members.

After emerging as the victor of last semesters' presidential election, President Pavel Payano, along with members of the executive cabinet and the Student Center for Education Research Advocacy (SCERA), followed the lead of former SGA President Eduardo Bustamante and drafted a Community Action Plan in response to Chancellor John V. Lombardi's diversity recommendations.

Diversity became an enormous issue in UMass politics last year after nine UMass student representatives, including then-SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins were photographed drinking alcoholic beverages and playing card games in the SCFRA office. The photo also showed a caricature drawn on a dry erase board fashioned to resemble Higgins. The figure, shown dressed in a pointed hat and cape, held a burning cross and wore a shirt that read 'Grand Wizard,' referencing the hate group "Ku Klux Klan."

The photos were taken on March 29, the same day Speaker of the Student Government Association Patrick Higgins, then the Chairman of Ways and Means Committee, lost the presidential election to Eduardo Bustamante.

Higgins submitted his letter of resignation one week after requests from SGA members, University groups and students asked him to step down in response of the photographs.

Payano also plans to take a big step towards continuing the recent success of the Textbook Rental program. The plan, first implemented last year, can lessen the costs of students' books by as much as 45 percent. Payano hopes to save students even more money as the program continues to grow.

Payano will likely aim to avoid creating controversy within the Senate, something Payano failed to do in his first months as acting President. A number of Senate members of the SGA attempted to censure Payano last April, claiming that he had not managed the SGA office properly, and that he had passed initiatives without the consent of the Senate body.

A motion was drafted citing alleged inefficiencies of the office use, specifically proper use of office supplies and the notion that the SGA been view by many as having the same agenda as other student groups like Take Back UMass and the Graduate Employee Organization, both groups of which Payano is a member.

According to Senate Speaker Mark Morrison, the SGA office had ordered "two boxes of paper" in early April, the same time Payano was sworn in as president. The paper disappeared shortly after Morrison accused members of Take Back UMass, SCERA and GEO of using the office's printer and paper for pushing their own agendas.

According to the SGA by-laws, the President holds the responsibility to maintain the office, until the executive cabinet is appointed. The vote to place the motion onto the agenda, failed, however, and the vote of censuring was never voted on.

In other news, SGA Committees have continued to work in efforts to improve campus life. In hopes of creating an increased level of legitimacy of the SGA within the student body, the Public Policy Relations committee has drafted a plan to create a newsletter that they would like be published monthly as privately funded insert in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Chairman of the PPR committee, Tristan Brown, feels that a monthly newsletter can increase students' awareness of events and issues within the SGA.

Another possible addition to campus is the installation of 'reverse' vending machines in the Southwest Residential Area. The machines would allow students to recycle cans and bottles, redeeming the money on their U-Cards. Sen. Sean Bliss announced last year that the pilot plan was in effect and construction was underway.

"We hope that this pilot is successful so we can get more of these [machines]," Bliss told the Collegian in April. "It would be really awesome if it could be turned into a student-run business."

Payano said that it is vital to gather students and lobby against legislators to fight for more funding. Payano said that he wants to institutionalize these student groups so that the "legislators actually see how serious we are."

New cadets added to help UMass Police

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The cadet program of the UMass Police Department will be starting its third year this fall, when eight new recruits join the 22 present recruits to help patrol the campus.

UMPD Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald says that the new recruits joining the cadet program this year will begin their training in the fall, after the start of school, but Archbald was unsure of when students would see them in action.

Cadets differ from regular police officers in a number of ways. The most important, says Archbald, is that the cadets are not trained to carry firearms.

The cadets, who work in pairs patrolling the UMass campus, also wear a different uniform from the rest of the police force and do not patrol in marked units, but rather on foot.

Cadets are still very much a part of the police force. They are allowed to stop and investigate suspicious activities on campus and are expected to interfere in any crimes they see taking place. Cadets can also stop cars or students violating alcohol possession or transport laws. Cadets are also able to make arrests, which Archbald calls a "very serious responsibility."

At the end of last year, the cadets' responsibilities expanded to include backing up security in the dorms. After incidents in the Southwest dormitories, such as the baseball riots, administrators called for more officer presence in the dorms. Now, according to Archbald, the cadets can act as back-up for student security at busy times, such as Fridays and weekends.

Cadets are also used in the UMPD office to help with booking and clerical work.

UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor first came up with the idea for the initiating cadet recruitment for the UMPD. Two years ago, in the spring of 2003, O'Connor worked with the police union to make room for a cadet program.

O'Connor helped initiate the cadet program in response to the need for more police presence on the UMass campus. Now the cadets are used in several incidents where more law enforcement is needed, such as in the Southwest living area for post-sports games celebratory activity.

Some students may worry at the use of more inexperienced law officers getting involved in the riot situations. Many accidents that take place, such as the death of Emerson College student Victoria Snelgrove in Boston last year during the Red Sox World Championship, are blamed on untrained officers not able to deal properly with riotous situations. However, Archbald says the main purpose of the cadets is simply to have more of a law enforcement presence.

The cadets are also mixed in with experienced officers who have experienced similar situations before and are well-trained in the protocol. Archbald also says that the cadets only handle weapons that they have been fully trained to use.

Archbald says that the program usually has about 30 cadets at a time, and requires different numbers for recruitment as students graduate or drop out of the program.

Cadets are offered training that can help prepare them for a job in law enforcement. 12 dollars per hour and experience.

New cadets are ready to join UMPD force to fight crime on campus.

Falcons found nesting W.E.B. Dubois Library

JAAP VAN HEERDEN/MASS LIBRARIES

A baby peregrine falcon that was found nesting outside the library was banded with help from the Mass Wildlife of Connecticut Valley District.

By Daniel Terk
Collegian Staff

When most of the student body was beginning to taking advantage of the summer, others had just arrived to the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus.

Soon after graduation on May 31, three peregrine falcon chicks were removed from a nesting box on the northeast corner of the W.E.B. Du Bois library and banded. This is the third year that successful nesting has occurred on the library.

The banding of the birds was overseen by Mass Wildlife's Connecticut Valley District who will continue to track the birds throughout their lives. The library nesting project began with the joint efforts of many on and off campus groups in 1998. The final goal of all parties was to increase the number of peregrine falcons, which is still an endangered species in the area.

Nesting however was not immediate. "There was evidence the box was being visited," said Pete Westover, the former Conservation Department Director for the Town of Amherst, "but successful nesting really did not start for a few years."

David Fuller of Mass Wildlife explained that the nesting box was specifically designed to accommodate the nesting habits of peregrine falcons. Peregrines naturally nest of ledges and unlike other birds they do not make a nest out of sticks, grass and other common nest building materials, they lay their eggs right on the ledge. The box has three walls, a roof and an open front, the bottom has been covered with pea stone to simulate a rocky ledge. There is also a raised lip on the open side of the box to prevent the eggs from rolling out of the box and plummeting 28 stories.

Peregrines and humans 'coexist pretty well in these types of situation,' said Fuller, who also made it quite clear that these birds of prey are not threatening to people.

The peregrine falcon, which is a little bigger than a crow, has a diet of water fowl, song birds, and pigeons. Fuller made the prediction that's students may be able to catch a glimpse of a peregrine assail a pigeon around Lederle.

The plight of the peregrine began in the 1950s and 60s when DDT was around the country as an insecticide. DDT was extremely detrimental to the peregrine population which has just recently begun to show improvement.

Just as the chicks found at the start of the summer were banded so have the chicks found in the past two years. Using these bands it has been found that some of the chicks born atop the W.E. B. Dubois library have migrated all across the eastern seaboard according to Westover.

If you are interested in helping out in this or other wildlife issues in the area there is a student chapter of The Wildlife Society at UMass-Amherst.

Area News in Brief

Man jumps off Coolidge Bridge

HADLEY — A 48-year-old Hadley man jumped off the Calvin Coolidge Bridge into the Connecticut River on Friday, July 15 at about 7:20 p.m., according to Hadley police.

Police say a motorist reported a man in a bathing suit on the route 9 bridge. When police caught up with that man, he reportedly admitted jumping off the bridge.

Police estimate the man jumped from a height of 100 feet. It is unclear why the man jumped.

The man was not seriously hurt. He was not arrested, but was issued a warning. Police say there is no specific law that prohibits jumping from a bridge.

Crazed man runs naked through Cumbries lot

NORTH AMHERST — A 21-year-old Amherst man was summonsed to court after running naked and smashing objects in the parking lot of Cumberland Farms on Montague Rd. Aug. 10.

Amherst police were called to the store around 12:20 a.m. Upon arrival, cops encountered the nude man, who allegedly admitted taking LSD and cocaine earlier that night.

The unidentified man was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Police charged the man with indecent exposure and wanton destruction of property.

Amherst parking fees, fines increase

AMHERST — It now costs more to park your car in the town of Amherst.

The town began collecting its new increased parking fees and fines Aug. 1. In May, the Select Board approved a new fee and fine structure to help the town raise $200,000 this fiscal year.

The price for parking at downtown meters was raised from 30 to 40 cents an hour, and from 50 to 60 cents an hour at the Boltwood Walk Parking Garage.

The monthly rates at the garage was raised from $60 to $75 a month, and from $500 to $650 yearly.

Woman gets light sentence for serious charges

NORTHAMPTON — An Amherst woman who was busted for possessing a large amount of narcotics where her young child was living had her case continued without a finding Aug. 12.

Meagan Baird, 25, whose last known address was 700J Mill Valley Estates was charged with reckless endangerment of a child and being present where heroin is kept after a drug bust at her home last year.

Judge Bertha Josephson agreed with Baird's attorneys in Hampshire District Court to continue the case without a finding, meaning the charges will be dismissed if Baird does not commit a crime within the next year.

A drug raid of Baird's home in April 2004 revealed 143 packets of cocaine, 37 packets of heroin and 78 packets of crack cocaine, among other drugs.

Police say Baird's two-year-old daughter was living in her apartment at the time of the raid.

Variety is the spice of UMass

Diversity has become the theme of the University over the past year or so. It's one of those two dollar words that can translate to 'difference' or 'multifaceted.' It is the variety that keeps this college campus running every day; the spice of UMass, if you will. Whether it is through student involvement or campus-sponsored events, this university has a lot to offer for all walks of life. In the upcoming months, it is our responsibility as patrons of this fine university to realize the importance of being different.

In the past year, there has been a lot of discussion between the students and the administration regarding campus diversity. The results of the discussion have caused more stress than they intended to. The goal of any meeting between administrators and students is to make the campus community better as a whole. Variety can do that.

With over 100 registered student organizations (RSOs) on campus, there is nothing stopping anyone from joining the group that sparks their interests. From fraternities and sororities to fencing and MASSpirg, this place has a lot to offer.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano has put into action this year the new Commission on Diversity's Draft Action Plan. This is a blueprint designed to do two things: show the effort the administration is making to help diversify the campus and show that the administration is there for the university's students. Whether that plan is going to be successful or not has yet to be confirmed, but it is an acknowledgement by the higher-ups that this campus is comprised of many different people from all walks of life.

One way to help aid the administration, as well as yourselves, in the upcoming semester is to maintain a positive and always present student voice. This is the only way the administration will know of the general students' happiness and/or frustrations. Hopefully, if we are all on the same page with regards to communication, the things that separate the students from the administration will cease to be an issue.

The University of Massachusetts is not defined as a particular school with a particular concentration. It is not classified as a liberal arts school in general, nor as an engineering school, nor as a major political science school. It offers a variety of programs within many separate colleges that range from Exercise Science to Judaic Studies to Computer Science. The only thing that classifies this school is that it is the state University of Massachusetts; the peak of growth and intellectual evolution for this state and all those who wish to attend.

Whatever happens in the upcoming school year, it will be a year of student voice and administrative understanding. The 'differences' that this school sees from day to day will become the backbone of what this university is to become. Staying true to your individual beliefs will be important, now more than ever, in a continually changing and growing intellectual society.

Not selling short

Becky Martins

When philosopher Epictetus said, 'Only the educated are free,' his words could not have been more accurate.

It is human nature to want more than we currently possess. Very few of us are satisfied with our current standing in the world. Thus, many try to better themselves in hopes of achieving success, prosperity and essentially, their dreams. But is the idea that hard work pays off completely true? Sure, we may find that working excessive hours and forgoing unnecessary material objects could eventually lead to the 'good life. However, if we learned the necessary skills to succeed early on, would we have to experience hard times at all?

My parents, having been the first in their families to attend college, always stressed to us the importance of doing well in school, graduating and continuing our education. Both individuals had grown up in working class households, and therefore, knew the firsthand meaning of struggle. Naturally then, they wanted better for their children and continually pushed us to 'go for the gold,' to quote my father's favorite saying.

In my earlier years, I hated this constant pressure at home to do well scholastically. However, when the time came to apply to college, I appreciated the strong emphasis that had been placed on my education. Never was it an option to simply start working after graduation, or forget my diploma entirely. I knew I could accomplish better things and strove to do so.

Many years ago, after completing 12 years of primary and secondary education, entering the workforce was customary practice. Sometimes, a student did not even get so far to receive his or her diploma. But during these times, life was different. Simply completing high school could guarantee someone a decent job. It was also common for a teenager's education to terminate before the 12th grade, due to factors such as impoverishment, war, etc. Essentially, instead of having emphasis placed on achieving more, working with what was available became more the common practice.

Today, though, times have changed. There are laws that prohibit a child from leaving school at an early age, as well as working too many hours. To help struggling families, governmental aid programs exist so adolescents can spend their time learning and not worrying about money. Generally,

Some students still believe they can make it in the world without a high schooi diploma, let aione any additional instruction. Sadly, though, they also fail to realize they are only setting themselves up for years of hardship.

it is no longer the acceptable social norm to discontinue a secondary education before its completion. Yet, despite what is commonplace in the present, some students still believe they can make it in the world without a high school diploma, let alone any additional instruction. Sadly, though, they also fail to realize they are only setting themselves up for years of hardship.

This summer, I allotted myself 12 weeks to meet my financial goals, which would allow me to make college payments and pay regular bills. I figured if I had the availability and the drive to work hard, finding a decent job and making the necessary money would be easy. But little did I know my summer employment would be so turbulent.

Finding a good job was the first of my problems. Though I graduated from high school, and now was in college, I appeared to have no real advantage over other applicants. My skills were not only common but expected if I even hoped to be considered for a job. On average, the typical starting pay was minimum wage, if not only slightly better.

When I finally did secure employment, I found myself waitressing at two different restaurants just to get by. My workweek consisted of one day off and at least 50 hours on the clock. My responsibilities involved catering to people's every demand, as well as playing the role of punching bag for my employer's every frustration and stress. Very rarely did I enjoy my work. Instead, I found myself watching the clock, waiting for my time to escape.

Looking back on my vacation, I'm sure my time could have been spent more enjoyably. Honestly, though, I had no other options. I had no special skills to offer. I did not have the luxury of time on my side, letting my seniority in a company lead me to better paychecks. Luckily for me, my summer of working too hard for too little was only a temporary situation. I could not imagine if those three months served as my permanent reality. Sadly, not everyone is so fortunate.

My point here is not to condemn any non-college student to a life of struggle. However, people should not give up and settle for working below their potential. Finish high school and gain a diploma. Push yourself and continue learning, whether it is at a university, trade school, etc. But essentially, keep an open mind to the pursuit of knowledge. Doing so will allow oneself to truly live the 'good life,' early on. If we settle for less, we are only selling ourselves short.

Love, life and pizza

Chris Eckel

My freshman year was full of firsts; my first frat party, my first (but sadly not the last) time ordering Domino's at 3 a.m. because it was the only thing open and my first college girlfriend.

But this isn't about her. This story is about my girlfriend's roommate, Lisa, and a few other people as well. I sometimes slept over at my girlfriend's room, which meant I'd see Lisa in the morning. My girlfriend had the early classes, which meant she was always out of the shower and in the D.C. before Lisa or I woke up. The two late sleepers got made fun of for being lazy, and that's half true. Sleep and I get along well, but I can never forget the way Lisa jumped out of bed every morning. She would have beaten most Olympic sprinters to the showers, even those of them who take steroids.

Her energy never let up throughout the day. Whether it was volunteering to show visitors around campus, heading out to a party or even, God forbid, doing homework, Lisa attacked life with the sort of enthusiasm you usually only see from a groupie hanging around the Tom Brady or David Ortiz. Every day was a new challenge, every new experience a reward, and she never let up. Compared to her, I felt like I was standing still, and letting life come to me.

I I've since learned that's no way to go about life, especially the next four to six years of it. College is all about the new and the exciting; the dangerous and the trial by error. Every day has to be taken as a challenge to you in order to see and do all that you can. Get out there and run for SGA. You might be surprised how much fun it can be to represent some of your fellow students. Do intramural soccer with friends, even if you're more about Cheetos at the corner store than corner kicks. Get a job on campus to meet new people, and make minimum wage plus free lunch if you work at the Blue Wall. (I swear, they're not paying me to recruit for them.)

College is all about the new and exciting: the dangerous and the triai by error. Every day has to be taken as a challenge to you in order to see and do all that you can.

Even go to a frat party, just so you know what everyone else is talking about, for better or worse. Whatever you choose to do with your time, don't pull a Chris Eckel, circa 2001, and try and beat your own world record in Tony Hawk. The only acceptable time to play video games is with a friend when you are waiting for that awful pizza to show up at 3:30 am.

Whatever it is you get involved with outside of class, don't forget how lucky you are every day to be a student at a nationally recognized university pursuing your passions. There are a lot worse places to be. Don't take anything you have for granted, make the most of it. Life, love and everything in between can disappear in a heartbeat. Call home and tell whoever helped you get here that you love them. Remind your friends how much they mean to you, even if it seems a little tacky. And guys, its all right to share your feelings, it doesn't make you a wuss.

College is a time to figure yourself out, make the most of your time and make yourself ready for the real world. I'm not sure how ready for the real world I am yet; the thought of wearing ties every day makes me break out in hives, but I do know this much: thanks to the example of people like Lisa, I've come to love and cherish every new experience, and even though I still wake up a little bit later than most of corporate America, I wake up excited about the day ahead and what I'm going to see and do. Every new thing is a gift. If you can take that attitude into the rest of your time here at UMass, you'll do just fine. Good luck in the upcoming year, UMass.

SGA needs a change of tone

David Lawrence

I'd like to extend an invitation to all the members of the SGA and the RSOs it represents. The engagement I'm inviting you all to is a semester of relevance, helping the student body by focusing on appropriate student-related issues. There is no entrance fee short of a commitment to real issues and a rejection of the ridiculous scandal-driven politics that have dominated SGA voices since I've been at UMass. There is no price except a willingness to bury the hatchet.

This new semester offers great promise. The SGA has a strong leader in Pavel Payano, a senior whose level head and leadership ability I can personally attest to. If the student government works with Pavel, he has the potential to be an effective leader and do great things for the student body. If the mistakes of years past are repeated in the SGA, he has the potential to spend his term mired in witch hunts and scandal.

if they bury the hatchet with the administration, stop crying wolf and enhance their reputation among the student body, the student government could, this semester, find itself in a position of 'useful influence' instead of its usual 'ridiculous distraction' to the adiministration.

If President Payano is forced to waste time as he did last semester, fighting off votes of no confidence over 'abuse of printer paper,' he will have less available in which to work for actual student causes. Members of the SGA accusing the president of wasting paper or leaving the lights on isn't going to help clean the shower vents in Orchard Hill or get freshmen to class on time, so please use some judgment and leave the personal disagreements off the floor.

When students enter UMass as freshman, they are wet behind the ears. The majority arrive in Amherst with the naÛve assumption that the student government is a serious, respected and effective organization. If SGA members accept my invitation, it's possible that those incoming freshman could actually exit the semester thinking the same way. If no inflated KKK-9 scandal graces the pages of The Daily Collegian this semester, those freshman might never have reason to shake their heads in disgust as they give up on the student government. Just imagine, SGA members, the clout you would have with a freshman class that still respects the validity of your organization.

Some of the new freshman might even decide to join the SGA in order to help the student body, not merely to become embroiled in conflict. As it is, many interested students (such as myself) are periodically pushed away from joining the SGA by scandals like questionable 're-votes' in the elections or partisan fighting over ALANA's appointed seats. The result is an organization populated only by those with skins thick enough to fight through the constant conflict and those that enjoy it; a situation which tends to self-perpetuate. Should you accept my invitation, the cycle can end. The SGA will grow as the ranks of intelligent, productive students who have been shy to join amid an air of conflict in the past will enter the campus' political scene.

This new SGA could find itself in a position to actually influence the administration. Its most important function has always been serving as a conduit between students and the campus administration. Student government still serves today as the voice of the students to the administration, though unfortunately of late that voice has too often cried wolf. The administration must, by now, be sick of cries of racism, rallies against perfectly reasonable fees for international students and the periodic Watergate-style claims of corruption and scandal surrounding Vice Chancellor Gargano and other campus bureaucrats.

An administration forcibly embattled with the students is unlikely to listen to realistic and productive voices because they are lost in a flurry of wild accusations. If they bury the hatchet with the administration, stop crying wolf and enhance their reputation among the student body, the student government could, this semester, find itself in a position of useful influence instead of its usual ridiculous distraction to the administration. With the ability to effectively influence the administration's terrific power, significant changes could be made by the SGA to actually better UMass and its student body.

What my invitation adds up to is a call for a change in attitude. I'm asking the movers and shakers on this campus to use the clean slate a new semester provides to our mutual advantage. With restructuring taking place as part of the Chancellor's Action Plan for Diversity, the student members of RSOs have a choice; they can continue to slur the administration and mire themselves in negative politics and animosity, or they can put their best foot forward and work towards creating an environment of optimism and mutual respect.

When I look back on the last three years, I see that the status quo has been anger, petulance and a striking lack of improvement in the tone of SGA affairs. That can change this year. I hope, for the sake of all the students at UMass, that the SGA accepts this invitation.

ALLISON FO

Willingly deferring my crossword success

Allison Edles

As part of my daily routine over the summer, I made an early morning trip to Starbucks to get my iced grande vanilla latte and my New York Times. This was an attempt to take the edge off what was undoubtedly going to be a boring day of answering phones and filing charts. After casually scanning the headlines, I flipped over to my favorite and most challenging section of the paper, the crossword puzzle.

The New York Times crossword puzzle is one of the most challenging puzzles I have ever tried to complete. It's the only puzzle I do knowing I won't complete. I don't know if it's the attempt or the reactions I get from people who see me doing it, but it is very satisfying.

More things in life should be like the New York Times crossword, where you feel good for, in a sense, failing. Society has broken the whole 'succeeding' and 'failing' notion into three categories: win/win, win/lose and lose/lose. As if these were our only options.

Life, like the crossword, is not suppose to be simple or easy. It's suppose to be confusing, too hard for what you've prepared for and never ever fit nicely into the corner of a full-length newpaper.

There are first place, second place and third place; categories that also break succeeding and failing into groups. In a race, barring any ties, there is only one winner. So if there is only one, why award the two runners up anything? In essence, they still failed. We do so because you have to get something. It's as simple as that.

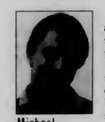
The New York Times crossword isn't really amusing. It isn't even fun so much as something to do. Think about it, it's the first thing done in the morning by zombies hyped up on sugary coffee drinks that contain very little actual coffee before the work day starts. Of course no one is going to solve it. The types of people that successfully solve the New York Times crossword puzzle on any given Friday (in pen) are the same people that say comics dumb down the newspaper.

Life, like the crossword, is not supposed to be simple or easy. It's supposed to be confusing, too hard for what you're prepared for and will never ever fit nicely into the corner of a full-length newspaper.

Also, oddly enough, it seems that any frustrations you are experiencing that day manage to manifest themselves into that, and only that particular crossword puzzle. If you woke up having a really bad hair day because you ran out of hairspray, the clue to three across is going to say 'Aqua Net, e.g.' She's a fickle mistress, but yet, we all keep coming back to her to give her one last chance to make us feel utterly stupid.

Every morning, that little square of black and white boxes taunts thousands of New York Times readers and we all sit there and willingly take it. Who knows, maybe we keep going back to it because our inability to solve it leaves a bitter taste in our mouths that actually makes our grande vanilla lattes taste like real coffee.

At the end of the day, the feeling of failure dissipates from us all because, as you sit there eating your dinner and trying to figure out the right way to spell Ayatollah for 43 down, you realize that you're not alone. And that's life, for the thousands of people that have a frustrating day, they are always ready and willing to get up the next morning and take it. And it's not because they have to, it's because what else are they going to do for the 20 minutes on the train from Newark to New York?



I strongly feel that, as avid New York Times crossword attempters, we should adopt the British way of failing: calling it 'deferred success' instead. Yes, only then will we actually be given hope that one day we will successfully complete the crossword (on a Friday without looking up the answers).

This whole 'deferred success' business is the dawning of a new era, an era where students will no longer be required to complete college in four years. Hell, they'll still be successful. It'll just be slightly deferred. I'll allow the readers to take the ball here and run with it.

The New York Times crossword puzzle will never be something that I can completely solve every day without help from outside sources and in pen. And you know what? I'm OK with that. I am completely comfortable with deferring my success. In the meantime, I am perfectly happy sitting with my crossword while sipping a vanilla latte made with too much ice waiting for the clock to strike 7:35 a.m. so I can go to work. At least I know that when I finally do get to work, I'll have something else to think about while I file my charts and answer the phones.

Be a conscious reader

Michael Busack

It's conceivable that a school newspaper would have about as much hierarchy as a lemonade stand, and I suppose that in most cases this is near to the truth. At the University of Massachusetts however, the student body highly regards breaking down stereotypes, and it is time I do my part.

As Editor of the Daily Collegian I work a lot. Each day most of our staff (including a full news, graphics, business, advertising, circulation, and distribution staff) will spend the majority of their waking hours working diligently to produce what we believe to be a fair and accurate account of campus life. And in case you have heard differently, the pay doesn't nearly compensate the amount of work that is done each day. We work full-time jobs, to be paid a salary that most paperboys would giggle at. Ironic isn't it?

Each day most of our staff ... will spend the majority of their waking hours working to produce what we believe to be a fair and accurate account of campus life.

However, the one way that you can separate journalism from any other profession, is the amount of passion, pride, and sacrifice people in this industry put into their 9 to 5. We are students, all of us with full-time course loads and full-time jobs, actually many of us have a part-time job as well. Most of us have girlfriends and boyfriends, families and friends. We all have hard times, get worn out, and basically face the adversities that every college student does.

The one thing I have found troubling throughout my time doing this, is that the one source we as journalists and students look to for solace, or at least understanding of how hard we work is our peers. The disconcerting fact is however, that the students seem to be our biggest opposition. Day in and day out I receive e-mails and phone calls about the horrible job that our paper does in every area. I get numerous calls about how we are bias, unfair, uneducated, or that we have a hidden agenda. I am here, writing this column as a student, saying to you that this is not true.

As the beginning of a new year is finally here, I see opportunity for a fresh start for our staff and our readers. As a staff we pledge to work our hardest to bring you fresh, balanced, accurate, and relative news to the UMass community on a daily basis. We respect this community, an area rich in diversity and strong in values. We vow to promote productive criticism, facilitate conversation, and be your voice amidst a campus where it is sometimes easy to get lost. We promise that though we too are a diverse staff of different minds, beliefs and backgrounds, a good journalist checks their bias at the door, and we all strive to be good journalists. Besides, I think many of us haven't formed a solid agenda yet, let alone a hidden agenda.

With that being said, as a reader, please remember a few things as well...

Please remember, I don't have a degree yet, and neither does any of our staff members.

Take in to account that our publication is rare due to the fact that we are published daily, we rely on independent student produced funding for all of our subsidies, and we have a new, green staff each semester.

Consider that we are not perfect, nobody is really. The point of the Daily Collegian that gets lost in translation, is that this dusty office in the Campus Center basement is not just an office, it's our classroom. This is the venue that we as students have come to learn the many complicated facets of journalism. For this reason I expect mistakes because if we aren't learning now, what can we say for the future of journalism as a craft.

I still can actually remember the first time I ever tried to drive a car. In a stroke of pure brilliance, I decided to take a ride in my parents car while they were out at the store for a minute. I was 14, and to be honest, a little naive. I only went for a drive up and down my street, but when it came time to back the car back in my driveway, I confused which way to cut the wheel and I wound up with a car full of chimney. In the end, I had to learn the hard way, but it was a lesson that will stick with me forever.

Ever since that it seems clear that anything will come to you with hard work, but no difficult task will be achieved without making a few mistakes on the way, and no one can ever truly learn without being taught first. I hope you feel the same.

Within Islam, conflict and peace

Andrew Freeman

One of my first thoughts after Sept. 11 was that Americans would violently retaliate against Muslims and Arabs in our country. I found myself surprised at just how well Americans reacted ñ true, there were isolated instances of violence, and our government began to detain thousands of Muslims suspected of ties to terrorists. However, there was no systematic drive to demonize the Muslim community as a whole, which stands in stark contrast to the treatment of the Japanese after Pearl Harbor.

In large part, this stems from declarations by the government and throughout society that distinguished between the terrorists and ordinary Muslims, and that affirmed the latter would not support the former. The most prominent statement was that of President Bush: 'Islam is a religion of peace.' This analysis became almost a consensus in the country.

It is inaccurate to discuss any religion as one 'of peace.' The nature of religion leads directly into conflict ñ every religion holds that its ideology excels all others. Any religion that does not will ultimately lose its followers. Since your religion is ideologically superior to another's, then you might reasonably think that you are superior to them, leading you to persecute them. Persecution also occurs when one religious group attempts to suppress another that threatens to convert its followers. Religious warfare often arises from such persecution, and most religions permitted such wars in the name of preserving the faith.

Islam is no different — the Book of Jihad in the Hadith (sayings of Muhammad) details the concept of a defensive war against those who threaten the religion, and extols the virtue of martyrdom in such a war. The prophet Muhammad is quoted as saying "Nobody who finds good from Allah (in the Hereafter) would wish to come back to this world, even if he were given the whole world, except the martyr who, on seeing the superiority of martyrdom, would like to come back to the world and get killed again.'

Today, the world is filled with

The nature of religion leads directly into the conflict and every religion holds that its ideology excelis all others. Any religion that does not will ultimately lose its followers.

jihad, from Palestine and Israel to the insurgencies of Iraq and Afghanistan to the terrorist attacks in London. These conflicts are driven largely by modern Islamic fundamentalism. Islamic fundamentalists like Usama Bin Laden have taken jihad a step further, arguing that violence is necessary against both the soldiers and noncombatants of non-believers. Moreover, through the concept of takfir, any Muslim who disagrees with the fundamentalist is labeled a non-believer and potential enemy.

Some claim that, because of their deviations from more conventional Islam, fundamentalists like Usama bin Laden can no longer be considered Islamic. This is takfir in reverse ñ deviation from moderate Islam is un-Islamic. Unfortunately, whether Usama and his ilk should be considered Islamic is irrelevant, because there is widespread support for him throughout the Muslim world.

According to a July 14 study of seven Muslim nations by the Pew Research Center, confidence in Usama Bin Laden has declined since 2003. Nevertheless, in five of those countries, over 25 percent of those surveyed expressed 'some' or 'a lot' of confidence in Bin Laden to 'do the right thing' in world affairs. In Pakistan, where Bin Laden is suspected of hiding, 51 percent had some or a lot of confidence in him; in Jordan, the percentage was 60. Moreover, the study did not encompass Saudi Arabia, Syria, Iraq, Iran, Yemen or any of the Arabian emirates, all of which might show similar or higher levels of support for Bin Laden.

The vast majority of the people who showed confidence in Bin Laden will not join terrorist groups like Al Qaeda, but the small percentage that does is still a significant number. Moreover, popular approval for terrorism makes it more difficult for Muslim governments to act against it. Equally revealing is the tiny number of Muslim scholars who have come out against terrorism. The High Council of North America only recently issued a decree against terrorism, joining the Islamic Commission of Spain as the only major Muslim clerical groups to condemn Bin Laden.

Extremists like Usama Bin Laden are not particular to Islam, as the presence of violent, reactionary Christians in this country attests. What differs is that millions of ordinary Muslims approve of the actions of violent Islamic fundamentalists. This is a serious problem not only for the West, but also for Muslims, who stand to suffer the most from terrorism, as evidenced by the thousands of Iraqi civilians killed by suicide attacks. It is necessary for moderate Muslims to confront the voices of hate within their religion, rather than pretending they are not Muslim. And it is essential that we Americans recognize that Islam, like all religions, can be a force for conflict as well as peace.

Blair saw it coming but didn't care

Mike Sances

'Why do they hate us?' Unfortunately, all discussions of the events in London this summer have invariably begun here; the result is a flawed and largely trivial discussion, springing as it does from the presumption that the solution to terrorism can be found solely by dealing with 'why they hate us.'

The problem is we don't, even now, have much of an idea who 'they' are (or were, when they were still alive). Nor can we really say what motivated them to carry out these atrocities. And has democracy become so precarious that we now fail to distinguish between the public and the state?

Nitpicking aside, it's also far too narrow: what about, for example, the failure of the British government to protect its citizens? Why does Tony Blair hate Londoners so much that, not only will he not ride the Tube, or even visit any of the sites where the bombs went off, but that he would let this happen to them?

It would be bad enough if Blair was simply incompetent, if he simply had no idea what was coming, but the awful truth is that the Prime Minister did know, before the war began, that he would be increasing the threat of terrorism at home and around the world.

Despite warnings from his own intelligence agencies announced on the BBC in 2003 that the 'threat [posed by al Qaeda] would be heightened by military action against Iraq,' Blair chose to go ahead and wage the war anyway.

One of the best ways to end terrorism is to stop electing irresponsible leaders who knowingly escalate the threat, not only to their own citizens but no exaggeration in an age of nuclear weapons to existence as we know it.

That's not to say Blair wanted the bombers to strike; it is just that the safety of his own people takes a backseat to other priorities.

The same is true in the United States. In a March 2003 talk with reporters, American Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge echoed FBI sentiment, declaring it 'fairly predictable' stating that 'we can anticipate more noise in the system, more threats, because of a potential invasion.'

Prior to that, in October of 2002, the Director of the CIA said essentially the same thing, in a letter to Senator Bob Graham of Florida that was printed in part in the New York Times on Oct. 9, 2002.

One of the best ways to end terrorism is to stop electing irresponsible leaders who knowingly escalate the threat, not only to their own citizens but no exaggeration in an age of nuclear weapons to existence as we know it. And the best way to remember the victims of terrorism is to stop those same cynical persons from exploiting those tragedies.

In a democracy, it should be common sense that we first pay attention to those matters that we have some control over, namely the actions of leaders we elect.

As for the terrorists, they should be dealt with like the murderers that they are. Frankly, I don't care what motivated them to do what they did, or what they wanted to achieve. I don't care whether they want the British and American armies out of Iraq, like many here seem to assume, or if they want them to stay so that they can keep on killing, which is just as likely. In the war now so thoroughly exposed as a fraud, so obviously grounded on transparent falsehoods, that the only justification left is this perverse sort of reverse psychology, to 'stay the course' just to anger these murderous thugs?

Please. If you ask me, the war in Iraq is just as wrong even if no British or American citizens died just as the sanctions in Iraq were wrong long before Sept. 11, 2001 and just as the London bombings are utterly unjustifiable. The killing of innocent civilians is always a crime.

But, if it so happens that certain policies motivated the bombers, the answer is straightforward, and is moreover an open secret. Terrorists are simply incapable of carrying out attacks without a base of popular support. Terminate unjust policies, erode the base of support and defeat terrorism.

'There is no alternative except to crush them, wrote the editors of the London Financial Times (hardly a liberal rag) in May of 2005, 'but to do that successfully they must be separated from their widening constituency. Put another way, while only might destroy al-Qaeda, its expanding support base can be eroded only by policies Arabs and Muslims see as just.

It's not terrorism that needs to be appeased, but the general sentiment among the majority of Muslims: a climate of resentment that enables the violent minority.

If one cares what the terrorists want (which I don't), the real way to appease that minority would be to escalate the violence.

Lombardi's '250 Plan' to hire new professors

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will embark this semester upon a five-year plan to add 250 faculty members with more than $5 million from the Commonwealth, according to UMass Chancellor John Lombardi.

The '250 in five' plan is the University's solution to retain its stature as a nationally competitive public research university by hiring 250 faculty members within five years.

"The 250 plan is simply a statement of what UMass Amherst needs to do to bring its faculty strength up to a level of competitive institutions, both in terms of its teaching power and in terms of its research power," said Lombardi.

While Lombardi commended current faculty for their teaching and research efforts, he said more were needed to keep UMass competitive. "While we are doing very well meeting our teaching obligations, and while our faculty are remarkably productive in their research, we just do not have enough of them to compete effectively," said Lombardi.

A study conducted in 2004 by the Massachusetts Society of Professors shows that the number of tenure track professors has decreased from 1,113 in 1990 to 874 in 2005. With a limited number of tenure track professors on staff, over 40 percent of teaching was conducted by contingent workers last year at UMass.

According to Lombardi, the lack of faculty effects more than course selection and class size, it also limits the research capabilities of UMass.

Adding more faculty members to UMass has been a priority of Lombardi's throughout his tenure at UMass. He says the 250 in Five plan finally lays out a series of achievable steps toward that goal.

Town examining land use near Olympia Drive

By Alana Melanson
Collegian Staff

The town of Amherst has hired a landscape architecture firm to survey the property on Olympia Drive that was rezoned from fraternity residence to neighborhood residence land earlier this year.

The Berkshire Design Group, Inc., located in Northampton, will be completing a feasibility study over the coming months, according to Amherst Planning Board Interim Planning Director Jonathan Tucker. A company of landscape architects, civil engineers, and land surveyors, the Berkshire Design Group, will study the land in order to designate wetlands and determine its 'constraints and possibilities' for future use.

'We're currently only looking at the land and what can be done physically there,' Tucker said, noting that no specific plans have been made for the land as of yet.

The 27.59 acre lot located on the east end of Olympia Drive, close to the University of Massachusetts Admissions Office, Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity, and Chi Omega sorority, was rezoned by a unanimous vote on Article 18 of the Planning Board at the spring Town Meeting on May 2. This decision changed the designated use of the land from fraternity residence to neighborhood residence, leaving it open for assessment of possible use.

The property was seized by the town of Amherst through eminent domain to be used partly for permanent conservation land and partly for affordable housing. It is currently being managed only as conservation land.

The Zoning Subcommittee unanimously urged the Board to support the rezoning because they realized that a portion of the property had unintentionally been put into conservation status, when its original designation was for affordable housing, said Amherst Planning Board chair Paul Bobrowski. This mistake needed to be corrected in order to expedite any possible future plans for housing on the site.

There has been much talk over what the land could be used for in the past, but no action was ever taken. The University and the town discussed creating affordable housing geared towards UMass students on several occasions, but no definite plan was ever made and the issue had fallen by the wayside until recently.

While Amherst does have great need for more affordable and low income housing, the town may also need to consider the relationship between the tenants of both the fraternity housing and the affordable housing if they are to coexist on Olympia Drive in the future.

Should a contractor express an interest in developing the land once the Berkshire Design Group has finished assessing the

Hobart community split over land usage

By Alana Melanson
Collegian Staff

Residents of Hobart Lane and Rolling Ridge Road in North Amherst are having mixed feelings over what should be done with the land between their streets.

In fact, most residents are against the proposed plan to build a 250-unit apartment complex on the 14.9 acre plot of land located between these two dead end roads.

"I don't think it should be used for housing," says Melanie Fall, an inhabitant of Rolling Ridge Road for the past three years. "It would wreak havoc in the traffic patterns."

"If they build anything down there, there's no way to deal with the traffic it will cause. It would be terrible for this community, with all of the small children," Fall said. "People speed through here as it is."

Fall is not the only one who feels this way. When residents found out that the current owner of the property, the New Genesis Foundation, Inc., planned to sell the land to a Texas developer who wished to construct a new housing cluster mainly for college students, they became worried that the project would cause the connection of their streets to become more dangerous.

This would create a through road connecting North and East Pleasant Streets, making it a heavily traveled short cut that would increase traffic through these neighborhoods. They banded together and petitioned the Town Meeting to create a land use study committee.

The Ad Hoc Committee on North Amherst Land, composed of six town residents and five representatives from town boards and committees, has ten weeks to research the history of the land, determine the land value and its 'highest and best use,' and propose a possible plan of action. They are scheduled to submit a report of their findings at the fall Town Meeting in November.

The land, also known as 'the Locus,' was acquired by the New Genesis Foundation, a religious non-profit organization, in February 1992 with the intention of building a new church. The Hope Community Church would replace their existing church on Gaylord Street in Amherst.

After several property boundary disputes with neighbors on both roads, and a couple of trips to court, it was decided that the Massachusetts Land Court would rule on the issues at a later date. Nothing was done with the land until New Genesis entered into an Option Contract with JPI Development Services, L.P. of Irving, Texas.

Under this contract, JPI has the right

Professor uses sign language to teach students

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

While many people think of sign language as a tool used to aid people with a disability, a University of Massachusetts professor proves that this system of hand motions is a beneficial tool to teach science ñ even amongst the hearing world.

Michele Cooke, a geology professor, uses sign language to describe the visual elements of her geological studies to students. The focus of her research deals with Earth's natural features that cause fault lines that create devastating earthquakes to emerge.

'By using a spatial language, the student is more easily able to imagine the topics in three-dimensions,' Cooke says.

In this field, she says the written word lacks in description capabilities. Luckily, sign language has a competitive edge and fills the role.

Cooke has a moderate-to-severe degree hearing loss, which she acquired when she was an infant.

In her classes, Cooke does not just use sign language, and while she sometimes asks her students to speak up, she is able to participate fully in class with her ability to read lips, which she enjoys.

'The students adapt very quickly to the classroom style.'

However, throughout her research and one-on-one interactions with students, Cooke learned that it is often much easier to describe her work using hand motions. In addition, signing is a faster form of communication than talking.

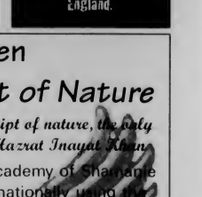
"Spoken language has redundancies so that you can be assured of understanding the meaning, even if a part of the sentence is missed," said Cooke.

However, the grammar of sign language does not allow for articles or 'to be' verbs. Hence, the amount of vocabulary needed is significantly lowered in the case of signing.

Although Cooke finds sign language an efficient form of communication, she notes that on a trip to England she "couldn't understand what the other people were signing."

This difficulty was due to the fact that, just as there are multiple spoken languages, many spoken languages correspond to a different form of sign language. Just as there are cognates in written vocabulary, American Sign Language is more similar to French Sign Language than to British Sign Language.

Using sign language allows an individual to gain a peek at deaf culture. While not all people with hearing disabilities consider themselves part of "deaf culture," or even disabled, many deaf children go to specialized boarding schools and also to the world renowned Gallaudet University in Washington DC. Deaf clubs and restaurants also exist in many metropolitan areas.



In addition, deaf culture encompasses more people than just the hard-of-hearing. Some youngsters are born into a family in which both parents are deaf, and grow up speaking sign language, the same way a child would grow up bilingually in an American home where another language was also spoken.

"They're part of the onion," Cooke explains.

Someone who lives in both worlds —the hearing world and the world of sign language —are part of one of the inner or outer layers of the onion that comprises deaf culture, she explains.

Sign Language was discovered by a French priest in the 1700's. As he walked through the slums of Paris, he came upon two deaf sisters who were using hand signals to communicate. The priest noticed that this form of communication was a viable language with grammar and structure, and he helped to further develop the system. His work opened the world to the hard-of-hearing, as it was previously thought that those who could not hear would never become participatory members of society.

For those interested in gaining a more intimate knowledge of sign language, all students are invited to join an already-established group that meets in the Blue Wall of the UMass Campus Center once a week. They encourage anyone interested to look for flyers for further information.

Cost overruns impede dorm construction

By Sara-Megan Walsh
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts broke ground this summer to build more dormitories near the Sylvan Residential Area, it cancelled plans to build more student housing near the Orchard Hill Residential Area.

The UMass Housing Office says the plans to build additional student housing near Orchard Hill were scrapped due to the iskyrocketingi costs of construction materials.

UMass put forth an $85 million proposal to build new dormitories for over 1,500 students in both residential areas last year. Since the plan was approved, inflation in the costs of both steel and oil have brought the price up to an estimated $90 million for just the first phase. This brings the total cost to almost $10,500 for each of the 864 beds being built, which is still only about half the original number planned for.

As a result of the cost overruns, UMass says the second phase of the project had to be cancelled. If "Phase Two" were completed, two new buildings would have been built on the wooded slope of Orchard Hill.

To keep costs from rising any further and keep the project costs down, building in Sylvan was put on the "fast track." The ground was broken this summer, before the final details of construction were even planned.

"The contractors are going ëgreat gunsí up there, and weíre going to keep moving as fast as we can," said James Cahill, director of facilities planning.

The construction of phase one, near Sylvan, is the first set of dormitories to be built on the UMass campus in over 20 years.

Eastman Lane and North Pleasant Street will border the new dormitories. The project plans to bring four new buildings of five floors each, for a total of roughly 400,000 square feet of new housing. The dorms will be built suite style, with each suite made up of four single apartments, a shared living room and kitchenette. There are also new pathways and 201 new parking spaces being built to accompany the dorms.

It will be the fastest, the quickest we have ever built anything on this campus. Its already under construction. Our goal is still to complete the 864 beds in phase one by September 2006,i said Cahill.

Students returning to their residences in Sylvan need to expect a few changes due to the construction.

"We're doing our best to keep the dust down, but noise will occur," said Cahill.

Contractors will be starting construction each morning at 7 a.m. Students in the buildings closest to the construction site can expect the noises of operating machinery and work crews, especially in the early construction phases.

"I imagine there are going to be some people aggravated by this, particularly early in the morning, but we need to get this done," said Cahill.

On top of noise disruptions, some old familiar pathways and parking spots are now within the construction area. New pathways and new lighting are expected to be complete before Labor Day move-in period.

"If people can just bear with us, its only going to be a year" said Cahill.

few minutes later.

While seeking the saliva sample from Johnston in hopes it will provide DNA evidence, First Assistant District Attorney Renee L. Steese indicated a trail of blood that stretched from the crime scene to Johnston's home in Westfield.

Steese told Judge Bertha D. Josephson that investigators recovered blood samples from the back of the Hadley police cruiser in which Johnston was sitting, inside his Lincoln Continental and on his clothes.

Reports also indicate a rifle belonging to Johnston was recovered in the woods near the Aqua Vitae restaurant.

Around 4 a.m. the morning of Dec. 7, Johnston telephoned his parents and told them he shot someone. Bruce and Joan Johnston immediately rushed to their son's apartment on Southwick Rd. and called police.

According to Rolling Stone magazine, Johnston punched Westfield Police Det. David Ragazzin' in the head when he and another detective tried to take him into custody. After his arrest, he was committed to a psychiatric hospital, the Noble Hospital of Westfield.

Steese says a hospital technician found blood on Johnston's hands and fingernails.

Since Johnston began his incarceration at the Hampshire County House of Correction in Northampton, he has been accused of assaulting two inmates. His attorney, Alexander Nappan dismisses the incidents.

"[He's] having a difficult time adjusting to jailhouse life," Nappan told Rolling Stone.

Johnston most recently attended school at Westfield State College, but also studied for a time at the University of Hawaii. Friends of Johnston say he got heavily involved in drugs and partying while he attended school there. He reportedly returned back to Massachusetts noticeably thinner.

Friends say that as he got deeply involved in drugs, he turned into a loose cannon. He was supposedly escorted out of a Westfield bar after threatening a patron with a gun. In another instance, he allegedly shot a gun at a bird after it defecated on his car.

Sullivan had a harder life than Johnston, friends say, but he completed more in school, work and relationships. He had a girlfriend for a few months before his death, he always had As and Bs in school and he often worked 12-hour shifts as a house painter after his father suffered a serious injury and could no longer work.

Johnston claims he was on steroids when he shot Sullivan. This will most likely be the center of his defense when he faces trial expression of how many faculty we need and why. It sets out a time line for achieving that growth, which is essential for our continued success, and it gives our friends in the legislature a reference point for the discussion,' Lombardi said. 'Since the state now has some revenue to spend, the 250 plan provides them with a road map for improving the institution.

The plan would call for about $130,000 for every new professor added, and states that increasing the budget by $30 million over the next five years is the most realistic way of paying for the required faculty additions.

Lombardi expects that as Massachusetts financial situation improves, their investment in the 250 in five plan will also increase.

"The legislature has approved a budget for this coming year that provides a first installment on the 250 plan, something on the order of five to six million," said Lombardi. "We expect that as the fiscal situation of the state improves, next year will be even better.

UMass Faculty Senate secretary Ernie May said the 250 in Five plan offers a sign of progress for a faculty whose efforts may have stalled in recent years due to budget restrictions.

May added that the addition of more faculty members would also help the University evolve by encouraging competition between departments.

to purchase the land up until January 26, 2007. However, JPI withdrew their request for a presentation to the Select Board at their August 22 meeting, in order to wait and hear what the land use committee recommends, and to 'meet with the neighbors and other interested parties to try to incorporate their concerns into our plans.'

JPI would like to design a lower-density version of the original project, in the hopes of making it more acceptable to the community.

Although the overwhelming majority of residents are upset about the project, not all feel the same way. Jeanne Ryan, who moved to Rolling Ridge Road from Brooklyn, N.Y., three years ago, wants to see the land used in a manner that is beneficial to everyone involved.

'I don't want to see this become a simple ëus versus themí situation,' Ryan said, mentioning that she did not want to be grouped in with those who oppose construction on the site. 'No one's going to get exactly what they want in this situation, but I think it's possible to reach a reasonable compromise, something that makes sense for everyone.'

The land use study committee will be holding public hearings throughout their study of the Locus so that concerned residents can voice their opinions over what should be done with the land.

300 students forced to live in local hotels

Roughly 2,400 juniors and seniors who met their housing deadlines will be able to remain living on campus.

16 percent of the freshman class will receive temporary housing arrangements when the fall semester begins. Of the 691 freshmen receiving temporary housing, 401 will live in residence hall lounges and 290 will stay in nearby hotels.

Last year, 570 temporary beds were created and 176 of them were in hotels.

Hotel rooms have been rented at the Campus Center hotel, The Lodge and Howard Johnsonís. Students housed in the hotels can generally expect to be live there for three to four weeks.

UMass Amherst News Office spokesman Patrick J. Callahan hopes that the on-campus housing situation isn't as bad as it looks.

To further help with these anticipated housing problems, the University has put out a special offer to students who currently reside on campus but live within 40 miles of home. This commuter package will offer them a $750 rebate on spring semester housing, a free parking permit, and a guaranteed on campus housing assignment for next semester.

The University needs to hear back from those who have cancelled their housing, are not intending on showing up, those freshman who leave and those taking advantage of its deals before being able to place everyone in a dorm of their own.

property, all construction plans will have to be approved by the town. The new housing, if and when it is built, will be aimed at college students, which includes graduate students with children who may also move into the housing cluster.

When asked about the possible consequences of placing these two greatly varying types of residencies in such close proximity, Tucker said, 'I don't it has to do with how it gets designed.'

"Potential conflicts can be overcome by design and placement," he said, adding that the property assessment will take these factors into consideration.

of UMass to demand a fair contract from the University. The large crowd is the biggest at a UMass rally protest in years is matched through various crosswalks on North Pleasant St. and Massachusetts Ave. bringing traffic to a standstill. The marchers walked through the Whitmore Administration building and delivered several hundred letters to Chancellor John Lombardi in support of GEO's demands.

GEO officials also co-sponsored a shutdown of UMass Amherst campus classes April 22, and threatened to picket UMass President Jack Wilson's inauguration, in front of U.S. Sen. Ted Kennedy (D. Mass.), earlier this year.

The contract disputes stem from the attempts of UMass officials to lower GEO wages and raise the costs of healthcare and childcare.

According to Jed Murr, Vice Predisent of GEO, The Boston Globe and other publications have reported recently, that there has been a dramatic decline in tenured-track faculty members at UMass.

"As there are less and less tenured-track faculty, the University looks towards other groups to perform to carry out the labor, such as adjunct faculty members and graduate student employees. So if they can pay us less it saves them financially," said Murr. "And these cuts have nothing to do with the state-wide budget cuts. Our research shows they can afford to pay us fair wages, they can afford to give us free healthcare, and they can afford to give us affordable childcare."

In the new agreement, all Continuing Education wage scales will be increased by five percent beginning in fall of 2005 and by four percent in the fall of 2006. GEO member stipends will have an annual increase of two percent.

GEO's Health and Welfare funds will now cover the costs of everyone at the two lowest income levels so that they experience a childcare cost of $0. Current advertised rates of $0 and $1 increase to $1 and $2 per hour. Health and Welfare funds will maintain those who currently pay nothing and reduce costs for those who currently pay $1 per hour to $0.

Hundreds of students rallied last year in support of getting the proposed GEO contracts approved.

UMass vanity plates take the street

'Summer is a slow time. We feel very sure that once all the students are back and everyone is back to our normal lives, things will pick up,' Geso said.

A law passed in the Massachusetts Legislature in 2002 that allowed UMass to create these special plates. Before 2002, only the Environmental Trust Fund, otherwise recognized by the whale tail plate, and Child Care Quality Fund were allowed to have special plates with exceptions made for the Olympics and September 11th Fund.

After the new law was passed, the Legislature opened up the law for several new charities, including the Red Sox Jimmy Fund and the UMass Scholarship Fund for their benefit license plates. Currently the most popular special plate is the new New England Patriots license plate, according to Phillys Burk of the Registry of Motor Vehicles, who has been working with UMass on the license plates since May.

The question on everyone's minds: Once the UMass plates go into production, will they become the most popular?

"We'd like to see twenty or thirty thousand plates," Geso said, but that's not the goal. She would be happy to see "as many as we can get."

Citing that many state universities also have similar license plates in their own state, Geso believes that this will be a success, if not the most popular. But, to her, there is more to it than just money.

"Pride," Geso said. "It's a great way for alumni, students, faculty, and staff to feel pride. It's visibility [for UMass]."

First, however, the Alumni Association must collect signatures and checks for the first 1,500 plates. They are taking orders for numbers 101 through 1,600 via a downloadable form from their website, or an application available in the office located in Memorial Hall. Once 1,500 are in, the Registry of Motor Vehicles will take over the selling. Meanwhile, the Alumni Association will auction off numbers one through 100 and graduation years starting from 1940, and of course, year 1863. The date of the auction has yet to be set.

According to Geso, the other UMass campuses do not have plans in the works for their own license plate. If they were to create one, they would be able to change the logo but the UM would stay the same.

Are there more license plates in the works for UMass Alumni and friends in other states? "Once we get the Commonwealth plate rolling, we might explore other alumni plates," Geso said. But, 'our focus right now is getting the 1,500.'

If you or someone you know is interested in these new plates, make sure to download an application or pick one up at the Alumni Association office. Or, if you prefer to sport UM-1863 on your car, watch out for the license plate auction.

Gov. Romney vows to give UMass funds

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney made a stop at the University of Massachusetts School of Management Aug. 22 to discuss the importance of science and mathematics programs and to announce how $80 million in state funding would be implemented to the University. The formal discussion included Romney, several school officials and members of the press.

Gov. Mitt Romney (R. Mass.) said there is a $400 million surplus in the state's budget for the 2005-2006 fiscal year and would like to see $80 million of that money to go UMass Amherst. The proposal, which was announced in his "Capital Plan" July 19, is pending approval by the state legislature.

Of the $80 million, $20 million would fund the construction of an integrated science building and $60 million would fund a new Physical Plant.

UMass President Jack Wilson and UMass Amherst Chancellor John Lombardi both expressed support for the proposal.

One of Romney's main concerns is keeping Massachusetts competitive in the science and technological sectors, which he believes is the core to the state's economy.

"Our advantage is waning as companies from Asia move into this area," Romney said. "Asian countries have five times more engineering graduates than we do."

Romney also expressed interest in forming partnerships between state universities and private companies. He hoped to form ways for private industries to help supply resources to universities, while the universities could help provide a future job force.

Many of Romney's statements were echoed by UMass faculty members who attended the event, including microbiology professor Derek Lovley, who explained that one of his recent discoveries came out of a UMass laboratory.

Lovley and his fellow researchers discovered that microorganisms can be converted into electricity.

Biology professor Brian O'Connor explained that many undergraduate pre-medical students often do not fulfill their goals of going to medical school. Instead, they go into fields such as laboratory research and engineering through companies in Massachusetts.

He agrees with Romney's point that it's important to keep these types of students within Mass. to help the economy.

Gov. Mitt Romney visited UMass with hopes to see about $80 million go to the school.

Another key point Romney made at the event is the importance for schools to have higher standards for teaching mathematics and sciences. He cited the mandatory Massachusetts Comprehensive Assesment System (MCAS) tests, which only tests tenth graders on eighth grade-level mathematics.

'We have to do better,' said Lombardi in a subtle tone in response to Romney's MCAS comment.

"We have enough English and liberal arts majors," said Romney, who was an English major himself. "Our jobs in Massachusetts increasingly benefit from science and math skills."

Romney also claimed 93 percent of all middle school math and science teachers never received a degree in the fields that they now teach.

"They're teaching their students not to go into these fields," Romney said.

Romney says above all his plans, he seeks advice from faculty members at UMass for the best way to achieve his goals.

"I come here to find what we need to do better in terms of higher education," said Romney.

New library director announced

Gerald Schafer is the new director of libraries at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, ending a national search for a permanent director.

Schafer was appointed by Charlena M. Seymour, provost and senior vice chancellor for academic affairs at UMass.

Promoted from within, Schafer began working for the UMass library system in 2000, acting as coordinator of collection development.

This postion had Schafer working closely with the library director to control expenditures as the library faced cut backs beginning in the fall of 2001. Schafer was promoted in 2002 to associate director for content acquisions and access, a position that required Schafer to oversee numerous facets of the library's operations including acquisitions, circulation, reserves and web development

Schafer has served as interim director since January 2004.

'Jay Schafer has worked in various key roles within the library and knows its internal workings,' Seymour said. 'He also has the enthusiastic support of his staff, along with the necessary management skills and vision to bring our libraries back from a period marked by budget restraints and staff reductions."

Schafer has said that he is "honored" by the support has received from the library staff during the selection process and indicated that the decision to bring him on as the permanent director of libraries at UMass will allow him to continue transformative measures he began as interim director.

Schafer has already reorganized departmental managment procedures in the UMass library, creating an environment that relies on a centralized staff council and the shared governance among departmental managers and administrators.

Schafer has also launched a three-year strategic-action plan aimed at promoting the library's diversity and maintaining a high level or quality of the library system's service.

Schafer, who has worked in libraries across the country since 1971, earned his bachelor's degree in English at the University of Texas at El Paso in 1971 and completed his master's degree in librarianship from the University of Denver in 1973.

SUMMER OF ROCK

Jamband lovers flock to Bonnaroo

By Jana Katz
Collegian Staff

"Bonnaroo is simply a music festival," said OARBOY. "And in those two words," he continued, "music is indefinable. For me, Bonnaroo is an opportunity."

Like a sensory buffet, Bonnaroo offered an endless variety of fresh hot experiences. From June 19 to 21, 90,000 people gathered under Tennessee skies just southeast of Manchester for the 2005 Bonnaroo Music and Arts festival, creating the sixth largest city in the state. Over 100 musical acts played from just before noon into the wee morning hours each night. An arcade, a batting cage, a comedy tent, and an air-conditioned movie tent created constant reverie in the temporary town.

Music scene icons in a variety of genres performed next to nameless musicians. Dave Mathews Band and Widespread Panic headlined the festival weekend. Acts like John Prine and Old Crow Medicine Show served up heaping piles of finger-picking bluegrass with a side of agreeable harmonies. Jurassic 5's radiating beats reached the swings on the playground and left them grooving together. Trey Anastasio's late night set included the Hassidic Reggae superstar, Matisyahu.

Australian native, Xavier Rudd, a festival newcomer, left an intimate crowd of loyal followers and curious onlookers mesmerized after a brief set at the Sonic Stage. Sponsored by XM Radio, The Sonic Stage provided attendees with an opportunity to catch big names perform brief sets in a small setting. Visually, Rudd is as original as he sounds; he plays with three yadakis (the traditional name for a didgeridoo, according to Rudd). His solos on the yadaki burst into each song like rhythmic thunder; they are both stunning and invigorating. His signature upbeat timbre and lively melodies compliment his pensive lyrics in songs off his latest album, Solace. In "Let Me Be" he sang, "Time and time we see these acts against humanity/ each for each and each will bleed/

Ozzfest returns

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

On July 15, 2005, the sweltering heat of a New England summer sun set the scene for the annual sonic inferno known as the Ozzfest. A sold-out crowd of metal-heads made the trek to the increasingly popular music festival this year at Mansfield, Massachusett's Tweeter Center. Old and young alike waited eagerly for the gates to spring open at 8:30 a.m., sporting a variety of band t-shirts spanning across several decades.

The first to enter quickly rushed to get stage side standing places at the second stage. Within minutes a loose crowd had begun to form as an unfamiliar act took the stage. The formerly unheard of Wicked Wisdom attempted to stir the loosely formed crowd to no avail. The novelties of seeing vocalist, Jada Pinkette Smith perform at this notorious extreme music festival seemed to quickly lose the interest of the crowd. Exhibiting a bold amount of class for a Massachusetts crowd however, the boos were kept to a minimum.

Sweden's Soilwork paid no heed to their early set time; instead, stirring the yawning masses into a frenzy with their energizing display of Gothenburg metal. This time around the negative response from the audience was not for the performance but the short time that the band was afforded on the bill.

Fans weren't even given a chance to mourn Soilwork's departure before fellow Swedish metallers, Arch Enemy massacred the morning. Taking no prisoners, guitar legend Michael Amott combined frets with tour guitarist Gus G, invoking a non-stop array of the band's signature dual guitar assaults. Vocalist, Angela Gossow complemented the chaos by displaying her uncanny death growls for the eager crowd.

Keeping up the intensity, Florida's, Trivium and Michigan's, The Black Dahlia Murder blazed through their short sets leaving behind a trail of tired yet satisfied fans. The heat bore down on both the musicians and the fans without prejudice. While the members of Trivium elected to maintain their usual black slacks and black shirts, the Black Dahlia

Coldplay kicks off tour in Hartford

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Caravans, be it large groups of people walking with their lawn chairs and blankets or the vehicle made by Dodge, poured into the Dodge Music Center, formerly the Meadows Music Theater. Street vendors, some legal and some not, sold their wares on the sidewalks, offering everything from cheaper tour shirts to bottled water.

The heat was unbearable, one might think they were in the Sahara or at least a tropical climate, but this was Hartford, not a place one would expect such intolerable weather or to see Britain's biggest band Coldplay kick off the American leg of their 'Twisted Logic' tour. Their latest tour will take them to venues across the country, including outdoor amphitheatres like Boston's Tweeter Center and indoor arenas like New York's Madison Square Garden.

Fans waited for hours for a band to take the stage, thinking that they would be treated to Zeppelinesque opener Black Mountain. However that was not to be the case, as Black Mountain were held at the Canadian border for reasons unmentioned, but a short 20 minute acoustic set was played by one of the members.

Coldplay are at the top of their game with this summer's release of their third studio album, 'X&Y.' Their first single, 'Speed of Sound,' was a chart-topper featuring a very similar sound to 'Clocks' off of their previous album, 'A Rush of Blood to the Head.' Their second single, 'Fix You,' a track which lead singer Chris Martin says is 'the best song we've ever written' is sure to be as successful as their first single, if not their most popular song to date. 'Talk,' a track that borrows (with permission) a riff from techno-pioneers Kraftwerk's 'Computer Love' has become a favorite of diehard fans.

The band has managed to do something many have failed at when trying- they are able to bring in a crowd of mainstream radio listeners as well as indie-rockers who prefer to remain underground. Whether one has come to hear 'Yellow,' 'Clocks,' or 'Talk,' they won't be disappointed.

Coldplay has catered to both crowds as well- a

Fall Fine Arts Preview

By Joe Pedrafite
Collegian Staff

The leaves are changing, the air is getting a little bit cooler and the UMass campus is slowly starting to wake up from its summer slumber. That must mean that a new school year is about to begin, and as you settle into your new routine of the semester for the first or seventh time, why not take a break with some of the outstanding performances that are going to be offered on campus throughout the semester.

The Fine Arts Center is celebrating its 30 anniversary this year, so you can expect a jam-packed season that will offer something for everyone to enjoy. The center series kicks off this year with the 2005 Grammy Award-winning Spanish Harlem Orchestra on Thursday Oct. 6, and follows up a couple weeks later with the famed Martha Graham Dance Company on Oct. 19.

Athol Fugard's "Master Harold" sets up shop for one performance only at Bowker Auditorium on Tuesday Nov. 1. Two days later, the Lark String Quartet brings its 20 anniversary tour to Bowker on Nov. 3. The acrobatic sensation CHI from Shanghai triumphantly returns to the Concert Hall after a sold out engagement two years ago on Nov. 9. The Center series concludes in the fall with not to be missed performance from Arlo Guthrie. Guthrie brings his "40th Anniversary Massacre Tour" to the Concert Hall on Nov. 17. In addition to his infamous "Alice's Restaurant," he'll be performing a slew of other favorites, including "the motorcycle song" and "Coming to Los Angeles."

The cold New England winter will heat up in February, when the concert series offers two sizzling events; the Bill T. Jones/Arnie Zane Dance Company's exciting new piece, "Blind Date" on Feb. 2, and the world famous "Flying Karamazov Brothers" fly into the Concert hall on Feb. 10. At the end of the month, the Helikon Opera Company from Moscow brings "Die Fledermaus," considered by many to be one of the greatest Austrian operas ever written, to Amherst on Wednesday, Feb. 15.

Two up and coming musicians arrive at UMass this spring; accomplished pianist Jonathan Biss pays a visit to Bowker Auditorium on Mar. 9, and on Apr. 6, Jason Moran will tickle the ivories at Bowker, Saturday, Mar. 11 at the Concert Hall, the Maria Schneider Orchestra (2005 Grammy winner for Best Large Jazz Ensemble) is set for an all day event in connection with the department of Music and Dance. That night, the orchestra will unveil a brand new piece specially commissioned for the Fine Arts Center's 30 anniversary. Finally, the Center series comes to a close on Apr. 26 with "Children of Uganda," an extremely talented group of children ranging from ages 8-18, who are sure fill the concert hall with inspiring and prolific African music and dance.

As a UMass student, these events are available to you for as little as $5, and occasionally the events are free. In addition to the Center Series, there are a variety of other events going on all year at the Fine Arts Center, including the Asian Arts and Culture series, the New World Theater and Magic Triangle series, as well as numerous solo and duet performances. Check out fineartscenter.com for more information about any of the events, and information on how to get tickets.

In addition to the events at the Fine Arts Center, the UMass Theatre department is also gearing up for an exciting season. Coming off the hugely successful production of "Angels in America" last spring, the department kicks off the semester in October with "Gum" by Karen Hartman at the Curtain Theater. In December, the department will present Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz's "House of Desire" in the Rand Theater.

Spring will bring two classic productions to UMass. George Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man" in March at the Curtain. April will bring the granddaddy of all tragedies to campus when the department presents William Shakespeare's classic "Romeo and Juliet". The theater department will close out the academic year on May 13 with their annual "Play-in-a-Day" festival to help renovate the Rand Theater. The annual "Play-in-a-Day" is an extravaganza where an entire play is written, cast, rehearsed and produced in, you guessed it, a 24 hour period. The Theater department has always been successful with their "Play-in-a-Day" event, and this year should prove to be no different.

If you're looking for some old-fashioned Broadway song and dance, fear not my friends, UMass is the place to be. This year introduces the brand spanking-new "Broadway in Amherst" series to the Pioneer Valley. The inaugural debut, which plays at the Mullins Center, boasts three marquee musicals for its freshman season. Up first is the 2001 Tony award winning musical for people who love musicals, "42nd Street." Come and meet those dancing feet and shuffle off to Buffalo on Sunday, Sept. 25 at 7:30 p.m. Following those toe-tapping dancers into Mullins on Wednesday Oct. 12 is the Tony award winning epic "Miss Saigon." Set against the backdrop of the Vietnam War, "Miss Saigon" promises to sweep audiences up in its unparalleled story of love and loss. Oh yeah, and a giant helicopter descends on the stage too. If beautiful chorus girls and singing G.I.'s don't do it for you, then maybe singing and dancing felines do. The 1983 Best Musical award winner and the longest running musical in history (not for too much longer though, "The Phantom of the Opera" is poised to reign in January 2006), "Cats" slinks onto the Mullins stage on Apr. 28, 2006. Andrew Lloyd Webber's adaptation of T.S. Elliot's poems is sure to be a crowd favorite. You can see all three of these shows for as little as $100, (about $33 a piece), so contact the Mullins Center box office to get your tickets.

For those Broadway babies who are looking for something else, you need look no further than Hartford and Boston for some of the very best in contemporary theater. The Lincoln Financial Broadway Series at the Bushnell in Hartford, CT boasts no fewer than seven Broadway shows in its season. At the middle of the series are two exclusive Connecticut premieres. The current Tony Award winning Broadway smash "Wicked" flies into Harford for a two week engagement just in time for Christmas. Set in the Land of Oz just before Dorothy dropped in, "Wicked" tells the "untold" story of Elphaba, who will go on to live in infamy as the Wicked Witch of the west. Later in the spring, the 1998 Best Musical winner "The Lion King" leaps onto the Bushnell stage for a two month engagement starting on Mar. 21, 2006. Considered by many to be one of the most spectacular productions ever staged, "The Lion King" returns to New England after a sold out eight month engagement in Boston in 2004.

In addition to "Wicked" and "The Lion King," The Bushnell will also play host to a brand new touring production

Black releases new solo album

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Riding high on the recent Pixies reunion, Frank Black finally had the opportunity and financial success to rest on his laurels and sit and watch the money roll in. Black, however, is a hardworking man and his newest solo release, "Honeycomb" further maintains that image while taking Black's music in a new direction.

When the UMass alum first moved from The Pixies to solo album territory, his songs seemed to grow from a natural progression of the music The Pixies made. When Black joined up with a new backing band dubbed The Catholics, in the late '90s the sound gradually started to incorporate older rock 'n' roll, soul and even country influences.

For "Honeycomb" Black flew down to Nashville and recorded with legendary studio musicians in hopes of channeling a more classic R&B inflected sound. Black certainly succeeded. "Honeycomb" sounds like nothing else in Black's catalogue but between his distinctive voice (which is still getting better every album) and the fact that his songwriting has been growing in this direction for almost a decade the album does not feel nearly as different as one might expect. In fact this album does feel like an appropriate follow-up, though certainly not a sequel in any respect, to 2003's outstanding "Show Me Your Tears." Of course there is nothing wrong with that, while Black and his players have a few new tricks up their sleeves, "Honeycomb" relies heavily on Black's great songwriting.

The opening track, "Selkie Bride," is haunting and instantly memorable and sets the tone for the rest of the album, while the closer "Sing For Joy" is possibly the strongest song on the set. The album's title track isn't necessarily one of the best but between Black's hushed voice and the muted guitars, with only a few notes here and there sneaking out, it certainly stands out. There are a few tracks that aren't as strong as others but "Honeycomb" is generally a consistently strong listen. Black sounds like he is challenging himself as a musician and his lyrics are less bizarre and more personal then usual but the songs themselves are not as dynamically different from each other then on most of his albums. However there is no mistaking "Honeycomb" for anything less then ambitious and Black's name is sonically stamped all over it. People that have only heard The Pixies are in for a shock, though hopefully a pleasant one, but those familiar with Black's solo work should have no problem putting "Honeycomb" next to all their favorite Black albums.

Malkmus speaks the 'Truth'

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

It is either really great or really hard to be Stephen Malkmus. Sure, for over 10 years he was the leader of influential indie-rock darlings Pavement, but now he can never separate himself from their daunting legacy. Yes, people constantly call him a genius but he constantly has to live up to it, and of course he is best known for being creative, clever, and cool, but Malkmus is only human and what type of human can be all of those things all the time? Not too mention Malkmus is a new father, and what kind of father can be a hip and hard-working rocker?

All those conflicts are instantly put into perspective in the opening lines of "Pencil Rot," the first track off of Malkmus' third solo album, "Face The Truth." Who can worry about legacies and being cool when you have bigger issues to deal with? Over a retro-futuristic synth line Malkmus instantly announces, "There's a villain in my head — his name is Leather McWhip and he needs to be stopped." Once Malkmus deals with that nasty character all the previous issues come back into focus and it seems pretty clear — it must be pretty great to be Stephen Malkmus.

"Face The Truth" is, from start to end, quintessential Malkmus brilliance. Lyrically Malkmus is as witty as ever. "We can share our bland opinions about the quality of air," he deadpans in "It Kills." In "Freeze The Saints" he, perhaps unintentionally, slams everyone that's tried mimic his songwriting, "done is good' but done well is so much fing better".

Musically, Malkmus continues to grow. Where his last album "Pig Lib" was full of show-off musicianship it lacked the personality that Malkmus is known for and, while it contained some great songs, it often felt cold. The instruments and production on "Face the Truth" all go out of their way to sound warm and comforting. Which isn't to say the songs aren't challenging. Malkmus is still no modern-rock sweetheart and his quirks are even more developed. "Loud Cloud Crowd" opens with a dreamy arpeggiation with thunderous feedback underneath it before exploding into a moment of pure pop bliss. "No More Shoes" is the relaxed jam that "Pig Lib"s "1% of One" should have been. "Baby C'mon" is a rousing rocker, and the falsetto vocals alone in "Mama" make it one of Malkmus' strongest tracks.

It's very clear throughout "Face The Truth" that Malkmus is only concerned with making a great album; and he sounds more relaxed then he has in years. But there is no mistaking that for complacency. Malkmus is challenging himself and the audience as much as ever and "Face The Truth" is both immediately excellent and the type of album that becomes more rewarding with each listen.

A taste of Southern Europe

By Amy Forni

Viva, The Fresh Pasta Bistro, cozily warms the street corners of Main and Masonic in Northampton. For twenty years, owners Paul Milani and Christine Buchholz's motto has been, 'Grab life by the knife and fork.' Originally a fresh pasta making Italian Deli, The Fresh Pasta Bistro expanded into a well-established, unique, eatery with a flare for Spanish, French, and Italian cuisine.

The split-level restaurant offers a New York City appeal with glossy booths lining the walls and small, intimate tables. Large windows brighten the upper level and a clean, fresh, ambiance shines through the glass. A narrow staircase leads hungry visitors to a uniquely adorned lower level dining area. Burnt yellow walls generate a warm, calm aura. The walls are decorated with framed oil paintings, and stone vases holding vibrant bouquets accessorize countertops. Stone-hedged and worn brick walls hug two large, family-style booths. Stylish, azure drop-lights hang from the low ceiling emitting a modern, mellow appeal. The glass-covered tables are simply set with the essentials: salt and pepper, and coincide with the clean, uncluttered atmosphere.

Soft music does not disrupt conversations and the friendly, knowledgeable wait-staff contribute to the comfort of dining at Viva. The menu begins with appetizers and light fares ranging from $3.95 to $7.95 and includes delicacies such as wild mushroom flatbread, jerk chicken tenderloins with roasted red pepper dipping sauce, and an assortment of flatbreads like spinach and brie or ricotta cheese and roasted red pepper. Colorful salads, such as the house garden at $5.95 and sauteed spinach at $9.00, compliment their hearty steak soup or homemade soup of the day. Cool off during these last summer days by indulging in Viva's classic chilled vegetable soup made with tomatoes, cucumbers, peppers, onions, and garlic.

Viva's lavish sandwiches and wraps are served Monday through Friday from 11:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. and range from $5.95 to $7.95. Try the grilled smoked turkey breast in a warm foccaccia wrap or fill your belly with eggplant parmesan or the veggie lover's wrap. Wine and dine for supper and choose from specialty Southern European and homemade pasta entrees served generously on porcelain dishes. Treat yourself to savory grilled salmon and spinach or tempting pesto chicken with asparagus and Parmesan. Freshly prepared sea scallops dijonaisse and grilled tuna steak with a garlic-pepper sauce will melt anyone's pallet. Modestly priced meals begin at $8.95.

Still hungry? Save room for Viva's sweet tooth remedy of delicately prepared crepes and desserts. You do not have to be Italian to crave a cannoli prepared Viva-style and dipped in your choice of shaved chocolate or chopped roasted almonds, or tiramisu made with creamy layers of espresso-soaked ladyfingers and custard-like mascarpone cheese.

Viva offers specials daily, inimitable, affordable meals, and a setting appealing to all genres. The restaurant prepares fresh, health-conscious dishes that satisfy vegetarians, meat, and seafood lovers, as well as low-carb dieters. You can personalize your entree and choose from a variety of pasta specials of the day including egg linguine, tomato basil fettuccine, and sweet potato or artichoke heart ravioli. Viva consistently prepares every dish with an array of flavor combinations such as sauteed sea scallops with a mango-pineapple salsa, served on risotto with grilled asparagus and spinach. Or try the Prince Edward Island mussels sauteed in a vermouth-butter sauce with garlic, herbs, red onions and tomatoes.

Viva offers daily $5.95 lunch specials such as meat or spinach lasagna with a side salad. The eatery wants their diners to enjoy their meals as a going out experience, but also in the comfort of their own home. Fill your tummies in your favorite chair by ordering from Viva online. And if you have a flair for the kitchen, or crave pasta, pasta, and more pasta, Viva provides retail pasta, ravioli, tortellini, and sauces for your convenience. Visit Viva and give your taste buds a treat.

Viva is located on 249 Main Street Northampton, MA 01060. Call for take-out, a gift certificate, or more information at 413-586-5875 or visit their Web site, freshpastabistro.com. Bon appetite!

Broadway lands at the Mullins of the Lerner and Lowe classic "My Fair Lady" in September, the American premiere of "Doctor Doolittle" in November, and the new musical "The Rat Pack: Live From Las Vegas" direct from London will be seen in October. Valerie Harper will portray the prolific Golda Meir in the direct from Broadway sensation "Golda's Balcony" in March, and the Broadway series closes in June with the Connecticut premiere of "Brooklyn" in June. Check out http://www.bushnell.org for more show information and ticketing.

And if you still have a hankering for even more, Boston has hit the Broadway jackpot, with not one, not two but three blockbuster productions scheduled for its 2005-2006 Broadway in Boston Series. "Wicked" will follow its Hartford engagement with a six week run at the Opera House in April and the national tour of last seasons sensation "Spamalot" will launch its national tour at the Colonial theater in March. This fall, Billy Crystal will bring his Tony Award winning smash "700 Sundays" to the Hub for a limited two week run at the Colonial Theater starting Oct. 18. The title comes from the number of Sundays Crystal spent with his father who died when he was a teenager.

In addition to those three giants, the Bay State will see two new shows, "Little Women," direct from Broadway starring Maureen McGovern, and Hal Linden stars in the stage adaptation of "Tuesdays with Morrie." Beantown will also play host to the pre-Broadway engagement of comic Martin Short's new show, "If I'd Saved, I Wouldn't be Here" at the Colonial Theater in October. "Hairspray," "Annie," "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat," "Les Miserables" and "Movin Out" will all make triumphant returns to Boston after previous sell out engagements, and the ground-breaking 10 anniversary production of Matthew Bourne's "Swan Lake" hits the Colonial in April. The annual Boston Ballet production of the holiday classic "The Nutcracker" will also be presented at the Opera House this Christmas.

Being a student, $25 rush tickets are available to most of the shows in the Broadway in Boston series. They're available in person at the box office 1 hour before the performance. All you need is your UMass ID and $25 cash. It's a great, relatively inexpensive way to be treated to a type of performance that you can't see anywhere else. Multiple show subscriptions are also available, and you can visit http://www.broadwayinboston.com for more information about them.

Clearly, if you're a fan of theater or any kind of live entertainment, this year is going to be extremely busy and plentiful in its options of what you can take in. The best part? You don't even have to leave campus to see most of them. If you've never been to the opera before, spend the $7 and check out "Die Fledermaus" in March at the Fine Arts Center. Not sure if you'd like to spend a night at the ballet? Take $25, jump on the Pike with a friend and head to Boston to see "Swan Lake." Never been to a Broadway musical? Save $22.50 and hop in the car and head down to Hartford in the spring and see "The Lion King." I promise you won't be disappointed. Think of it as a new year, new semester resolution; try something that you haven't before. Get out there, go see a show. Who knows, you just might end up liking it.

The ten best movies to hit theaters the summer of 2005

By Jake Monte

It's been said that sitting in a movie theater is different than watching a film at home because the entire audience exists as a single entity; there is what is called a "community of emotion." We're all in it together; I'm feeling it; you're feeling it; and the fact that all two hundred plus of us or so are feeling it as one heightened the emotional impact for each of us. It is this charged room that makes us cringe when Buffalo Bill looks at Clarice Starling through his night vision goggles and reaches out to touch her shoulder. And when someone in the front row gasps we all feel that persons fear, or surprise, or happiness, or sadness, or disappointment.

Looking at my list of the summers ten best films proves one thing for sure: in order for us movie-goers to experience that "community of emotion" that we treasure, we have to feel for the characters on screen. The only way this is possible is if the characters remind us of parts of ourselves or of our own humanness. As simple and obvious as this sounds, the people in Hollywood still don't get it. It is for this reason that we had to sit through eye candy all summer like "Fantastic Four" and "Bewitched." Time and time again the films that show us characters we feel for open up to decent first weekends and as word of mouth spreads they go through the roof with ticket sales. As much as I would like to believe that's always the case however, it simply isn't. There are plenty of tragedies in the film making world: good films that just aren't seen. "Cinderella Man" (the third movie on my list) was doing so poorly at the box office some theaters offered to give refunds to any disappointed patrons. Everyone knew it was a great movie, but people simply didn't see it.

Here, in no particular order, are my picks for the ten best films of the summer.

"Star Wars, Episode Three." This was the least anticipated "Star Wars" movie since the days when everyone though the force was something they learned about in physics class and it still broke records. Don't be discouraged. George Lucas still has some of the force in him. "Star Wars Episode Three" is a high stakes human drama, not a light show like the last two movies. The first twenty minutes will have you recalling your repressed memories of Episode One and Two: cardboard characters, stupid actions sequences, computer generated robots that fall to pieces like paper, but then the movie picks up it's pace and before long you'll find yourself unable to deny your interest. There is such a contrast between this film and the last two that it expressly proves my point: character is what makes good movies tick. Anakins seduction to the dark side of the force is so genuine that you'll forget it's a film. Lucas has shown us what we've been missing; a real story.

You might find it hard to believe you could find the same thing in a film about penguins. But "March of the Penguins" is thoroughly captivating. I'm of the opinion that when is comes to appreciating other species, humans are blind with arrogance. This is film that can bury that arrogance under a sea of compassion for animals and how similar they are to us. The average penguin can hold it's breath under water for up to fifteen minutes and goes without food and water for up to four months to protect their young. These are just two of the amazing facts that will inspire awe in you as you watch the mating rituals of penguins in the harshest environment on earth. If a film about penguins can make us this interested we must wonder why. The answer is that we love to view humanity and we see humanity in these penguins. At heart, "March of the Penguins" is a love story.

You'll never feel poor again after you see "Cinderella Man" which is about a boxer and his family living through the Great Depression. Directed by Ron Howard, "Cinderella Man" is a film that makes no secret of its desire to pull at your heartstrings. But it works. The depiction of poverty, desperation, and one families love, is so real that it never crosses the line into being corny, and instead keeps you enthralled. Russell Crowe's performance is phenomenal. Renee Zellwegger is a little uneven, but often very impressive. Not quite good enough for a Best Picture Oscar, but nonetheless a truly excellent film.

My next pick came out a little before our summer began, but I loved it too much to ignore it. "Sin City" is based on the comic by Frank Miller. It's an all-star cast that includes main leads such as Bruce Willis, Clive Owen, and Mickey Rourke. Shot in black and white with color sprinkled throughout, it is a film some people might say is made just to look cool, or they might find it pointless. Instead, I found it to be very honest. The honesty of "Sin City" is that it is about style, and about sin. It doesn't need to preach to us. It just is. The characters are fascinating, from the schizophrenic Clive Owen, to Mickey Rourke who loves torturing people. The dialogue is brilliant as is the narration — my pick for one of the top two or three movies of the summer.

"Murderball" is a film you most likely didn't see. It showed at select theaters. The film is a documentary about a group of quadriplegics who play wheelchair rugby. The players sit in specially designed wheelchairs made for crashing into one another. This isn't like the Special Olympics one player affably describes. "We're not looking for a hug," he says. These guys are real athletes who compete in an Olympic sport. The film doesn't arouse pity in you. Instead, you'll find yourself admiring these people. Their spirits are those of real warriors and their stories are fascinating. Each member of the team has their own poignant story — about how he became confined to a wheelchair, about his sexual habits, and about his life as a cripple. This is a story about the triumph of the human spirit over the misfortunes of a cruel world.

"Sometimes, I think we crash into each other just so we can feel something." "Crash" is a film about racism in Los Angeles. Don Cheadle, Matt Dillon, Sandra Bullock, and Brendan Fraiser are some of the names in this impressive cast. This is a prime example of a film driven by characters. "Crash" is relentless. Every moment maxes-out the passion meter. The actors are filled with emotion, and drive. Written and directed by Paul Haggis, the screenwriter of "Million Dollar Baby," this is his directorial debut and an ardent attempt to do nothing short of blow the audience out of the theater.

The same is true of "Batman Begins." Christopher Nolan could have made a very good film. Instead, he took it to the limit and the film just explodes off the screen. Someone light up the bat signal again, this movie rocks; and a Batman movie that rocks is long overdue. Christian Bale does a splendid job with caped crusader and although Michael Keaton is untouchable as the best Batman, Bale is without a doubt a runner-up on his heels. The most impressive thing about this film is that it has the guts to be different from other Batman films and to do so in an intelligent way — differentiating itself from Schumacher's purple and neon green florescent backgrounds. This film is about who Batman really is, which is the real story afterall. We've all seen Batman beat up enough people to last a lifetime or two.

The film you thought was about beating people up is "Unleashed." This is a Jet Li film about a kid who is taken from his mother and trained to be a killer by his master played by Bob Hoskins. When he's separated from Hoskins and given shelter by the blind Morgan Freeman he relearns how to be a humane person. The film isn't another Jet Li martial arts movie, although, the martial arts in the film are electrifying. It's a character study about a man trying to break free of his past and become the man he wants to be. Bob Hoskins is creepy and cool and Jet Li displays some surprising acting talent. One of the more underrated films of the summer, "Unleashed" is thoroughly enjoyable and astutely directed.

The least well reviewed film on my list of the ten best is "Dark Water." But take it from me, this is an accomplished horror film that didn't get enough credit for just that reason — it's a horror film. Jennifer Connolly plays the mother to a girl who is afraid of being abandoned by her own mom and similarly Connelly was forgotten about by her mother. The themes of parental protection and fear of abandonment drive this story which gets more and more eerie as it progresses. The acting by Connelly and John C. Reilly who plays the owner of the apartment building they move into is outstanding. There are some really good scares in this film and it will keep you engrossed for sure.

"Charlie and the Chocolate Factory" seemed to be everyone's favorite. It rivals "Star Wars" for the most visually stunning film of the summer. You know how one in every fifteen kid actors can actually act? Well, in this film every kid actor is brilliant. Johnny Depp plays the eccentric and sadistic Willy Wonka and what really holds our attention are the characters. "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory" is my least favorite film of the ten, but it still makes the list. It is mired by flashbacks which really put dents in the storyline and the music isn't all that great. Still, its merits outweigh it's drawbacks and it is every bit worth seeing.

Peter Jackson said that the "Matrix" sequels and the last two "Star Wars" movies show us that a film can have the best special effects in the world but in the end we go to the movies for the characters. We want to peer into the lives of other people and see something hidden, something that illuminates the conflicts in and enriches our own lives. It is this experience that makes the movies so wonderful and someday as more and more people begin to realize what makes great films we may have trouble singling out the ten best films of the summer. There may just be too many good ones to count.

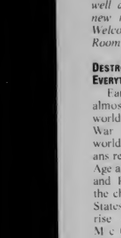
The Game Room

Carlos Cruz

This column is the first in a series gaming related columns that Collegian Staff member Carlos Cruz will be writing during the fall semester. Twice weekly, readers will receive a healthy dose of gaming news, as well as reviews of the hottest new releases in the industry. Welcome to "The Game Room."

DESTROY ALL HUMANS! AND EVERYTHING ELSE ON EARTH!



Earth, in the 1950s, seems almost like another world. The end of World War II launched the world into what historians refer to as the Atomic Age and the United States and Russia were leading the charge. In the United States, the decade saw the rise of the red scare, McCarthyism, Eisenhower, the fear of nuclear Armageddon and the rise of the B movie in Hollywood.

"Destroy All Humans!" brilliantly blends all these 50s themes into a splendid treat of mayhem and satire that tickles the funny bone as you annihilate entire cities. You play as Cryptosporidium, a three foot tall alien with an appetite for destruction and a personality that can only be described as Jack Nicholson meets General Douglas McArthur. You are sent to Earth to conquer the planet and rescue your clone, who was accidentally shot down over the desert. You are to accomplish all this in the most destructive way possible.

The adventure begins when you land in a small mid-western farm and try to make contact with a cow believing it is the dominant species. As you progress through the game, you are given more weapons with names like the Zap-O-Matic, Anal Probe, Disintegrator Ray, and the Ion Detonator. Once you have all these weapons you start to have some good fun. In the words of Crypto: "Don't get mad. Get sadistic".

Worth mentioning is that the voice of Orthopox (Crypto's boss) is done by none other than Richard Steven Horvitz. For those of you that aren't in the know, Orvitz is most well known as the voice of Zim on the now cancelled cult hit Nicktoon, "Invader Zim." Quite cool seeing as he basically is doing Zim all over again for the game.

DAH is a giant sandbox game in the style of "Grand Theft Auto" and "Mercenaries." As with all sandbox games, there are story missions like taking the form of the town mayor and brainwashing the public with political jargon, escorting a nuclear bomb, killing the president, and blowing up as much as possible and the occasional probing thrown in for good measure. There are also side quests which you can access at any time during play which unlock tons of bonus features once they are completed which makes for a very high replay value.

The game has no difficulty settings but that really doesn't stop the game from being either very easy, or frustratingly hard at times. The game tries to escalate in the challenge department but I found that the more difficult missions are during the mid game missions. This is very noticeable in one particular mission where you have to infiltrate a military base, hypnotize a marine to drive a truck carrying an atomic bomb across the desert to another base where you need to set it off then escape from the blast radius. Sounds simple; despite the fact you get wave after wave after wave of enemies thrown at you as you escort the truck. Everything from cows blocking the road to mines, to trucks, to machine gun batteries and tanks make up the gauntlet. All this is topped off by a final wave of scientists that rush the truck and try to deactivate the explosive device. The mission is insanely hard, but the satisfaction of completing the task is quite rewarding.

You play as Crypto, an alien bent on human destruction.

The game isn't just done on foot, many missions involve you hopping into your flying saucer and basically leveling entire cities. Your saucer also gets weapons upgrades, which you acquire by taking human DNA. How do I get this human DNA? Well, that requires some David Cronenburg style head exploding. Using your powerful mental abilities, you must blow up people's heads and collect their brain stems, which contain the DNA needed to upgrade your arsenal of weapons. Fun? You bet! Does it ever get tired? In a word — no.

This game isn't perfect. The controls are nice except for the fact that you have only one button assigned to cycle through your weapons. So you can't go back and forth through your inventory. This isn't that much of a problem seeing as you only have four weapons for each mode (foot and saucer). The game makes you relax a lot on your mental abilities which take some good amount of practice to master.

Graphically, the game is gorgeous. The Playstation 2 version of the game suffers here a little bit. Trees and rocks tend to take time to render and sometimes they won't appear until they are right in front of you. The same goes for gun turrets that don't appear until you are right above them in your saucer. This can prove to be a pain.

In the end, "Destroy All Humans!" gets a solid 8.5 out of 10. Go pick this one up.

The growing appeal and acceptance of TV therapy

By Jacqueline Ronan
Collegian Staff

A few decades ago in this country, psychotherapy was considered to be a hush-hush topic. If you were in therapy, it meant that you were weak, insane or both. It was right up there with divorce and homosexuality. You just didn't talk about it, and if you were involved in any of it back then, you never told another soul about it.

But today everybody's in therapy (except Tom Cruise of course). According to the American Psychological Association (APA), nearly half of all American households have a member that did or are currently seeking help from a mental health professional. Not only that, but 9 out of 10 Americans say they would seek help or recommend others to seek help. Therapy changed from being a dirty word in the 80s and 90s with the increase in mental health awareness. Now people are not afraid to admit they need help or are getting help. What was once a shameful is now normal.

Much like divorce and homosexuality, therapy has broken through the taboo glass ceiling and become an accepted and sometimes humorous part of our pop culture. Fictional characters like Dr. Frasier Crane and Stuart Smalley gave out weekly advice, while Lorraine Bracco and Billy Crystal had regular sessions with mafia bosses.

So it was only matter of a time when real therapy and reality TV got together. In the past few years, therapy splashed on to the television, though the concept isn't all that new. For years now radio has had many in-call programs featuring licensed doctors and those who think they're licensed doctors. People who couldn't afford or were embarrassed to go to the real thing, could call up anonymously to get the much needed advice for free and a from respected professional. Plus you got to be on the radio!

If TV Therapy has a face, it's bold and with a mustache. In 1998 "The Oprah Winfrey Show" featured a relatively unknown, named Dr. Phillip C. McGraw, who would give out mental health advice to guests and audience members. America fell in love with Dr. Phil's no-bull-hard-as-nails attitude. With in a few months ratings went up 25%. By 2002, Dr. Phil had his own show and is up against Oprah in many markets.

The syndicated program features a hodge-podge of topics including anorexia, bullies, addiction and intervention, couples therapy, couples sex therapy, adultery and divorce. Viewers tune in daily to hear Dr. Phil's sound-bite advice, which in turn brings in big ratings and big sponsors. In fact, the company (King World) renewed McGraw's contract until the 2013-14 season. But the question must be raised, is it ethical to gain fame and fortunate off of others pain and problems?

True, all of the Dr. Phil's in-studio guests write or call to ask to be on. Nobody is forcing anybody to do anything they don't want. People aren't being taped without their knowledge than exploited like a tabloid. They allow themselves to be there. But also is it ethical as a doctor of psychology for him to allow them to be there?

Viewers may learn from the program to recognize and identify problems in their in own lives, but chances are they really are tuning in to see the dead-beat dad and cheating housewife get yelled at. There is nothing better then seeing a cheater caught in a lie or a bully brought down to size. That's why viewers love about the show; Dr. Phil will tell you the truth whether you want to hear it or not. In therapy you learn the truth about yourself. And the truth hurts — and is very entertaining. That's why we love to watch the first six weeks of "American Idol." We love to see people's reality check. But is it ethical to pass real people's real problems off as entertainment?

Speaking of reality, in the pass year prime time television has recently had a string of therapy themed reality programs. In Bravo's Intervention cameras follow two different addicts' as they slam into rock bottom and their friends and family's desperate plea to seek help. The addictions range from heroin and cocaine to video games and the Internet. In FOX's "Nanny 911" and ABC's "Super Nanny" (which falls in the "Armageddon"/ "Deep Impact" way too specific to be released at the same time category) a cast of stern and proper British nannies give house calls to stressed parents of very naughty children. These nannies whip the children into shape and give tough-love tips to Mom and Dad.

But this summer's "Brat Camp" on ABC gives the true meaning of tough love. The show's premise is nine troubled and out-of-control teens are forced by their fed-up parent's into the intense therapy program, Sage Walk. There they spend two very cold and harsh months in Oregon doing backbreaking work and survival. The theory is when the teens are made to work harder then they ever had to in their whole lives, they become emotionally vulnerable and therefore more likely to change for the better. Sounds extreme, but both their parents and program counselors feel it's the only was to reach them and end the cycle of drug use, violence, lying, stealing and a number of others problems.

Unlike with the Nannies and Dr. Phil, these kids were not asking for help. They did not choose to be there. And whether or not you feel they're getting exactly what they deserve, should we be entertained by their problems and mistakes? One of the teen's tribulations stemmed from when she was molested at the age of 12. Through the show she learns to overcome it and move on with her life. Powerful to watch, but is it right to air her emotional struggle in the name of great television? Is it right air any one of their struggles?

Therapy is a personal and emotional journey made in the private of your mind and your therapist's coach. And perhaps it should stay that way, in private. Perhaps all these "patients" are drawn to the glamour of being on television, even if it's to admit cheating on a spouse or confronting a child's drug use. May be there are just some places the cameras shouldn't go. And maybe we collectively as viewers shouldn't get drawn in. Either that or we're all just kooky.

"The Oprah Winfrey Show" was one of the original television shows to feature therapy on air.

Changing the common misconceptions of college dating

You could fill a dorm room or two with all the relationship advice books that are out there. Unfortunately, most of these are giving advice that would normally be considered foolish: Don't be on the phone for too long. Don't pick up if he calls all the time. Play hard to get. Be mysterious. Pretend you don't know it's him when he calls so he wonders how many guys are calling you. Guys love the chase, keep them on their toes; stay just out of reach. In other words: pretend you don't like him.

This flies in the face of even a basic friendship. If you treated your friends that way, you'd soon find yourself with no friends. Let me say, America is great for many reasons. Unfortunately, its winner-takes-all competitive nature has carried over into dating and relationships. Always keep the upper hand, they tell you. If you're a man, treat the woman like she's the woman in the relationship: you're the guy, and what you say, goes. Hold up. Are you trying to run a business or a relationship? Are you trying to create basic friendship, romance, trust, a deep connection and general mutuality, or are you treating the person you like the most, as you would an adversary?

Trust me; I've learned all the rules. And some of my friends think I'm nuts, because I think that if someone's special to you, or you like someone, you should show them. I'm not saying throw yourself at a person, and I'm not saying if your crush is clearly not interested, to make yourself a fool by refusing to take a hint, calling incessantly after someone's dumped you, or otherwise harassing people. Granted, there are always inherent risks involved when something goes beyond friendship. But relationships are like playing the piano: first you must learn to play by the rules. Then you can forget the rules, and play by heart.

Now, that only comes into play if you're looking for something a little more serious than a casual hook-up. If you are looking for a fun night, a good story to tell your friends the next day over dinner at the DC, it is in your best interest to basically be a jerk, whether you're a guy or a girl. Interestingly, it's then that you'd naturally be busy, or not recognize the person's voice on the phone, or do all the things they wrongly tell you to do when you're trying to get a guy you actually like.

Before I start giving advice on romantic relationships in the college setting, it's important to understand why dating in college is so different. I don't know how many times I've sat around with girlfriends and heard, "Guys just don't date in college. All they want is to hook up." It's not that they don't want to date. It's a different style of dating as it's relatively easy to hang out in privacy, when in high school it greatly depended on who was going to be home (or, more importantly, who wasn't going to be home) that's what usually happens. Additionally, guys are more than willing to date (take you out) if they really like you. And yes, they'll pay. And if he's a nice guy, even though it's college and nobody has any money, he'll still pay. But because nobody has any money, splitting the bill is more commonplace.

Going to parties together also becomes a way to get to know one another, and can, under the right circumstances, fit somewhere into dating. But keep in mind if a person only sees you when you or they are under the influence of something, sober-minded they probably don't think of you that way. Girls, remember that the shyer guys are generally the good guys. Guys, remember that, in the words of Jay-Z, "ladies is pimps, too," so don't assume anything.

No matter what you experience, remember that you are the best judge of your own experience. Gut-feeling is never wrong. Your friends are as old as you are, so their advice is going to be no better than what you could tell yourself, but it can be helpful-and they'll be there for you no matter what. Never repeatedly pass-up partying with your friends to party with a guy or girl: chances are it won't last anyway, but be forgiving of it when your friends do it to you, because every now and then we all get swept away.

Having true friendships with members of the opposite sex helps you to understand them better. You will learn that a person who is a great friend can treat the people he or she dates pretty badly, and that the people who are total players can make a 180 if they meet the right person. Guys will learn that all girls think too much. Some of you will learn your exes really were crazy, and most people you date won't be.

I'll be here to give advice on different dating topics throughout the year. Feel free to write in to me at LoversOnly@gmail.com and suggest topics or ask for advice, maybe we'll print your question! But remember: you are the best judge of your own experience so don't take any fad relation ship book like it's the Bible.

The air, at an altitude of 3,800m, leaves you with the sensation of how it feels after holding your breath for as long as you can under water, and what those first few gasps of air feel like once you've surfaced. The Inca's built their city, Macchu Pichu on the top of the Andes Mountains at an altitude of 8000 ft., so it is no wonder how they achieved god like feats.

My friend and I, accustomed to living at sea-level felt asthmatic during most of our journey. For mala altura (altitude sickness), which left me with no appetite and trouble sleeping, the natives prescribed Coca Tea. The tea is made from the ancient plant native to Peru and Bolivia and used by mine workers and field laborers to combat hunger, thirst, and fatigue. For travelers, unaccustomed to the drastic altitude changes it eases nausea, fever, and headaches.

Nancy was in her early twenties, her roots are Incan, and her maternal ancestor from the 11 century might have had her eyes. Nancy's blood is part of a dynasty of warriors whose conquests in South America compare to Alexander the Great in Europe. She is timid and declines to look into the eyes of a foreigner when she speaks.

Nancy's generation marks a turning point for the future of the Incan civilization; they will learn to speak the Spanish language in primary school. Within the last 25 years, both the Bolivian and Peruvian governments have started to incorporate the Aymara people into the modern society. The growth of ecotourism around the Lake Titicaca region has forced the indigenous population to become bi-lingual. Still, the familial bond between the old and new generation is so tightly woven that there are no signs of a diffused culture.

There is no electricity, cars, roads, police or dogs on the island. It is a paradise in comparison with the modern cities of South America; which are congested with traffic, overpopulation and pollution.

On our journey to Nancy's house, we pass mostly women and their children, carrying crops on their heads and backs. Nancy hurries past her friends who are in identical dress and tending to their daily chores. They call to her in Quechua and start to giggle. Of course my friend and I feel uncomfortable; we look like we just stepped out of a time machine. Everything I'm wearing was made in a factory with a sewn in tag that bears the name of the country of export, and materials used like Gore-Tex, polyester, and rayon.

The Amantani women are all outfitted with no immediate apparent distinction between them. Later we were told that a young woman wears a bright colored skirt and sash to represent she is single and a woman in a dark, or black colored skirt symbolizes she is married.

We walked about 20 minutes before we arrived at Nancy's home. It is located at the top of a bluff over looking the great blue Lake Titicaca, whose body spreads like the open ocean. Her mother is standing at the gate of the house holding a baby lamb, the newest addition to the family. Nancy shows us our rooms and tells us we will be served lunch immediately.

Nancy lives with her mother and six siblings, whom range between the ages of four and 20-something. Her father, who was barely mentioned during our stay, commutes to find work on the mainland, Puno, about a 4 hour boat ride from Amantani. Her father, like most of the men who inhabit the islands of Lake Titicaca, have adapted to the modern world, working long hours in factories in exchange for soles (Peruvian currency). In the community, there is a belief that to be lazy is a sin.

The extra income will be put towards buying a modern education for their children. When the men return home dressed in blue jeans, t-shirts, and baseball caps, their families must assume that is their uniform. Once back in their house the men will change into the traditional black pants, white shirt and colorful woven sash.

While Amantani has a history of familial subsistence farming, in recent years the daily chores have been left to the women and children, as the men set out to the 21 century workforce. The sheltered women of the island rarely see the land across the lake, and whose only image of the developed world is what the tourists bring with them.

Quechua is spoken in the house, and because Nancy, is the most fluent Spanish speaker in the family she is the hostess for us during our stay. Her shyness is a behavior trait that afflicts most of the women on the island, unlike the men, whose daily interaction with greater Peru has developed their social skills, the isolated women feel uncomfortable around strangers.

Pepe, our tour guide, had decided to visit our family for lunch that afternoon. My friend, Pepe and I sat on a wooden bench in the cramped dark smoky kitchen. Nancy's mother silently kneeled on the dusty floor over the open flame. She boiled together her traditional soup of broth, egg, noodles, chicken, and corn. I asked Nancy to ask her mother how many generations her family had lived on the island.

"Forever," she answered me.

After lunch we walked to the top of a hill to the temple of Mamapacha (the mother earth) to watch the sun set below the lake. Native women sat hunched around their sales display of Alpaca woven hats, scarves, and sweaters, while their children ran between the legs of the foreigners showing off their braided string bracelets. A couple of boys walked along side of us as we ascended the hill, blowing Andean folksongs through their wooden pipes. They played in a two part, perfect harmony, while the hikers trudged along gasping for air. The sun set from the temple of Mamapacha, from the same location in the sky that the Inca had watched it a thousand years before as they made sacrifices to the gods.

That night I didn't sleep well. I kept awaking to the sound of the wind rapping against our tin door and broken glass window. At around 4'o'clock in the morning I got bundled up and walked outside in complete darkness to find the outhouse. The farm animals generated the only noise on the island at that hour. The waves calmly curled onto the shore, and I felt as though I was floating along in a peaceful dream world.

After we ate our deep fried bread for breakfast, Nancy knocked on our door and said it was time to go meet our group at the port. She walked us back to where we had met the day before and said goodbye, looking away from our faces. As we boarded the motorboat we watched as Nancy found one of her Aymara friends and began chatting energetically.

The lifestyle of the Aymara was one in which the developed western civilization had been cast away hundreds of years ago. These men, women, children live naturally, in unison with their family and neighbors, without the superficial competition of capitalist society. Amantani Island has a way of life, that for myself, born and raised in the United States, with central heating in winter and air-conditioning in summer, instant dinners, washing machines, ovens and toilets, will never be able to identify with. I felt a sense of relief as we pulled away from the dock of Amantani and towards a world that I would recognize. For the indigenous people they have no desire to move off the island to mix with the greater population. This life is all they know, and it doesn't seem like they are ready to conform yet.

Local residents of the island construct a ceremonial vessel made entirely of reeds, a tradition that has passed from one generation to the next.

Ozzfest returns to the valley

Murder dressed down in gym shorts.

Sporting a Mohawk and some filthy blue jeans, Peter Dolving, the front man of Sweden's thrash Quintet, the Haunted took the stage as it possessed. Despite the extreme weather Dolving proceeded to tear out his vocal chords while throwing his body around the stage to the relentless riffs of Patrik Jensen and brothers, Anders and Jonas Bjrler. Members of the crowd attempted to feel the music in a similar fashion, butting heads in the numerous mosh pits which formed during the set. The combination of hot temperatures and violent activity landed several fans backstage, in a stretcher.

Rising stars, Mastodon took the stage early in the afternoon and was met with loud cheers from the crowd. The Georgia band recently released their critically acclaimed album, "Leviathan," a conceptual work based around Herman Melville's Moby Dick. I spoke with guitarist Brent Hines about the choice to pursue this idea.

"We kind of felt that Moby Dick resembled our band a lot." Captain Ahab took a bunch of his men out in search of a white whale. We see ourselves pursuing a similar goal in trying to attain success. Like Ahab and his men we also have to go out on long journeys and be away from our families for a long time in search of our white whale."

Mastodon catered to new and old fans with a set reflecting a variety of songs from "Leviathan" and their first full-length album, "Remission." After churning through crowd favorites such as, "Megalodon" and "March of the Fire Ants" the band switched it up a little with their progressive groove, "Aqua Dementia."

The second stage drew to a close in the mid-afternoon with some furious sets from California's metal-core masters As I Lay Dying, Massachusett's own Killswitch Engage, and a stage production-light yet riveting performance from Haverill, Mass. native, Rob Zombie.

As the gates to the main stage met the flood of insatiable metalheads some fans had already persevered through eight hours of extreme aural pleasure. Those lucky enough to score seats in the ranks of the covered section took a load off while many more took to the outdoor lawn area nosebleed section.

With a disappointingly short set time, In Flames made the best of their situation by playing several tracks from their latest effort, "Soundtrack to Your Escape" as well as a couple fan favorites. Anders Fridfn, vocalist for the legendary Gothenberg band talked to me about the performance.

"We only had five songs to play and we wanted to play some songs that fans would recognize off of the albums, not ones that no one has heard before. When you have seven albums to pick from it's kind of hard you know?" When asked if he had any concert memories from his college era, Anders responded, "We used to go to this show, "Roskilde" in Denmark. It's a big Danish rock festival, everyone would be camping out and there were always tons of bands playing.

Ozzy's former guitarist Zakk Wylde and his band Black Label Society took the stage shortly after. Although marred a bit by some bad sound set-up, Wylde still managed to pull off his signature guitar solo which he played with his teeth.

Massachusetts natives, Shadows Fall pummeled the audience with their potent blend of metalcore and traditional metal. Ghosts of the nu-metal movement, Mudvayne followed, seemingly naked without their usual makeup but still as raw as ever.

In the tradition set forth by the previous year's festival another classic metal band was present at the festival this year, British metal giants, Iron Maiden. As a special treat for the fans, Bruce Dickinson and crew decided to play songs exclusively from their first four classic albums. The entire stadium seemed to shake as the band ripped through classics such as, "The Trooper," "Hallowed Be Thy Name," and "Run to the Hills." Eddie, the band's undead mascot even made an appearance, welcomed by a seething multitude of proudly displayed devil horns.

It was nearly 10:00 when Ozzy took the stage. Most of the fans seemed to have given every last bit of energy to Iron Maiden. The familiar riffs of Tony Iommi and Geezer Butler emanated forth from the amplifiers followed by Bill Ward on drums. Suddenly the exhaustion seemed to be disappearing from the crowd. Shortly after, the Ozzman himself bellowed into the microphone. As if their music was a vitalizing wind, the inasses were once again alert and thriving just as they had been more than 13 hours before.

While the age of the band seeped into their performance on some occasions, Black Sabbath played an impressive 90-minute set highlighting their legendary discography and providing the last scrumptious bite of metal goodness that would send each and every fan home for the evening with their cravings completely quenched.

Jam band fans flock to show

they'll shed blood for what they each believe."

Artists frequently commented on the line-up's great diversity at Bonnaroo. Industry veterans like Bob Weir and Warren Haynes sat like patriarchs at news conferences next to Jack Johnson and Glen Hansard of the Frames.

Bob Weir of Ratdog spoke about the evolution of jam band music. "The jam band idiom is kind of the new jazz as these kids will be growing up with this music as this music grows up. Watch out for this in five years. As we all grow up and get better the music will get better," Weir said.

Weir also called Bonnaroo, "a work in progress" and praised the wealth of talent among the acts performing throughout the festival. Warren Haynes commented on the opportunity to play with both Government Mule and the Allman Brothers and "interject each side" of his "musical personality into each group."

"Bonnaroo Radio" provided distractions during the seemingly endless hours of traffic prior to the festival. The first public service announcement reminded people to use protection ó in addition to sun protection quoting a common (or so they said) phrase, "your tent or mine." Lemonade stands lined the back roads off the interstate while sweaty travelers stretched their legs out of car windows. Liquor store clerks smiled saying, "Bonnaroo? Yes?" And pointing their fingers. Strangers told drivers to have fun while policeman on horseback asked around, "How ya'll doing?"

Once inside the gates, it was a trek to the campsites and a little further to the actual festivities. They put up little street signs green like the ones at home. As if the eight dozen plazas filled with Wal-Mart, Old Navy, and Subway were not familiar enough on the way down to Tennessee, they transplanted items of suburban back yards to make the campsites look the same as well.

Before the festival officially opened, concert goers were allowed to set-up homesteads in the numerous neighborhoods surrounding Centeroo, Bonnaroo's official entertainment center. The roar of the generators supplying light for the temporary villages was almost as loud as the bustling shopping center in the commercial nucleus of Centeroo. Stands selling handmade wares and state of the art accessories established camp in the middle of the music. Everything seemed to be selling for market value or above inside Centeroo. The patchwork-covered ticket-wishers sauntering down the roads into the campgrounds would have to find a lot of people willing to donate a dollar to buy a drink of bottled water ($3) or a hemp skirt ($54).

But neither noise level compared to the sporadic roar of crowds celebrating the pre-music-festival music that started before the sun set on Thursday evening. The rain had yet to fall and the sliver of moon looked tiny and orange.

Throughout Bonnaroo, it was possible to stand halfway between stages and catch an earful of two different shows. Herbie Hancock's Headhunters nearly drowned out Bela Fleck's Acoustic Trio on Saturday night. As an example of the great camaraderie at Bonnaroo, Bela Fleck handled it quite graciously.

"We always wanted to play with Herbie Hancock, and here we are now," he said. The crowd roared.

From afar, the audience at Bob Weir's acoustic set in the rain (at the Sonic stage) looked like a happy reunion of multicolored poncho-ghosts dancing jollily to their treasured favorites. As the music pulsed out toddlers stood by their mothers, grandfathers swayed with their wives and twenty-somethings closed their eyes and sang loudly as raindrops kissed their foreheads.

The rain poured harder and people danced more joyously while singing loudly to "Touch of Grey." The side stage melted together like a family celebrating an old friend who had returned from travels just in time for dessert.

One of the few female headliners, Madeleine Peyroux, performed a mellow jazz-filled set in the afternoon mist. Peyroux's throaty cries soothed listeners to a serene attentiveness. With relaxed elegance, Peyroux took on a vintage femininity harkening back to the sounds of Lady Day and early Ella Fitzgerald.

A family affair, The Kings of Leon, brothers Caleb, Nathan and Jared Followill, with their cousin Matthew, drew a large midday audience for their edgy yet friendly set. Within the sea of head-bobbers tapping their legs loyally to the high-energy bass drum, hyper aficionados danced wildly mouthing each word. Lead singer Caleb Followill belted out raunchy lyrics with a rock-star attitude after showing a deep appreciation for the sizeable turnout.

Graffiti near the stage read, "This is dream manifest." Steven Golub, a junior at Northeastern University said, "It should say 'check reality at the door' on the ticket."

Planet Roo, a village within Centeroo, promoted various environmental organizations and businesses at Bonnaroo. Cliff Bar displayed their tour van that runs on veggie oil in one tent while a laptop computer that played The Meatrix (www.themeatrix.com) continuously in another. The Sesquatchi River Valley Institute demonstrated the use of straw-bail construction. Belly dancing and fire poi entertained spectators at the only solar-powered stage at the festival.

"I think the public goes in cycles. Sometimes they like the synthetic and sometimes they like the organic," said Sam Beazm of Iron and Wine. With moderate success, Bonnaroo caters to several phases within the cycle: Impromptu drumming circles congregated near the Volkswagen sponsored Scratch DJ Academy. Artists painted murals throughout the colorful marketplace inside Centeroo. Just under $200 bought a ticket to this fleeting world full of artistic celebration and immediate gratification.

The latest British invasion

general admission pit was located at the front of the stage and will be for all tours, to give fans a closeness usually only experienced in club venues.

Aptly opening their set with 'Square One,' the band emerged from the shadows of the backstage as their huge high-tech digital screen counted down to zero. Jonny Buckland's '2001: A Space Odyssey' guitar-pedal effect echoed across the sea of fans, competing with their screams and shouts when Chris Martin jogged across the stage nearly into the pit.

After going platinum with past albums, it comes as no surprise that Coldplay can afford a fantastic visual show too. Giant yellow balloons full of confetti were appropriately dropped from the stage as the band began to play 'Yellow,' the track that allowed the band to cross the pond. Mathematical equations and pictures of the universe collided during 'The Scientist,' and the entire stage was covered in a projection of handwritten lyrics during 'Swallowed in the Sea.'

Their sound is evolving, both onstage and in the studio, as fans could hear clearly in a very danceable version of 'Clocks' played in the set, accelerating faster and faster into a climax.

As the show reached its halfway mark, the band changed from fast-paced rock to an acoustic folk/ a cappella set.

'We wrote this song for the late Johnny Cash,' said Martin as he introduced 'Til Kingdom Come,' a very country-esque ballad. As the band progressed into the track, each playing instruments different than they're accustomed to, Martin forgot the words.

'This is the kind of thing that would get us voted off of American Idol,' he joked.

As the lights at the Dodge Music Center faded, a shelter lantern descended from the ceiling and the sound of an organ began to fill the air for the finale. The lantern grew brighter as Martin sang, 'Lights will guide you home/and ignite your bones.' The crowd began to sway, flashing either their cell phones or lighters and Jonny Buckland began his guitar break. This was 'Fix You,' a song sure to win the hearts of twenty-somethings across the nation.

Here, Coldplay are at their best — every member's part in the song is balanced and equal- Chris Martin with his falsetto, Jonny Buckland with a strong guitar break combined with Will Champion's fast paced drumming, and Guy Berryman's heavy bass that hits the listener in the chest. In the style made popular by Queen, Coldplay are able to pull off four-part harmony that urges the crowd to sing along and feel the raw emotion they've released into their music.

This is what makes Coldplay so strong and loved- their ability to pour their hearts out, and still be a rock band. Perhaps more bands need to take a page from Coldplay's book, but until then, they'll continue to be the biggest band in the world.

Biographer Sam Weller captures the life of Ray Bradbury

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Ray Bradbury's most astonishing quality isn't his influences on pop culture, his science fiction stories, or the celebrities he inspired, but rather his writing style. The man writes one short story every weekend to fulfill a promise he made as a teenager. Continuously for the past sixty years the end of every weekend brings a new story despite writers block, poor quality, or laziness. As a child, Bradbury visited a creepy carnival and one of the performers, Mr. Electrico, knighted him and shouted, "Go, Live Forever!"

"I decided that was the greatest idea I had ever heard," Bradbury tells biographer Sam Weller. "Just weeks after Mr. Electrico said this to me, I started writing every day. I never stopped." Now, 84, Bradbury's policy still stands. He's accumulated over 600 short stories, most never published. The published stories brought wide fame and Time Magazine declared him "The Poet of the Pulps."

His greatest work emerged not in shorts, but in two novels. "The Martian Chronicles" and "Fahrenheit 451" personify every Bradbury theme, interest, and fear that has haunted his short stories and more significantly his personal life. "The Bradbury Chronicles" at first looks to the man and what drives these stories.

COURTESY BARNESANDNOBLE.COM

As the Jesuit saying goes, "Give me the child until he is seven, and I will show you the man." Weller begins by searching the childhood for inspiration. Ray Bradbury was born in Waukegan, Illinois in 1920. His hometown varied from thrilling and enchanted to dark and sinister. He held a childhood paranoia of dark spaces. There were miraculous moments when he was with his grandfather watching hot air balloons and listening to the phenomenon of radio. However, there were also fears of the night, when he dared to travel the dark hallways to the bathroom located in the attic and contemplated using the stairs rather then facing the monster that awaited him atop.

Here we can recognize the birth of "The Thing at the Top of the Stairs" and "Something Wicked This Way Comes." Bradbury's "Dandelion Wine" explored a mysterious town much like Waukegan, which Weller unveils in the eerie carnivals, the characters, the movie theaters and the countless library trips. The inspiration for his countless shorts is all here in the beginning of his life.

The depression sent his family moving between states until they arrived at Los Angeles where Bradbury scoured for celebrities and struggled to write for radio. After many failures he was finally published in 1938. From there his stories fell comfortably and consistently into the fictional "pulp" genre. Eventually, he ascended into nationally syndicated magazines. His compelling shorts continuously paid homage to his interests in space, the supernatural and horror stories of small towns. Stephen King tells us, "Without Ray Bradbury there is no Stephen King."

His greatest literary moment came with the publication of "Fahrenheit 451," which overflowed with McCarthyism metaphors and paranoia. It was a masterful piece of work that won him critical acclaim and etched his name in stone aside Philip K. Dick as a science fiction legend. Weller also appreciates Bradbury's obstacles in writing the screenplay for John Huston's "Moby Dick," tolerating endless abuse from the renowned director.

Weller's exploration of his personal life falls short following his childhood. The early years perceive Bradbury in more human terms and his future stories are analyzed and compared to earlier events as if studying the inner workings of the later man. In the adult and senior years, he is distant as some heroic genius endlessly accomplished but with little understanding of how or why. Weller briefly touches on his adultery that caused marriage problems for him and his wife Maggie. His daughters are mentioned briefly. The McCarthyism backlash is just nearly explored.

Weller's introduction admits that he is first and foremost a fan and seems to address Bradbury with wonderment. There is more admiration throughout this story than hard honesty. Bradbury seems beyond criticism. Instead, he is shown with awe of his writing and curiosity of what inspired it, but little insight as to what kind of man we experience.

Disappointingly so, as Weller was given unlimited access to historical materials of Waukegan, public libraries, academic institutions, personal accounts from Bradbury's family, even FBI accounts of the McCarthyism accusations. Weller spent four years following and sitting with Bradbury every day in excruciatingly long interviews with him and his wife. The original version was seven hundred pages long and I sense far more revealing. Out of respect to his hero the censoring is extensive.

We are left, in the end, with what Weller calls a talent that has influenced pop culture like no other writer in history. A writer, who Weller believes, transcends the science fiction label as one of the greatest literary figures of all time. That I'm afraid he is not. There are too many Shakespeares, Faulkners, and Tolstoy's that far outrank Bradbury's tales of fantasy. He is great, as a science-fiction, fantasy writer, not much more.

Perfection weakens Peter Pouncey's novel

By Leann Leake
Collegian Staff

Robert MacIver is watching his wife slip away. He's a professor of history, she's an artist, and they're both reaching the end of their elegant, rich lives. When Margaret, caring and kind and formerly always there for MacIver, is gone, he stops taking care of their house and of himself. Things drag on in a sullen, miserable way until he realizes that he doesn't like the sad ending he's giving his own life and decides make rules for himself to bring meaning back to his life.

This is the beginning of "Rules for Old MenWaiting," Peter Pouncey's first novel. Things have hardly begun and we already know how they're going to end; MacIver tells us so himself. It's not inspiration or meaning or comfort that he's waiting for; it's death. The rules are, in MacIver's words, "a plan to take back his life, until he could give it away on an acceptable basis."

MacIver forces himself to eat, occupies his mind by writing a story about soldiers in WWI, and muses over his life in a series of flashbacks. So it is that we learn about MacIver's life; he's a great sportsman, a great scholar, a great father and husband. The most bitter sadness in his life is that he raised a son so kind and selfless that he became a medic and died in Vietnam.

Authors are often told to "write what they know," so it only makes sense that "Rules for Old Men Waiting," a novel about an old professor from Great Britain waiting to die in America, was written by an old professor also from Great Britain (and also possibly waiting to die ...?). It's not hard to see the temptations of writing about yourself, but this kind of writing has undeniable dangers. In the seedy online world of fan fiction, the slang for a character inserted in a story that's very obviously the author is "Mary Sue." Mary Sue's are infamous for their irritating perfection. Just think, you could make yourself a hero. You could gloss over your faults. You could surround yourself with the kind of people you think you deserve, instead of the unpredictable and unappreciative lot that the real world has given you. Everything could easily gain a tint of intelligence and nobility that could be irritating or laughable to readers.

I'm sad to report that Pouncey has been bitten by the Mary Sue bug. "Rules for Old Men Waiting" is very melodramatic and just too, too, perfect. Yes, there's pain, but all the characters in the novel and the short story within it are very understanding and thoughtful. Lessons are learned. Wrongs are righted. Everyone lives a life of patient enjoyment — there are no mistakes. Margaret is not just an artist, but a world-class artist; MacIver is not just a good scholar, but one who is cherished by his students. In MacIver's own story, his artist sketching in the trenches is admired by quite famous real artists to an embarrassing degree. For all their perfect hindsite, MacIver and Pouncey have no sense of humor — they are both too proud of their writing and intellect to see how pompous they're becoming.

It must be very comforting to see your world so perfectly explained and blissful at the end of your life, as Pouncey must (if his character is any indication, and I think he is), but it all feels very artificial. It's not that I see some hidden pathos in Pouncey's writing, simply that the story as it stands does not feel true. Pouncey, we must remember, was not dead (or dying, as far as I know) when he wrote this book, so much of it is a wishful fantasy about how he'd like to prepare himself for death. And unfortunately, it's neither a well-written or convincing fantasy, so it's best left as a intellectual and emotional exercise for the author alone.

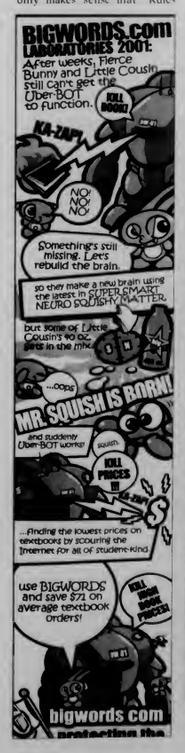
King Tut returns once again to the L.A. area

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

After nearly thirty years, King Tutankhamun has returned to the United States. Or rather, many of King Tut's treasures have returned to the United States. The mummy of Tutankhamun and his funeral mask — both of which were the prime attractions to the original show in the 1970s — have been deemed too fragile to leave Egypt and are not present at the current exhibit. However, more than 50 artifacts from Tut's tomb and 70 others from the tombs of his relatives are displayed at the 'Tutankhamun and the Golden Age of the Pharaohs' exhibit at the Los Angeles County Museum of Art.

The artifacts, which range from 3,300 to 3,500 years old, are spectacular, and range from small faience figures and vessels to the breathtaking sarcophagus and funeral mask of Tut's great-grandmother, Tjuya. The stars of the show are several items found buried with Tut — including his royal diadem and one of the gold containers that held his internal organs — but the objects from the other tombs are just as impressive, if not more.



Unfortunately, despite the attraction of the artifacts, the exhibit leaves much to be desired in terms of presentation. The placement of various displays creates several bottlenecks, especially during hours when many people are attending the exhibit, and despite the efforts of the museum to place information cards in multiple places on each display, they are often difficult to read in the crowd.

The cards themselves are often simply superficial, and offer little insight into the history or importance of many objects, opting instead for a general description. As these descriptions begin to repeat themselves, the cards become tiresome and uninteresting. By the end of the exhibit, every visitor could be sure that 'Ankh was the ancient Egyptian symbol for life,' but since most probably knew that going in, some more in-depth information would have been nice.

Museum visitor Kimm Nasser voiced her disappointment with the exhibit compared to the one in the 1970s. "It was all much more impressive last time. I've heard that there is a lot more here this time, but I couldn't tell. There's just so much more they could have done with it to make it a better experience.'

Another complaint was that the audio tour, featuring notable Egyptian actor and contract bridge player, Omar Sharif, was a $6 charge on top of the $25 ticket price. It was not overwhelmingly expensive, but considering the high price of the tickets, they could certainly have thrown it in for free.

Despite the problems the exhibit has, the artifacts remain impressive, and this is a rare opportunity to see them outside of Egypt. The show runs in Los Angeles until November 15th, and then moves to Fort Lauderdale, Chicago and Philadelphia. For anyone interested in seeing these artifacts, the experience justifies the ticket price.

'Prince' only expands Harry Potter's kingdom

By Mackenzie Issler
Collegian Staff

"Harry Potter and the Half Blood Prince" is the sixth book of a seven book series written by J.K. Rowling. The book was released in stores on July 16, 2005, to eager fans ready to stay up the entire night reading the book.

The sixth book picks up after the rise of Lord Voldemort, instantly full of suspense and anticipation. This series' main villain is an evil wizard, who is responsible for the death of both Muggles, people without magical abilities, and wizards, including Harry Potter's parents.

Since the return of Voldemort, chaos has erupted, forcing the rare occurrence of communication between the wizarding and Muggle worlds. The book commences with a surprise meeting between the new Prime Minister of Muggles and the Minister of Magic.

Harry Potter, along with his best friends, the clever Hermione and the hapless Ron, have returned to Hogwart's School of Witchcraft and Wizardry for their sixth year of schooling. They have received their Ordinary Wizarding Level grades and are now allowed to pick the classes they wish to continue studying. The book also introduces new romances, something only touched upon in previous books, demonstrating the coming of age of the three main characters in the novel. Where there only shy crushes existed, now full-fledged relationships flourish, adding another layer of complexity to an already densely populated plotline.

The focus of this book was not primarily on the classes taken at Hogwarts and other, more personal, side stories. This book's main theme follows the rise of Voldemort and the actions that followed his return. Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince, or, more simply HBP, has a much darker tone than the other books. HBP answers questions remaining from the previous books, and opens new ones for the next and final book.

This book, like the others, was written with a sure hand and an eye towards concise, powerful storytelling. HBP was written so that any member of its audience could enjoy it, from adults searching for escapism to children young enough to be read to. Rowling continues to develop the characters and capture their personalities in a way that you feel that you know each and every character.

A few words of advice — make sure you have plenty of time allocated to read the book once you begin, because once you start reading you will not be able to put it down!

Many in the Amherst community have bought and read this book.

Graham Jorge, a senior communications major at UMass, finished the book in one weekend. "I thought it was pretty good. I liked it because it was fun. I don't believe it is the best book in the world or in the series. Nevertheless I enjoyed it and I am very excited for the last book," said Jorge.

Some did not need a whole weekend to finish the book. Eileen Billings, a senior history and English major at UMass, finished the book in one night. She found the book very exciting at it had jumped up and he five "I think it did a good job of serving its own storyline, and wrapping things up in book five, and getting things set up for book seven," said Billings.

Todd Ratajczak, a senior chemistry major at UMass, came across the book casually in the local library. "Basically, I picked up the book from the library, decided it became engrossed in its mythology. It was a quick read, because Rowling kept your attention with the book from chapter to chapter."

As every book is appears on shelves, the legions of fans become more and more dedicated to this phenomenon. The sixth book sets an even darker tone, than the previous in the series, leaving only speculation on how the series could end.

A Royal Welcome: Pioneer Valley celebrates the arrival of the 'Half-Blood Prince'

By Mackenzie Issler

Seven year old girls were not the only ones decked out in costume at the release of the sixth Harry Potter book. At the Barnes & Noble in Hadley, Mass., individuals of all ages were seen dressed up as their favorite characters, waving around their home-made wands.

At midnight on July 16, boxes of 'Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince' were opened and sold all over the world. There were roughly 400 reservations of the book at Barnes and Noble. People of all ages congested the aisles of books in the store.

Barnes & Noble in Hadley opened their doors to Harry Potter fans at 6 p.m. Everyone was handed a wristband and a pair of black-framed glasses, resembling those of Harry Potter. People who reserved the book got yellow wristbands, and those who did not got orange wristbands.

Characters from the books could be seen all throughout the bookstore. Costumes ranged from Harry Potter himself to even Crookshanks, Hermione's grumpy feline — one timid girl was decked out in a motley arrangement of leopard print, paw ears, and a tail. According to the little girl, the costume was "extremely hot." Another family wore a pillowcase, in order to accurately bear a resemblance to Dobby the house-elf.

Libraries reported quite a high circulation of the event.

Ben Elson Bennett and Tara Roddy, both seniors at UMass Amherst, the release of Harry Potter was their Friday night date. Everyone of all different ages were dressed up. It was cool to see college students all dressed up, running around with scars on their faces," said Bennett of the evening.

Chris Rowe, an UMass graduate, was a student of astronomy at the university. "The phenomenon is really interesting. It is better that people are getting excited about something new that is of more substance rather than more frivolous," said Rose. He also loved the amount of knitting done by Hermione, as she is currently employed at WEBS knitting store in Northampton.

Another UMass graduate, Greg Fenstad was very impressed by the author's writing of the books. "The way it is written, it appeals to everyone," said Fenstad. He arrived at Barnes & Noble at 11:15 p.m., excited, and ready to spend the rest of his night reading the book.

To celebrate the book's release Barnes & Noble had a lot of festivities planned for the night. There were free glasses, lightning bolt tattoos, crosswords, and prizes handed out. A costume contest was held. Individuals were also allowed to make their own magical wands.

Other local bookstores stayed open late to cater to the incredible number of Harry Potter fans.

Amherst Books extended their normal hours, keeping their doors open late for the release. According to Andre Khalil, an employee and graduate student at UMass, almost 80 copies of the book were sold that night.

All the Amherst bookstores remained open all night as well. According to its owner, Howard Gersten, it was a fun night. They even held a celebratory party with refreshments.

Bookstores all over the Pioneer Valley kept their doors open throughout the entire night awaiting Harry's arrival, just like Dumbledore did at Number Four Privet Drive all those years ago.

Not such an average journey

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Staff

Eva Piccozzi studied in Santiago, Chile during her Junior 2005 spring semester. She is a journalism and Spanish language major at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The last two weeks Eva spent in South America she and another American student traveled through the north of Chile, the south of Peru, and La Paz, Bolivia.

This story is about her visit to Lake Titicaca, the highest navigable lake in the world that is shared between Peru and Bolivia. On the lake there are floating islands that the Aymara indigenous group still occupy and uphold their culture. There are several larger islands also inhabited by the Aymara on which tourists may spend a night with a local family.

Pepe serves as a mediator between the realm of the indigenous life and the traveler's eager curiosity. His tour business allows extranjeros (foreigners), from developed societies a glimpse of a day in the life of rural peasant farmers. He is a native of the Lake Titicaca district and guides tours leaving Puno every other day to the floating Uros Islands, Amantani Island, and Taquile Island. Pepe's oration about the history of this Inca preservation and the life of its inhabitants today, lasts 2 days. His pre-rehearsed speech is given in Spanish, and then in English even though his clients primarily speak Spanish, German, or French.

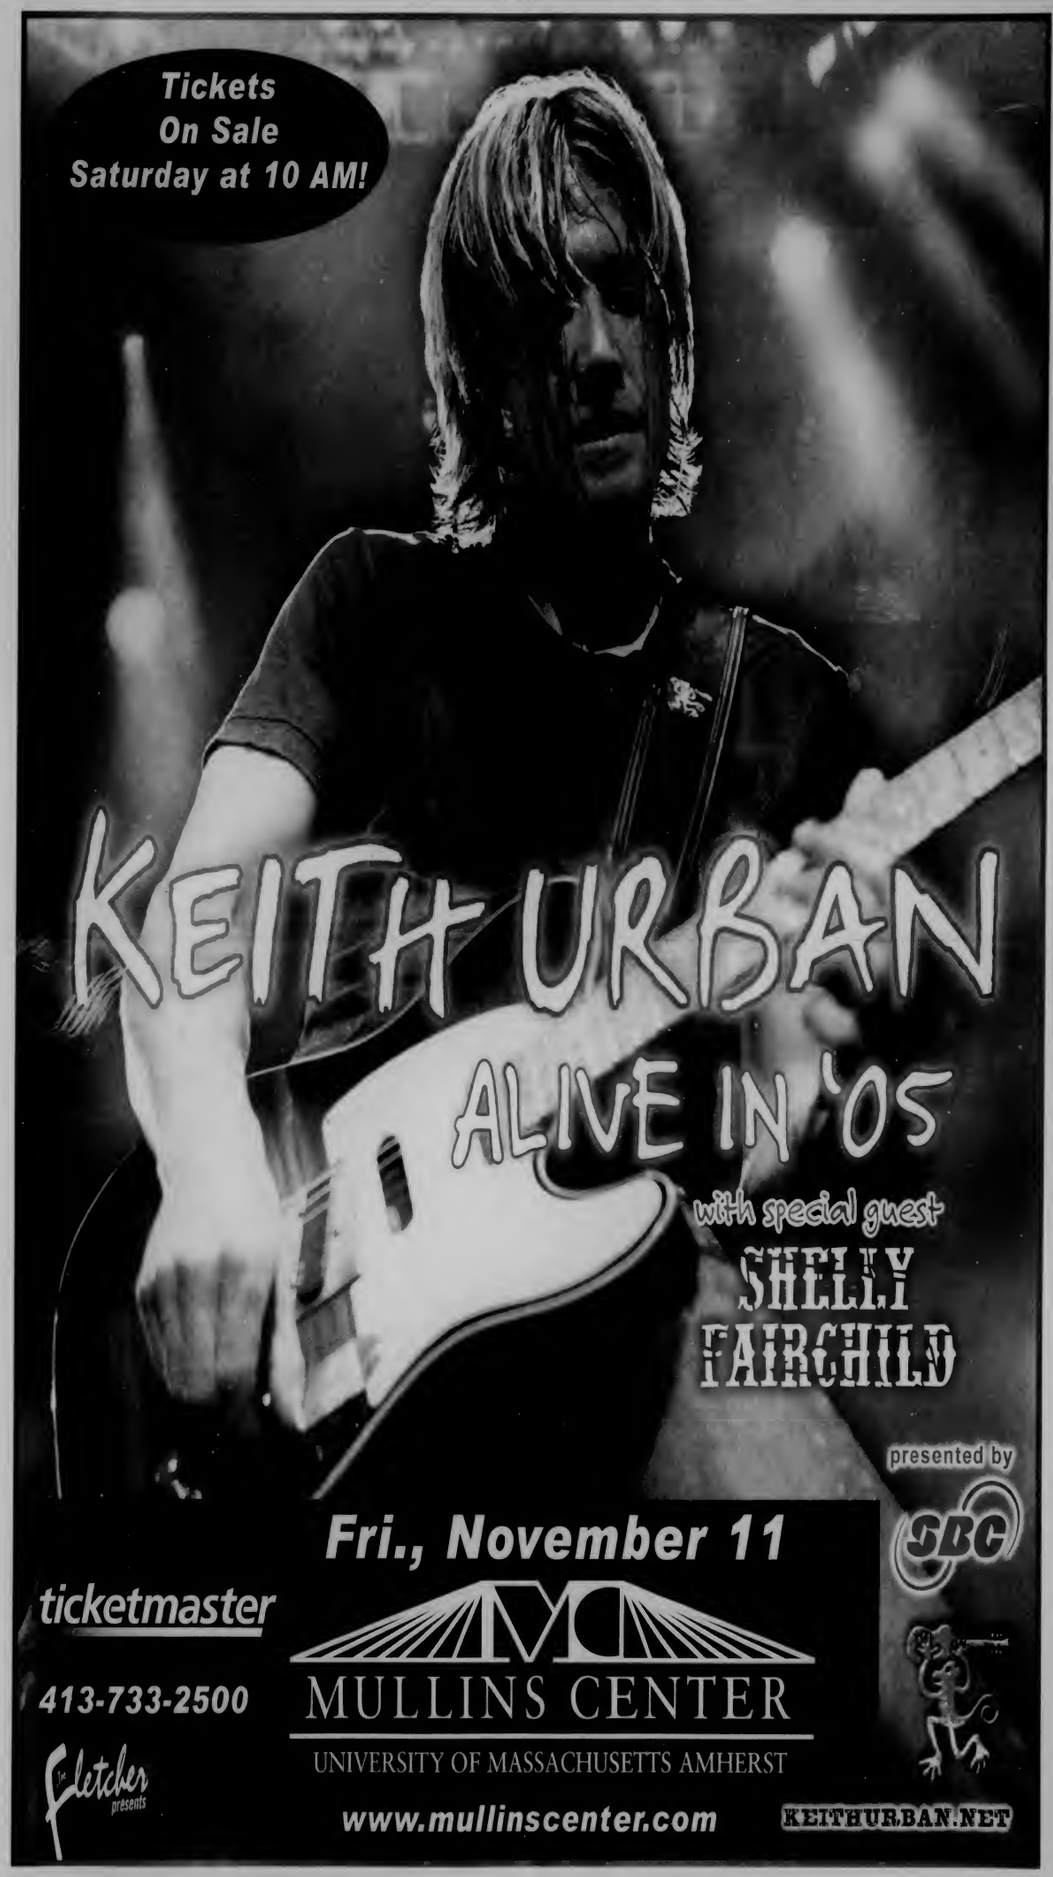
The two days include a boat tour of the 49 Islas Flotantes, (floating islands), constructed from reeds, an overnight stay with an indigenous family on the larger Amantani Island, and a visit to Taquile Island the following day. The total cost of the two day excursion is 10 US dollars.

The inhabitants of the Amantani Island, where I spent the night with a family, are Aymara, and are cut off from their distant relatives who live on the mainland. The Aymara are classified with Quechua as a separate group within the Andean subfamily of the Andean-Equatorial language family.

It amazes me how wealthy scientists, doctors, and professors choose to spend their few weeks of vacation in accommodations with outhouses, and no electricity. I met countless, retired professionals from around the world who still had the desire to travel backpacker routes, along the bumpiest roads in search of the most remote places on earth.

Travelers, including myself, have a driving curiosity about this land that remains untouched after centuries of colonization. It is a first hand historical account of the Americas that can't be learned from textbooks. It is the present reality of political, economic, and social situations that fails to be covered by the media.

Our group of 20 something travelers strapped on our bulky backpacks that had enough volume to hold a small child. The women surround us; those with babies have them wrapped up in a colorful blanket tied to their backs. Pepe assigns each of the visitors an Aymara hostess who will be in charge of us for the next 24 hours.



Nancy, our fearless leader, paced three feet ahead of us, meandering between dusty foot paths that run along adobe dwellings and through wheat covered front yards. She knew all the twists and turns of the paths, where you would twist your ankle at night or during the day, an innate familiarity that no map could record.

Dayton tops list of best four A-10 teams

By Brendan Hall

Something happened when this story last left off.

Last November, the Massachusetts women's soccer team bowed out in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament, on their home field, in a hard-fought 1-0 loss to the defensively-sound Richmond Spiders.

Since then, coach Jim Rudy has signed two blue-chippers, assistant Rebecca Myers has been replaced by former Minutewoman Angela Napoli and Nadia Villarroel's club team won a national championship.

The Minutewomen, a young squad last season, have shown signs of maturity in camp this year, and with experience under their belt should be a little more confident with the ball. Last year's "Kiddie Korps" has grown up.

"Last year we were really young, and by the end of the season we'd matured quite a bit," Rudy said. "Now it's a year later. They're more mature, they have a much better understanding (of the game), and this year, it's only breaking in two people in terms of terminology and tactics. We have a lot more harmony than we did last year."

Oh yeah, one more thing. The A-10 has expanded again.

Charlotte and Saint Louis bring the A-10 to 14 teams total, and with the conference tournament remaining a six-team pool with two first-round byes, in-conference games will count that much more.

But neither the Bilikens or 49ers are pushovers. In fact, a lot of A-10 wins are going to be hard-fought to come by.

Here's a breakdown of the teams in the Atlantic 14 that should push for November ball. Let's call them the Big Four:

Dayton Flyers (2004 Record: 20-2-0, NCAA First Round)

No matter how the cards fall in the deck, defending A-10 Champ Dayton will always be a tough place to play. They've got a tight-spaced field with a crowd close to the field, lights, buildings behind the goals, and a big-sloped terrace on one side that's known to bear some ruthless fans.

Picture a smaller Garber Field, with an environment similar to the lacrosse games and none of that Astroturf.

While the crowd always plays a factor, and it might get a little worse when they host this year's tournament, UD wouldn't be justified without some talented ball players.

Forward Reba Sedlacek is one of those dynamic players. Last year's A-10 Offensive Player of the Year knows how to throw her 5-foot-10 frame around in the air, and burned UMass last year for five points (two goals, one assist) in a 4-0 shutout. Hard to top last season, when she had one of the most prolific season in Dayton history (A-10-high 14 goals and six assists for 34 points), but it's a very real possibility.

Richmond Spiders (10-8-1, A-10 Second Round)

The Spiders will field a lot of fresh new faces after having a large turnover in which they lost three of their top five scorers to graduation. New roles will be had for new players, and the success will be dependent on how well they adapt.

Not to be forgotten either is their schedule, which has been ranked toughest in the A-10 and has them facing six opponents in total that made the NCAA's last fall. That includes a string of three straight games against NCAA teams West Virginia, Virginia, and VCU.

But if you know anything about the Spiders, it's that they love a challenge, which is why coach Peter Albright has remained very optimistic.

Case in point: they beat then-No. 7 Tennessee last season at home. Let me repeat that: the Tennessee Lady Vols, the same blue-chipped, holier-than-thou, New York Yankees of women's sports got upended by these overachievers.

Richmond prided itself on defense last year, and will look to senior co-captain Hillary Prince in the back for pressure. Prince was part of a UR defense that had nine shutouts and was one of five Spiders to lead the team with three goals.

UMass senior midfielder Lindsey Bellini leads a corps of young Minutewomen in the 2005 campaign including two top recruits. They have two new opponents now, as well.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Minutewoman senior defenseman Tiffany Hamill will have her work cut out for her trying to stop teams such as Dayton, Richmond, Saint Louis and Charlotte.

Saint Louis Bilikens (15-6-1, Conference USA Finals)

C-USA's 2004 regular season champions fell one game short of an automatic NCAA bid last year, a loss to Memphis in the conference tourney finals, and an NCAA bid this season is most certainly on the horizon.

SLU returns eight starters, including two of its most prominent stars in senior goalie Amanda Martin and junior midfield/back Courtney Hulcer.

The St. Louis native Hulcer racked up a score of honors following the Bilikens' 2004 campaign, among those C-USA Defensive Player of the Year, All-Conference First Team and perhaps the biggest of all, Second Team All-America, only the second player in the ten-year history of the program to gain such honors.

And she's only a junior. Just imagine what will happen this year, especially in a new conference.

Then there's the senior Martin, the Nashville native with a 0.53 goals against average, good enough for All-C-USA first team honors. She looks to be the focal point of a defense that returns all but one of its starters, and should be an early candidate for A-10 Goalkeeper of the Year.

Charlotte 49ers (5-12-2)

Ignore last year's record, which was comparable to a certain 49ers franchise with a despicable PR department. It was a fluke, considering the rebuilding the Niners were doing from the previous year.

Until last season, Charlotte had been one of the more prominent programs, but they should be back in the upper echelon now that they're returning their top two scorers.

Lindsey Palmeiro and Lindsey Beam combined for just eight goals in leading Charlotte last season (Palmeiro had five; Beam three), but you can always count on Charlotte to bring in the top recruits with a facility that is second to none (they have four practice fields).

It will be interesting to see how the front six plays out with all the new starters and the experience Palmeiro and Beam leading the charge, but pay attention to the defense, which is very deep. They posted five shutouts, and return everybody.

Bottom line: numbers are deceiving.

UM's unique summer

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While the majority of UMass students spent their summer going to beaches, frequenting local bars, and working unbearable jobs, the members of the Massachusetts women's soccer team had a slightly different summer vacation.

The players may have snuck in the occasional beach trip, but much of their time was spent preparing for the season.

Team members played for club teams and in tournaments all around the country, an experience that coach Jim Rudy has conflicting feelings about.

"My mind and heart is 80 percent in support of that, and 20 percent in continual anguish with fingers crossed that nobody comes back injured," Rudy said. "You don't want to lose anybody because they (club teams) certainly aren't paying the freight, they don't pay the scholarships. But they provide a bit of a service. It keeps the players fit and it gives them an experience. If they are able to play at those levels it shows that we've done well and those people are reaping the results of what we've done here."

Junior midfielder Nadia Villarroel had a very memorable experience this summer, as her Stars of Massachusetts club team won the U-19 National Championship in Orlando on July 31.

Villarroel's situation is a perfect example of Rudy's mixed feelings on players playing for teams in the offseason.

"Nadia came back with two pretty bad ankles, but she's a national champion," Rudy said. "And you don't want to take that experience away. How often do you get to be a national champion?"

Sophomore forward Britt Canfield, last year's leading scorer, got the opportunity to play with and against some top competition this summer. Canfield joined the New England Mutiny of the Women's Premier Soccer League, a league that features many players from the defunct WUSA.

"Britt got to step up into a high-level club program that's well run and loaded with quality players," Rudy said. "Britt got a chance to train and play a little bit with pretty high-level players."

With a roster stocked with New Yorkers, it comes as no surprise that UMass had a number of participants in the New York Empire State Games.

There were eight current and former players competing in all. The current Minutewomen that suited up were junior Stephanie Barrett, playing for the Hudson Valley team, senior Tiffany Hamill, playing for the Central team, and senior co-captain Amy Maffucci, playing for the Western New York team. Maffucci's team made it to the finals for the third time in four years.

While Rudy is fearful of losing a player to injury through playing on club teams, it's something that he understands his players are going to do. Rudy's understanding is certainly influenced because he was the same way as a player, trying to play soccer as much as possible.

"That's something I expect," Rudy said. "It's not a demand, but it's something I expect and understand because we try to recruit soccer junkies. They want to be good and in order to be good they believe they have to get experience."

With his players involved in soccer all year round, Rudy is aware of the potential for burnout and it is something that he guards against. To ensure that his players weren't getting worn down during training camp, Rudy reached deep into his coaching bag of tricks and decided that a camping trip would be a great way for the team to take a break and to bond.

"It's something I had done in years past at the University of Central Florida and a long time ago here," Rudy said. "The players wanted to do it. It was a team bonding thing and a chance to get them out of the cafeteria and the dorms just to take a little mental and physical break from the rigors of practice."

The team retreated to the woods behind senior Morgan Czaja's house in Adams, Mass., and spent the day and night hiking, barbecuing, and relaxing.

Rudy found the experience to be valuable, and although the trip may have been a bit unusual, it's hard to argue with the methods of the coach with the fourth best winning percentage in NCAA history.

And who knows, after hundreds of hours spent on the soccer field this offseason, it may just turn out that one night in the woods was the most important component of a successful 2005 season.

Bullen is unquestioned leader on UMass

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The stories have been told and the articles written on how UMass senior men's soccer captain Oral Bullen grew up in the heart of Brooklyn and how he is now the Minuteman's number-one scoring threat and team leader.

However, Bullen hasn't always been UMass' main man on offense. Although he played in all 20 games of his 2002 freshman season, his playing time was still very limited. That season Bullen only managed to get off 10 shots, with just one finding the back of the net.

By comparison, the Maroon and White's leading scorer that season was Jeff Deren, who had an astounding 22 goals on 92 shots. It's no surprise that Bullen had such a limited role on a team that had such prominent scorer such as Deren.

UMass coach Sam Koch explains that Bullen's lack of offensive production was a combination of little playing time and not yet understanding the Minutemen's system. Koch's philosophy is that when you get an opportunity to shoot, you take the shot.

"As with most kids coming out of high school, he didn't understand that we don't get upset when you miss shots," Koch said. "We get upset when you miss opportunities."

When Koch was recruiting Bullen out of Martin Luther King High School in Brooklyn, he said that Bullen had all the positive qualities he was looking for.

"He's just a genuinely good human," Koch said. "He has great character, incredible speed and good enthusiasm for the game."

Koch knew it was these qualities that would help shape Bullen from the kid from Brooklyn into a Division I college star.

Don't take this the wrong way, however. It's not as if Bullen had a lot of growing up to do to get where he is today. Koch was reassuring in addressing that Oral had already done his fair share of growing up.

"After the first year academically, he was already pretty mature," Koch said. "It wasn't one of those boy-to-man deals at all."

In his sophomore season of 2003, Bullen saw much more of the field and took advantage of the opportunity that was given to him. The so-called sophomore slump was nowhere to be seen.

It's hard to decipher at exactly which point in 2003 Bullen's collegiate career took a turning point.

Perhaps it was when he scored multiple times against Birmingham South on Sept. 5, and against St. Bonaventure on Oct. 26. Or maybe it was when he scored three points (one goal, one assist) against Navy on Nov. 14.

All that is known is that at some point during his sophomore campaign Bullen went from role player to top tier scorer.

That season Bullen saw vast improvements in all of his offensive numbers. He took four times as many shots as his freshman season (41) and scored eight goals to go along with four assists. His 20 points were good for second on the team.

Also in 2003, Bullen showed that, when it mattered, he wanted the ball on his foot. He scored two of his four career game-winning goals as a sophomore. He also stepped up his game in conference play. Against Atlantic 10 competition, Bullen recorded 12 points (5 goals, 2 assists) in 11 games.

It seemed that Bullen's breakout 2003 season showed just how good he is and how many skills he utilizes on the field. His coach continually praises the captain's wheels.

"He has incredible speed," Koch said. "His speed is what puts him ahead of everybody else."

Last year, Bullen was recognized for his leadership skills as he was named captain of the Minutemen. Although just a junior at the time, the title seemed to fit him very well.

Last season again saw all of Bullen's numbers rise for a third consecutive year. He led UMass in every offensive category. His 25 points were good for third in the A-10, and his nine goals tied him for second in the conference.

Also for the third consecutive year, Bullen's shot percentage rose nearly 100 points from .100 in 2002 to .195 in 2003 and finally .281 a year ago.

So not only was he taking more shots, but he was finishing them more often as well.

Bullen also gained a skill during his junior season that completes any great player in almost any sport. That is the ability to make the players around them better. Michael Jordan could do it in basketball and Wayne Gretzky could do it on the ice.

Bullen's five assists a year ago were a career high for him and placed him 10th in the A-10. His improved ability may have come from necessity more than anything else.

After the breakout season of 2003, more people began to notice Bullen. Those people included the opposition. Last year, opposing coaches started shadowing Bullen with their best defenders to try and make him a non-factor. Saying their attempts failed is an understatement.

Coach Koch believes Bullen's ability to distribute the ball is what makes him such a complete player.

"Last year, he showed a more apparent ability to find other players and that's very important," Koch said. "His field vision is much better."

Its still to be seen where Bullen's game can go from here. It already seems he's the total package. If his game continues to improve, 2005 should be a very exciting time in Amherst.

ular season title, some things will have to fall into place and adversity , in the form of injuries , will need to be overcome.

Bullen may be the best in the conference at the offensive end, but the rest of the teams in the A-10 certainly know his capabilities. And he will assuredly receive the full attention of the opposing defenses; a complimentary scorer or a team scoring effort may take some of the defensive pressure off Bullen and allow the conference all-star to display his ability.

"Our defense is solid," Koch said. "Our midfield is solid. We have to identify who's going to score consistently.

"[Bullen] is definitely an All-Conference player. Who is going to be the second player who picks up the slack? Who's going to be able to take the pressure off of Oral?"

Questions always fly at the beginning of a season. For now, the dilemma is scoring.

The Minutemen will have time to tighten some screws as the schedule shifts into full gear, but they got their chance at a top-of-the-line driving lesson during a scrimmage with Major League Soccer's New England Revolution in Foxboro on Aug. 29.

The conference season begins about a month down the road with a match up against Rhode Island on Oct. 9, and Koch does not downplay the importance of conference games.

"The Rhode Island game is the start of A-10," he said. "That's the point of our season that we have to be firing on all pistons. We have to be meshing as a unit because those are the games that count and will extend our season to the post season.

"[Rhode Island is] the point on the timeline that we are gearing towards."

2005 A-10 outlook

D/MF Salim Lewis, D Giannis Miras

Notables: After a dreadful 2004 season in which they lost 12 games including seven conference losses, things aren't looking much better for the Rams in 2005. Fordham returns only two of their top six scorers from a year ago. Also, not one player on they Rams' 2005 roster recorded more than seven points last season.

George Washington Colonials
Head Coach: George Lidster (18th Year)
2004 Record: 10-9-4 (6-3-2 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: MF Frank Ambrosio, Sr. (7g, 4a), F Jon Allen, Sr. (6g, 5a), F Andre Chapman, Sr. (6g, 4a), D Benjamin Mortimer (5g, 0a)
Newcomer: F Michael Rollings

Notables: The defending Atlantic 10 champions look to defend their crown in 2005. They advanced to the NCAA Tournament before being ousted in the second round where they fell to Virginia Commonwealth University 2-0.

LaSalle Explorers
Head Coach: Pat Farrell (19th Year)
2004 record: 10-9-1 (6-6 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: D Scott Golden, Sr., MF/F Marc Rostant, Sr., MF/F Dusun Vujovic, Sr.
Newcomers: MF Brian Barry, G Andrew Bernhard, MF Jim Davis, MF James Guntle, F Daniel Heavey, F Kevin Lydic

Notables: The graduation of standout goalkeeper, Stash Graham, left La Salle head coach Pat Farrell with a very big void to fill on his team. Farrell thinks he has found a sufficient replacement for arguably the program's best goalie ever in freshman Andrew Bernhard.

Massachusetts Minutemen
Head Coach: Sam Koch (15th Year)
2004 Record: 8-9-2 (5-4-2 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: F Oral Bullen, Sr. (9g, 5a), MF Matty Lemire, Soph. (3g, 3a), Rob Charest, Soph.
Newcomers: MF Tony Bassett, F Mike DeSantis, D David Spatcher, MF Michael Connolly

Notables: In 2004 UMass played in a school-record eight overtime games, posting an impressive 5-1-2 mark in extra time. Four of the eight games went into double overtime. UMass, DePaul, Wright State, Penn State and Siena were the only teams in the nation to play eight or more overtime games.

Rhode Island Rams
Head Coach: Ed Bradley (16th Year)
2004 Record: 12-8-1 (6-4-1 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: MF Jeffery Gonsalves, Jr. (9g, 8a), B Lukasz Tumicz, Soph. (3g, 4a), MF Brian Mazza, Sr. (1g, 7a)
Newcomers: F Kedan Crosby, F Jeff Guntzviller, B Kevin Hamill, D Adam Howarth, B Brett Reels

Notables: This season the Rams are a without a key piece to their stellar 2004 campaign. The graduation of Sasha Gotsmanov leaves Rhode Island with a massive void on the offensive side of the ball. Gotsmanov lead the Rams in just about every offensive category including goals (19), assists (8), points (46) and shots (73).

Richmond Spiders
Head Coach: Jeff Gettler (11th Season)
2004 Record: 3-13-2 (2-8-1 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: F Colin Vint, Sr. (5g, 5a), MF Steven Wolfe, Sr. (5g, 4a), GK Eric Sciochetti, Soph. (2.40 Goals Against Average, .730 Save Percentage)
Newcomers: B/F Scott Loesser, B Thomas Kale, MF Kern Gardiner, MF Karl Waarsdorp, B Graham Miller, MF Delano Pierre

Notables: Richmond is a young team that is trying to bounce back from an abysmal 2004 campaign. The Spiders are, however, encouraged that they can improve on their 3-13-2 mark of a year ago that included 1-5-1 on the road.

Saint Joseph's Hawks
Head Coach: Tom Turner (18th Season)
2004 Record: 3-14-1 (2-8-1 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: F Chris Powell, Soph. (3g, 1a), D/MF John Creed, Soph. (2g, 0a), F/MF Josh Simon, Soph. (1g, 1a)
Newcomers: M Andrew Tursi, F/MF Michael McInaw

Notables: As with the Richmond Spiders, the Saint Joseph's Hawks are also looking to greatly improve on its performance in 2004. Last season was viewed as a rebuilding season for a Hawks team that played more than a dozen freshmen and sophomores regularly.

Saint Louis Billikens
Head Coach: Dan Donigan (5th Year)
2004 Record: 9-8-1 (5-3-1)
Key Returning Players: MF Ryan Wileman, Sr. (8g, 3a), MF John DiRaimondo, Jr. (4g, 3a), MF Alex Matteson, Jr. (4g, 3a)
Newcomers: B Calum Angus, F Kyle Patterson, MF Dado Hamzagic, MF Eric Sweetin, MF Chad Hagerty, F Larry Geraghty, F Matt Mach

Notables: Saint Louis is out to prove in 2005 that their disappointing record of 9-8-1 was a fluke and that they will make it back to the NCAA tournament this fall. The Billikens' offense in 2004 was very inconsistent. They were shutout in seven of their eight losses. However, on the other side, they were 9-1-1 in games in which they scored.

Saint Bonaventure Bonnies
Head Coach: Mel Mahler (1st Season)
2004 Record: 8-9-1 (4-7 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: MF Andy Garcia, Sr. (4g, 10a), MF Konrad Paszkowski (5g, 2a), F Kevin Omokhua, Jr. (5g, 1a)
Newcomers: D Charlie Klingensmith, F Kenny Boutsabouabane

Notables: 2005 marks the inaugural year for new Bonnies head coach Mel Mahler, who brings 26 years of experience to St. Bonaventure including 10 seasons at Bowling Green. Mahler replaces Bill Brady, who coached the Bonnies for the last six seasons before leaving the school for Greensboro College.

Temple Owls
Head Coach: David MacWilliams (5th Year)
2004 Record: 12-8-2 (7-2-2 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: MF Tony Donatelli, Sr. (6g, 9a), F Nick Ebersole, Sr. (3g, 3a), Ryan Heins, Jr. (3g, 3a)
Newcomers: F Menzi Buthelezi, MF Guillaume Chevrollier, MF Michael Minai, D Tyler Goffi

Notables: The Owls enter 2005 missing a key part of their stellar 12-8-2 mark of a year ago. Star goalkeeper Patrick Hannigan is no longer with team after graduating. Last season, Hannigan had a 1.00 goals against average and a remarkable .817 save percentage. This year, Hannigan has signed a contract to play for the Bray Wanderers of the Irish Soccer League.

Xavier Musketeers
Head Coach: Dave Schureck (1st Year)
2004 Record: 5-12-2 (3-6-2 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: M/F Toni Skudrzik, Jr. (7g, 4a), M Jimmy Cummingsk, Soph. (4g, 2a), D Chris Wolever (4g, 2a)
Newcomers: M Geoff Cooke, GK Joe Diederich, M/F Gavin Dozier, D Michael Scholten

Notables: A new and promising era of Xavier Soccer will begin with the 2005 season as first-year head coach Dave Schureck takes over the reigns of the Musketeer soccer program. Schureck comes to Xavier with the goal of rebuilding his alma mater's soccer program after five successful seasons as the head coach at the University of Dayton. Schureck accumulated a winning percentage of nearly .700 in conference play while with the Flyers and expects the Musketeers to compete at a high level immediately.

Soccer team has young roster

Midfield:

Michael Donnelly — He made his first start against Santa Clara last season, and his lone point during his 19 games last year came against Maine on Sept. 11, when he tallied an assist.

Jason Scudamore — Scudamore sat out the 2004 campaign in order to redshirt his junior year. He will come back to the Minutemen this season a year wiser after watching from the sidelines. During his sophomore year in 2003, he played in 19 games, starting 16, posting five points with one goal and three assists.

Tony Bassett — Bassett graduated from Marin Academy as a three-time Bay Counties All-League player in San Francisco last year. He was the Bay Counties League Most Valuable Player and Far West All-American during his senior season, scoring 16 goals and racking up 16 assists.

Michael Connolly — The incoming freshman graduated from Amherst Regional High School and spent his last two years of high school in Argentina at the University of Buenos Aires and the University of Belgrano taking Spanish classes. Connolly played club soccer with Tetra Brazil during his stay in Argentina.

Defense:

Craig Canavan — He was named the UMass Fall Scholar Athlete in 2004 while playing 16 games, 14 of which he started. Canavan tallied his first assist in a win over Saint Bonaventure and emerged as a vocal leader for a young defense. The Minutemen were 5-2 in games that Canavan started in 2004.

Tim Kitchell — Kitchell made a splash with his first goal of the season last year, scoring in the second overtime against George Washing-ton to seal the victory for the Minutemen. He gave UMass coach Sam Koch an assist: his first goal that he headed into the back of the net turned out to be the game winner, giving Koch his 150th career win. Last season he posted a career-high three points.

Todd Skelton — He started 12 of the 13 games in which he played last year and finished the season with two assists while adding valuable midfield support for the Minutemen.

Gil Jenkins — Jenkins redshirted last season; he was twice named an NWAACC All-Star, and won the 2003 Most Valuable Defensive Player of the Year award while attending North Idaho College.

Doug Rappaport — He appeared in his first four games as a reserve before playing his way into the lineup, starting the next 14.

Kenny Cook — The 6-foot-5 defender played 12 games in a reserve roll in 2004, adding significant size to the UMass defense. He handed out an assist to Oral Bullen for the game-winning goal against Fordham on Oct. 22.

Chris Brow — The redshirt freshman was a four-year varsity player at Salpointe Catholic High School and helped his team to the 2004 Class 5A State Championship. Brow was Second Team All-Southern Arizona and Second Team All-State during his senior year in high school.

David Spatcher – A Canton High School graduate, Spatcher was a four-time Academic All-Conference selection and helped his team to the 2003 Class "S" State Championship.

Goalie:

Nick Billman — All 10 of his appearances in net last year came as a starter. He turned in a solid performance against La Salle on Oct. 24, posting a career-high 10 saves. Billman led the Minutemen to a 3-0-1 record in the first two weeks of October of 2004.

UMass looks to tighten some loose screws

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

If you asked 100 college coaches about their respective team's chances in the upcoming season, the vast majority would spout a generic speech about playing 110 percent or giving total commitment.

But Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch doesn't have the premature, lofty expectations that sometimes get coaches in trouble. He's looking forward to the 2005 season, but as far as predictions are concerned, Koch isn't getting too far ahead.

"We're definitely going to compete," he said. "But as far as how we're going to do, I'll tell you in November."

Koch is excited about the incoming talent that will be gracing the UMass sidelines this fall. Underclassmen will comprise over half of the team, and the immediate success of the Minutemen will depend on chemistry between the veterans and the rookies.

"Chemistry is very important," Koch said. "We are all battling together. How quickly the new players mesh is a part of it. Sometimes it takes a long time to mesh. Sometimes they can step in right away. The key is how soon they step in."

No team can be successful and consistent without leadership to steady the ship, no matter the source. But it doesn't hurt to have the leading offensive force returning for a second year of captainship, ready and willing to share the glory with his teammates.

That would be Oral Bullen, who led the Minutemen in all offensive categories in the 2004 season, scoring nine goals while dishing out five assists, totaling 23 points on the season.

He finished third in the Atlantic 10 in points and tied for second in goals. His ubiquitous presence will make his teammates better and give them added confidence. Koch is certainly happy to see his star player suiting up for another season.

"You have to be excited," he said about Bullen's return. "It's a pleasure to have him on the team, to watch him play. I look forward to every game he plays."

During Bullen's freshman and sophomore years, UMass made it to the A-10 tournament by finishing first in the division in back-to-back seasons. With so many new faces on the sideline, the senior captain is adamant about having the freshmen become accustomed to the old winning ways.

"When I came up the first year I watched the older guys take us to two regular season titles," Bullen recalled. "I'd like to do that for the younger guys."

The Minutemen finished with a 5-4-2 conference record last season and finished seventh in the league, a full 10 points behind regular season champion Duquesne and one spot out of the playoff picture.

UMass will have its work cut out for it this season. If the Minutemen are to achieve their captain's goal of winning the reg-

Yet another 2005 season of Atlantic 10 men's soccer is upon us. Many questions still remain to be answered.

For example, how will the new coaches in the league perform? Or will the conference champion George Washington Colonials be able to repeat?

Competition this season looks to heat up as two new teams have been added for the fall. Even with the additions of St. Louis and Charlotte, all 14 teams will still be fighting over the same spots to make the conference tournament.

Charlotte 49ers
Head Coach: John Tart (11th Year)
2004 Record: 11-7-1 (5-4 Conference USA)
Key Returning Players (2004 totals): F Adam Ruud, Sr. (11 goals, 2 assists), MF Floyd Franks, Sr. (5g, 2a), G Josh Beachem, Sr. (1.46 goals against average, .772 save percentage)
Newcomers: D/MF Jeff Favitta, D/MF Beau Fraser, MF Alex Robinson, D/MF Sean Fogelson, F Kevin Fox

Notables: 2005 marks the inaugural Atlantic-10 season for the 49ers as last year they participated in Conference-USA play. Charlotte made it all the way to the C-USA semifinal game before being ousted from the tournament by second-seeded UAB in double overtime

The 49ers return their two top scorers, Adam Ruud and Floyd Franks, from 2004. However, they lost a key part of their team in the form of Mira Muiper who was third on the team last year in scoring.

Dayton Flyers
Head Coach: Dennis Currier (1st Year)
2004 Record: 11-7-1 (8-3 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: F Omar Jarun, Sr. (9g, 2a), D/MF Nate Darr, Sr. (5g, 3a), MF George Nanchoff, Sr. (2g, 6a) F Aaron Swanson, Soph. (2g, 4a)
Newcomers: G Alex Davis, MF Troy Thompson, MF Ryan Hefley, D Lawrence DeGeest

Notables: Senior forward Omar Jarun was named to the Atlantic 10 Preseason All-Conference team. Jarun is the A-10's leading returning scorer.

The Flyers boasted a perfect 7-0 record at home in 2004. Away from Baujan Field, however, their record dipped below .500 to 4-6. Three of Dayton's first five matches will take place on the road before a stretch of four home matches in a row.

Duquesne Dukes
Head Coach: Wade Jean (8th Year)
2004 Record: 13-6-1 (9-2 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: D Noah Salsi, Jr. (5g, 3a), M Travis Mackenzie, Soph. (5g, 1a), F Andrew Bell, Sr. (5g, 1a), G Zach Varga, Jr. (0.82 gaa, .754 save percentage)
Newcomers: F Drew Jeffery, M Steve Smola, M Ross Goffi, M Evan Browne

Notables: The Dukes had three of their players named to the preseason Atlantic 10 All-Conference team. Juniors Noah Salsi and Zach Varga were named All-Conference and incoming freshman Evan Browne was named to the All-Rookie Team.

The defending A-10 regular season champions are returning eight starters and 14 lettermen to the team.

Fordham Rams
Head Coach: Jim McElderry (3rd Year)
2004 Record: 3-12-3 (1-7-3 Atlantic 10)
Key Returning Players: F Anthony Akande Jr., (3g, 1a), MF Mike Forenza, Sr. (2g, 1a)
Newcomers: D/MF Sam Acheampong, D Roe Burrell, D Zach Intemann, MF Grant Kerr, sion kept him away from the game.

So when a defense that is returning all 22 of the players that were on the end-of-the-season depth chart in 2004 - including Cobbs but not Costello - Brown can afford to shake things up.

And he shouldn't have any reason to believe this maneuver won't pay dividends for this team.

"With R.J. going to offense, and Steve coming back from a medical, it's a pretty good trade for our football team. We're excited," Brown said.

"We still have Brandon [London] and J.J. [Moore], who are two proven receivers in this league and can flat-out play. Dominique Stewart gives us a veteran presence and is a third-receiver type, and young Victor Cruz is coming along well, and so is [Rasheed] Rancher."

London is another receiver who is expected to have a breakout season. His 34 catches, 439 yards and 12.9 average yards per catch were all second to Peebler's numbers.

A big target, London is 6-foot-4 and 210 lbs., and he has shown flashes of having big-play capability and likes to go down the field with the ball.

Also returning is J.J. Moore, who is only a redshirt sophomore but is coming off a season in which he was often found on the field when the offense was in search of a big play or a key first down. He started to catch fire late last year, catching 11 passes for 176 yards and three touchdowns during the team's season-ending, three-game winning streak.

Also expected to compete for playing time and contribute are Stewart, redshirt sophomore Rasheed Rancher and freshman Victor Cruz.

Stewart has combined for 64 catches, 717 yards and two scores over the past two seasons, while Rancher, who stands at 6-foot-5, could wreak havoc on smaller defensive teams if he is on the field at the same time as London.

Cruz is another tremendous athlete similar to Cobbs. He is coming off a senior year in high school in which he scored 19 touchdowns, including 15 receiving, one rushing, one punt return, one kick return and one interception return.

The latter two came within 30 seconds of each other.

"I couldn't ask for anybody better," senior starting quarterback Tim Day said about his receivers. "We lost [Peebler], who was great. This year, we're more solid all around. All of them are great. All of them can do different things, and that what makes them great. They are great kids, they all work hard, and every one of them has the ability to be All-Conference."

While the depth of this group is undeniable, it is still the man at the top of that list who will cause opposing defenses the most trouble because he can be used in so many different ways since he already knows how to play out of the backfield and in the flat.

He will always be a threat to run the reverse, and his explosiveness will have his defenders on their toes as to not get caught if the Minutemen run a screen play through him as a wideout.

Cobbs is trying to model his game after former Atlantic 10 stars Brian Westbrook, who played at Villanova and is now with the Eagles, and Jerry Azumah, who was a legend at New Hampshire and now plays with the Chicago Bears.

All three players are exceptional athletes, and Azumah and Westbrook both made their names as great running backs.

"R.J. is something else," Day said. "You get him the ball, and he does unbelievable things. In the scrimmage [on Aug. 16], he only touched the ball two times, and he had like 40 or 50 yards."

But no matter how promising the receivers are on paper, one thing remains true.

"Our wide receivers are talented young players who can make plays," Brown said. "Obviously, the important thing is the quarterback has to get the ball to those guys and get it to them in spots where they can make plays."

With Day about to launch his second full season under center, he will definitely be looking to build on one of the more successful statistical seasons by a UMass quarterback in team history.

His 2,481 passing yards were good for fourth all-time, while his 23 touchdown tosses were the third best in school history and his efficiency rating of 130.9 placed him in seventh.

"We have the tools to be as good as any other team that's ever been here," Day said. "Talent-wise, I don't think you can argue. I think we have the capability to do great things."

With the offensive arsenal that will surround him in the huddle throughout the season, he sure has a point.

Oct. 16 last season, rolling over the Wildcats 38-21. In that decision, Steve Baylark was named the MVP, rushing for 193 yds., and recording a career-high three trips to the end zone.

4. At Delaware, Nov. 5, 1 p.m.

A year removed from its National Title, the Blue Hens remain a stiff competitor in the A-10. Finishing 2004 with a 9-3 record, Delaware also made it to the NCAA quarterfinals, before falling to William and Mary 38-44 in double overtime. The game in 2005 holds the possibility of payback for the Minutemen, who fell to Delaware 21-7 last season. The Blue Hens return quarterback Sonny Riccio (259-443, 2689 yds., 16 TD, 14 INT.) and Kyle Campbell (93 tackles).

5. At Army, Nov. 12, TBA

This match-up, which will air on the ESPN Network, will mark the fifth straight against a 1-A opponent for UMass (Boston College, Kansas State, N.C. State and Marshall were the previous four). Although Army's 2004 record was below average at 2-9, with Bobby Ross at the helm, Army is certainly a viable threat towards the Minutemen. Ross coached the San Diego Chargers to a super bowl and Georgia Tech to the national championship.

6. Albany, Sept. 17, 6 p.m.

This out-of-conference game is a must see for the sole reason of its location and time. It is the home-opener for the Minutemen and will be played on a classic New England stage . under the lights. In last season's first meeting at McGuirk (also a night game), 16,405 fans attended, which was the most since 1974. The fan-power allowed for a 30-20 decision over then No. 4 Colgate. This will be the first time that these two teams meet.

Minutemen roll deep at every position

...ve a national championship, and the talent of the starters, the depth of the backups and the game planning by one of the smarter coaching staffs in the country should put them in place to do so.

Here is a positional breakdown of UMass' 2005 roster:

Quarterback:

It's hard to argue against Tim Day's numbers last season, his first one as the starter for the Minutemen. He threw for 2,481 yards, the fifth most passing yards in program history, and his 23 touchdowns were good for third in the record books.

"I feel a lot better," Day said about the difference between this year and last. "I know the offense 10 times better. Being able to read defenses is a huge difference in one year. We're excited, but the offense is 10 times better than we were last year."

Redshirt freshman Liam Coen saw plenty of time in spring practice because Day came down with mononucleosis, and he took full advantage of his reps. Coen should be peaking over Day's shoulder for playing time all season.

Another redshirt freshman, Taylor Humphrey, who transferred from Hawaii, ensures the coaching staff some confidence knowing the team is three deep at the quarterback position. Last year, Humphrey backed up Timmy Chang, the NCAA's all-time leading passer, and he hails from the same high school in California as San Francisco 49ers quarterback Ken Dorsey, who led the Miami Hurricanes to a national championship in 2001.

"[Day] is the incumbent," Brown said. "He's doing a good job. Liam is certainly working hard and doing a quality job at times, and Taylor Humphrey is certainly better now than he was in the spring. We can continue to compete and continue to evaluate every single day at the quarterback position just like we do at every position."

Running backs:

Junior tailback Steve Baylark has rushed for back-to-back 1,100-yard seasons, and he literally carried the offense during its hot streak at the end of last season. His 1,138 rushing yards were tops in the Atlantic 10 in 2004, and he was named to the A-10 First Team as a result.

The Minutemen were 4-1 when Baylark topped the 100-yard plateau last season and just 2-4 when he didn't.

The coaching staff is extremely high on junior transfer Matt Lawrence, who is expected to be the lightning to Baylark's thunder in the backfield this season. Lawrence rushed 28 times for 117 yards and found the endzone twice last year for the Connecticut Huskies.

Redshirt senior Raunny Rosario should fill out the depth chart at running back. As a backup to R.J. Cobbs in 2002, he rushed for 758 yards and three touchdowns.

Frank McDonald has solidified his position as the starting fullback and will take over for two-year starter Rich Demers, who signed with the Cincinnati Bengals in April before being cut in training camp.

This will be McDonald's first year with the team, as he sat out last year due to NCAA transfer rules. He played his first two years of college ball under Brown at Northeastern and left the Huskies with Brown prior to last season.

Wide Receivers:

The receiving corps lost one of the more successful wideouts in program history in Jason Peebler, who signed with the Philadelphia Eagles in April before being cut last month. To make up for that loss, Brown has decided to put R.J. Cobbs, the team's most versatile athlete, in Peebler's place.

Cobbs rushed for over 1,000 yards in 2002 and was named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year, and he was UMass' top cornerback last year when he wasn't injured.

Cobbs has highlight-reel ability and will provide a real spark at the head of a deep group of receivers.

Brandon London is the biggest target of the returning starters, as he stands at 6-foot-4 and weighs in at 210 pounds.

J.J. Moore proved to come up big in key situations last year and is a solid possession receiver, and Dominique Stewart will provide a strong veteran presence among the top-four receivers.

Sophomore Rasheed Rancher, who made two appearances as a backup last year, has had a solid camp and is another big target at 6-foot-5. Freshman Victor Cruz has opened eyes across the whole team with his amazing ability at camp, and he could see some quality time at receiver this year if he is not redshirted.

Tight Ends:

Senior Mike Douglas is the only tight end who has started for the Minutemen in the past. He caught 18 balls for 183 yards and is a great blocker.

Brown plans to use multiple offensive schemes that could involve three tight ends, and Chris Hopkins, a 6-foot-3, 260 pound converted offensive lineman should play a bigger role this year. His first career reception was for a touchdown in last year's season finale against Hofstra.

Ian Jorgensen should also see some time in Brown's system.

Offensive Line:

UMass returns one of the best offensive lines in college football this season, even with the loss of captain Rob Kane.

It was a line that opened up holes for its running backs to amass 1,527 yards last year, and it only allowed one sack per 38 passing attempts, the best ratio in the nation.

There is a little cause for concern for the line injury-wise, however. Senior right tackle O.J. McBride has been on the sidelines with no time table for his return, and senior captain and starting left tackle Colin Stoetzel has been banged up but isn't expected to miss any game action.

The line is returning two other starters from last year. Junior Alex Miller, who is considered one of the smartest members on the football team, will be starting at center for the third straight year.

Junior David Thompson returns as the starting right guard while sophomore Matt Austin and senior transfer Brent Caldwell will sure up the left guard position that has been vacated by Kane.

"[Miller] is without question the leader of the offensive line," Brown said. "He knows every front. He can identify all of the important pieces. He is the glue that holds the whole thing together.

"I think our offensive line is as good as any in the Atlantic 10. Their continuity is extremely important to our success."

Clockwise from top-left, quarterback Tim Day, wide receiver R.J. Cobbs, running back Steve Baylark and free safety Shannon James may be four of UMass' most influential components this season.

Defensive Line:

The defensive line was a huge question mark last year, but the front-end of the defense is stacked this year.

Senior defensive end Keron Williams was the anchor in the trenches last season and should have an outstanding campaign this year with the added depth around him. Williams led the team with six sacks and 15.5 tackles for loss last year, and he will see time both on the line and in the two-point stance as a linebacker.

"Last year was my breakout year because it was my first year starting," Williams said. "Injuries held me back last year, but this year I'm feeling good, I'm really focused, and I've got a good group with me so I'm ready to get out there and make that run."

Redshirt junior transfer John Hatchell will make his first appearance for the Maroon and White after sitting out last year for transferring from Lehigh. Hatchell, who will start at defensive tackle, is the strongest player on the team, as the 6-foot-2, 270 pounder can bench press 500 pounds and squat 600 pounds.

Another transfer, sophomore Patrick Powell has had an impressive camp and will start opposite of Williams at defensive end.

The arrival of Powell allows Brown to move Justin Schweighardt from defensive end to defensive tackle, which will allow the team's four best defensive linemen to be on the field at the same time.

The line goes at least nine deep with Jason Leonard, Wilner Alexis, Ola Sanusi, Jason Hill and David Burris expecting to see snaps this season as backups.

Linebackers:

The linebacking corps was leaned on heavily last season to pick up slack left by an undersized defensive line, but with the solid group in front of them this year, the linebackers are expected to turn it loose and have a great amount of success.

Senior middle linebacker Serge Tikum, a defensive captain for the second straight year led the team with 82 total tackles and 62 individual tackles. He recorded five tackles for loss and three sacks as well.

L.A. Love is another standout linebacker, who compliments Tikum nicely, but a concern over the summer for the coaching staff is the limited amount of time Tikum and Love spent on the field due to nagging injuries.

What this did do, however, was get some of the younger players, such as freshman George Byrd, some more practice time, which will help them understand Brown's complicated defensive system.

Senior Brad Anderson, who recorded 63 tackles, and junior Charles Walker, who registered 69 tackles and tied a team record with 23 tackles against Delaware, will see plenty of action again this year.

Secondary:

This is the part of the defense that everyone in the Atlantic 10 raves about. They were one of the best secondaries in the league last year, and the group is better this year with the return of senior cornerback Steve Costello, who redshirted last year with an abdominal injury.

The defensive backs are led by All-American senior captain Shannon James, who is getting attention from National Football League front offices, and some preseason scouting boards have him listed as high as a fourth-round draft pick next April.

The Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year picked off eight passes last season, good for second in the country, and his 16 career interceptions are more than any active Division I player in the football world.

"He's amazing," Cobbs said. "He took a pick over me one day in practice where he just jumped over my head and grabbed it. There is not a play that you don't see Shannon a part of, and that is the type of player we need.

"I'm glad he's on my team. I wouldn't want to go against him. He's taking over now. He's on top of the game. You've got to get down on your knees and bow down to him. He's the king."

If opposing offenses solely focus on James, though, they will find themselves getting burnt by the rest of the secondary.

Brandon Smith and James Ihedigbo are battling for position at the strong safety spot with Smith having a slight advantage. Ihedigbo, who is from Amherst, is great at playing close to the line and stopping the run if Brown wanted to put three safeties on the field at once.

Costello, who Brown says is 10 pounds lighter and back to his old form, was expected to be the top cornerback in the league last year before his injury.

Playing on the other side of him will be junior Tracy Belton, who intercepted five passes last year. Brandon Freeman was a huge surprise last season as a true freshman and saw a lot of playing time because of various injuries.

Don't be surprised to see Cobbs playing in nickel packages along with Greg Scott, who is also a midfielder on the lacrosse team.

Adding to the depth of the cornerbacks are Michael Meggett and Sean Smalls. Meggett is a redshirt freshman who transferred from West Virginia and was able to watch cornerback Adam Jones, who the Tennessee Titans made the sixth overall pick of the NFL Draft in April. He is also the second cousin of former New England Patriot Dave Meggett.

Smalls is a freshman who was a highly sought after recruit out of Virginia. He ran an interception back 109 yards for a touchdown, a national high school record, and he is an amazing athlete who could win Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year if he earns enough playing time.

Special Teams:

Christian Koegel averaged 41.3 yards per punt last season, good for 17th best in the nation. His 76-yard stroke against Delaware last season was the third-longest punt in program history, and he was named to the Atlantic 10 Preseason First Team.

Freshman Armando Cuko will be taking over the placekicking job this season, and he looked solid during a scrimmage on Aug. 16, knocking home five field goals in a row for the offense.

"He certainly lived up to expectations [in the scrimmage]," Brown said. "He missed the first one, but from then on, he was special. It's nice to be able to put the ball down on the 25 [yard line] and in and know that you have a good shot at three points."

Cobbs and Costello will share return duties this season, but others who will see some action are Lawrence and junior defensive back Domenique Milton, who runs a team-best 4.3-second 40-yard-dash.

Receiving corps stacked

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Typically, when a 6-5 football team loses its most dominant receiver, its most explosive offensive playmaker and one of its most clutch performers, there is a relative cause for concern.

That is the situation the Massachusetts football team has found itself in this season.

Jason Peebler, who signed a contract with the Philadelphia Eagles of the National Football League in April before being cut in training camp, led the Minutemen in every meaningful receiving statistic each of the last two years.

But in and around Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, no one on the inner circles of this football program has a single doubt in their minds that the 2005 UMass receiving corps is one of the more talented groups that has been around in quite some time.

With the return of redshirt senior cornerback Steve Costello from an abdominal injury that caused him to miss almost all of last season, UMass coach Don Brown has elected to switch redshirt senior R.J. Cobbs back to the offensive side of the ball to fill Peebler's spot.

Cobbs is unquestionably the most versatile athlete on the roster, as he has already seen success on both sides of the ball plus special teams.

When he was healthy last year, he was the team's top shutdown cornerback, and he proved he could play defense at a high level when he recorded a team-high 12 tackles at Boston College in October.

UMass wide receiver J.J. Moore closes in on Tim Day's pass during the last game of the 2004 season, a victory over Hofstra. Moore made the catch and scored.

During his first year with the team in 2002, Cobbs received a flurry of accolades including Atlantic 10 Conference Rookie of the Year for his duties as a running back. The New Jersey native, who once scored six touchdowns in a high school game, led the Minutemen with a then-freshman record of 1,067 yards on the ground.

Coming out of the backfield, he also caught 21 passes, one of them coming for a touchdown. His 14 rushing touchdowns were the most by a UMass tailback since 1999, and his five rushing scores against Rhode Island are still a single-game school record.

"Explosive," Brown simply stated about Cobbs. "He is just flat-out explosive. He can turn a three-yard gain into a touchdown. He loves to play.

"He is just a versatile player, and it shows by how he has bounced around from position to position. It doesn't matter where he plays; he just plays at a high level."

Cobbs was set to play receiver in 2003 under former coach Mark Whipple, but a season-long suspen-

Wideout Brandon London and the Minutemen play the champs on Oct. 15.

Every athlete, coach and fan uses a red marker before each football season. Although they may not admit it, they shuffle through their desk draw and pull that Sharpie and draw a thick crimson circle around a specific day on the calendar. It is that singular day in Sept., Oct., or Nov., which represents redemption, satisfaction, and rivalry, all in one contest. Below is a list of the top six games to circle on the UMass schedule in 2005.

1. James Madison, Oct. 15, 12 p.m.

It's always special when the champs come to town. JMU finished last season with a 13-2 record, a 1st place finish in the Atlantic 10 south, and most importantly, a National Championship. In last season's battle in Virginia, the Minutemen held the Dukes scoreless until the end of the 3rd quarter, when JMU scored the first TD of the game , a 1-yard rush by quarterback Justin Rascati. Three more trips to the end zone in the 4th quarter paved the way for a 28-7 victory for the Dukes. Both Rascati (185-283, 2045 yds., 14 TD, 5 INT last season) and tailback Raymond Hines (1038 yds, 10 TD) return to the starting lineup in 2005.

2. At Colgate, Sept. 10, 1 p.m.

The last time the Minutemen stepped onto the field at Andy Kerr Stadium the wind was blowing, the snow was falling, and the opportunity to move past the first round in the 2003 NCAA playoffs loomed in the cold air. The Raiders managed to knock UMass out of contention in a 19-7 decision. The rest was history. After a 30-20 UMass victory in the rematch last season, the Maroon and White will look for similar results on the Raider's home turf. Jared Nepa (87 tackles) is the most notable returning starter for Colgate, as the team lost its starting signal-caller and tailback from last season.

3. New Hampshire, Oct. 29, 12 p.m.

One of three teams on the UMass schedule that reached the playoffs in 2004, the Wildcats finished with a record of 10-3 and a trip to the NCAA quarterfinals. Throughout the season, UNH was led by Cinderella-like red shirt freshman Ricky Santos (272-425, 3318 yds., 31 TD, 10 INT) and receiver David Ball (86 rec., 1504 yds., 17 TD). Despite the success, the Maroon and White pulled off an upset on span of time. With a career average of 4.3 yards per carry, he has become a major factor for the Minuteman offense. His production on the field correlates with his attitude and personality.

"As good a football player he is, he's a great person," Brown said. "When a guy works, he's a good person, you're just happy for any success he has."

For UMass safety Shannon James, the Buck Buchanan Award is not anything new. James, who was placed on the watch list this for this season., was a Buchanan Award finalist following the 2004 season.

"[James] knows he's going to go out and perform and have great numbers," Brown said. "And obviously this is his senior year, so he's got his work cut out for him in terms of this and hopefully getting a chance to play on Sunday."

James has been the talk of 1-AA lately, after registering 8 interceptions in 2004 and amassing 16 INT over the course of his collegiate career. As the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year and a captain as a senior in 2005, James has been viewed as a highly potential candidate to enter the National Football League following college.

Brown is not surprised by the fact that this honor has not gone to the head of either player and stresses that the importance lies in getting their duties done during the season as a team.

"Those two guy's success will be generated through our team's success and through their teammates. And I think they know that," Brown said.

Apart from the prestigious nature of both awards, it did not come as a surprise to Brown on hearing the news. He had an inkling that something of this nature may occur prior to the release of the list and communicated this hunch to both James and Baylark.

"I sat them both down last year and thought that would happen. I said, wouldn't that be unbelievable if we could have the Buck Buchanan Award winner and the Walter Payton Award winner in the same year?" Brown said.

Results you can feel.

Minutewomen look to ride 2004 momentum

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

Editors Note: the Daily Collegian's scheduled press for this issue was prior to the start of the Massachusetts field hockey team's season. Check out tomorrow's Collegian for full coverage.

Heading into a fresh season, the goal for the 2005 Massachusetts field hockey team is to build on the blazing hot finish from the 2004 season. After an abysmal 0-6 start, the Minutewomen finished strong with a record of 7-2 in their last nine games, with both losses coming to Atlantic 10 rival Richmond.

"I think something that we look to build on is our finish from last season, and we finished last season very strong," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "Not to go back to last season, but we have to use and remember how we developed at the end of last season."

The Minutewomen are young, as they return only four seniors and two juniors, but they are not without experience as last year's freshmen received enough playing time to pick up some of the potential void in leadership carrying over from last year. As for the incoming freshmen, Shea is confident that their high school experience will have them ready to contribute immediately.

"The nice thing is a lot of our freshmen played last year, and they had some pretty good playing time and have the quality of making decisions under pressure. They've been through that so it gets a little easier," Shea said.

COURTESY UMASS/SHEA RELATIONS

Minutewoman Jaime Bawden plays the ball during game action in the 2004 season. UMass won seven of its final nine games last year.

"Our freshmen have come in and all come from great traditional winning programs. They bring that element that they know how to win. I think their sense of urgency is a little different this year, their sense of accountability, which is always going to add to the success of the program."

Despite the poor start to last year's season, the Minutewomen weren't losing lopsided games for the most part, and instead of packing it in for the rest of the season, they ended up playing the A-10 championship.

The most daunting task for this year's team will be replacing the significant amount of senior talent and leadership of last year's team. UMass will be without its two leading scorers and its starting goalkeeper of 2004. Taking over in net will be sophomore Becky Letourneau, who did see playing time last year, which should help with the transition. In a hundred minutes of playing time, Letourneau compiled an impressive 1.36 goals against average and a .833 save percentage.

"I think one of the things that is going to be difficult to replace is the leadership, knowing what the level of expectations in field hockey is and wanting to make a mark as a team," Shea said. "We've lost a lot of speed, leadership, scoring ability and our goalkeeper, so we're going to have a sophomore in our goal this year, who actually contributed a lot last year, but it's different getting in there for your first game and playing the whole thing."

Much of the leadership and scoring role will most likely be picked up by Patricia Borneo, a senior from Arima, Trinidad and Tobago, who according to coach Shea, has made tremendous improvement during the off-season.

"I think Patricia Borneo, who's going to be a senior, has changed her game dramatically," said Shea, "and I think a lot of that came from playing at a higher level of hockey this summer with a men's team, so her vision of the game, her self-confidence and her skill level has changed dramatically, which is going to add a tremendous amount of improvement."

Joining Borneo on the front line is junior Gina Sanders, who played a key role for last year's team and is hoping to come back strong from off-season surgery.

Other forwards expected to contribute are sophomore Racheal Mervine, redshirt junior Elizabeth Andrews and true freshman Erin Parker.

Shea is confident that Parker's creativity and ability to single-handedly change games will allow her to have an immediate impact for the Minutewomen. Parker is entering UMass as Frontier Regional High School's second all-time leading scorer.

Anchoring the midfield will be transfer Kristina DoRasario, who sat out last year due to NCAA rules after transferring from the University of Toronto. DoRasario brings a great deal of much needed experience to the young Minutewomen. According to Shea, she is a proven leader who will be very influential despite the fact that it is her first year on the field for UMass.

Along with DoRasario is sophomore Kara Murphy of Dedham. She finished last season strong and has a flare for the dramatic as both of her goals in 2004 were game-winners to go along with a game-winning assist as well, remarkably all coming in the same week.

The backfield is where most of the team's experience resides, led by seniors Katelyn Woolfrey and Jaime Bawden. What might be most important about the amount of experience in the backfield is what it will do for the team's young goalkeeper.

Confidence on defense breeds confidence in the goalkeeper according to coach Shea. Bawden is moving from the midfield to the backfield this season, which shouldn't be a tough transition, as she played backfield in her first two seasons at UMass when she led the team in scoring. Joining the two seniors is junior , and sister of assistant coach Kerry Ann Jaggassar, is another native of Trinidad and Tobago, Kwylan Jaggassar.

With the pieces that are returning from last year's team, Shea is simply trying to recreate the energy that carried the Minutewomen to their strong second half last year.

"Our slow start last year is what propelled us into the strong finish, and it's the strong finish that you have to continue to build on," Shea said. "We do our developmental process through the winter and through the spring and now we have to build on where we left the program in the spring because we're at a higher lever [now] than we were in the spring."

"We're on a good course; we just have to pay attention to details. The fire in the eyes, the pride and the wanting to represent the University of Massachusetts is a lot brighter than it has been."

Junior Gina Sanders is looking to come back strong in 2005 following offseason surgery. High hopes surround the new year after a streaking finish in 2004, and with a host of veterans returning to lead the way.

Our drive in '05

Jeff Howe

This is the time to be a fan.

This is the time of year when the face-painting, sign-toting, jersey-wearing sport lovers around the country walk around with an extra swagger and a wider smile, counting down the hours, the minutes, each individual tick of the clock, until their team plays again.

There is something for everyone in the fall, especially the first couple weeks of September.

Footballs begin soaring through the air, the air that is now a bit cooler, a tad dryer and all that more refreshing.

Pennant races heat up around baseball, and college athletics start anew. Sports are beginning to take on new forms, shapes and sizes.

Just look around you.

Someone in your dorm is making up a game to pass the time by instead of going to class.

In fact, someone in your class is looking for a way to compete with the system, going one-on-one with the syllabus to see what days they can take off, what books they can avoid spending money on and what night they need to plan without sleep to get that final paper in the next morning.

If they beat the system, they'll be back again next season , eh, hem, semester , to do it all over again.

Check out the bathroom down the hall from you. Somebody is testing out the showers to figure out which one has hot water and which four never will, not even in the winter when you'll need it most.

The competition is fierce, and the games being played are intense, even down in the basement of the Campus Center at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

The phones are always in use, the recorders are ready to roll, and the sounds coming from the computer provide a quiet bass that could be laid down on a track produced by Dr. Dre.

We compete with everyone: television stations, surrounding newspapers, Internet bloggers and even national news services when that big story breaks on what was seemingly a normal day lost in the middle of a soft week.

We in the Sports section, found in the back pages of the Collegian five days a week, have one responsibility.

We will provide you top-notch coverage of everything that is happening on the fields, in the locker rooms and behind the scenes of UMass varsity sports.

We compete with professional papers every single day, and I can assure you that we usually win.

So let these games begin, wherever they are being played.

In the last few months, we have covered football in Virginia, men's basketball in Miami, hockey in Colorado, women's basketball in the nation's capital, men's lacrosse in Baltimore and everything else everywhere in between.

Come along for the ride with us because, win or lose, we're just happy to be playing the game.

UMass junior tailback Steve Baylark moves into the new season after being the top rusher in the Atlantic 10 last year. The Minutemen were 4-1 when Baylark topped the 100-yard plateau in 2004.

UM sets out to live up to the lofty goals

Editors note: The Collegian's press schedule for this issue was before the Massachusetts football team's first game against Richmond on Sept. 1. Make sure to check out tomorrow's Collegian for complete coverage of the game.

Heading into the beginning of last year, the Massachusetts football team had no clear vision of what was to lie ahead, not just for the upcoming season, but from week to week, practice to practice and drill to drill.

The Minutemen were still in shock from the controversial loss to Colgate in the first round of the playoffs in the midst of a blinding blizzard.

There was a coaching change, as Mark Whipple would head to the Pittsburgh Steelers to become the guiding light for National Football League Offensive Rookie of the Year Ben Roethlisberger, and former Northeastern coach Don Brown would return to Amherst where he was the defensive coordinator for the 1998 national championship team. And he would take with him a complex new playbook.

Bringing in Brown wasn't easy, though, as Northeastern filed a breach of contract lawsuit against the coach and UMass, resulting in Brown having to watch the first three games away from the sidelines and without a headset.

Before the Minutemen knew it, they had dropped four games in a row, and their record had fallen to 2-4. There was nothing left to play for that season but their own pride, and it was that pride that carried them to close out the year with four wins in five games, a 6-5 record and an extremely optimistic look for 2005.

Nineteen starters from last year's squad are returning, including all 11 on defense. Even further, all 22 players who were on the defensive depth chart at the end of last year are back.

UMass is adding an old weapon to its highly touted defense, too, as 2004 preseason All-American Steve Costello will be returning to his cornerback spot after redshirting last year with an abdominal injury.

The members of the Maroon and White have a clear goal this year, something that was missing in last season's summer camp: they are here to

Baylark and James recognized

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

With all of the accolades swept onto the Massachusetts football team prior to the 2005 season, there were two additional honors bestowed upon two veteran members of the team. On Aug. 24, The Sports Network released the annual watch list for both the Buck Buchanan Award and the Walter Payton Award, which are both presented at the end of the season on Dec. 15.

The Buchanan Award is given to the best defensive player in 1-AA football, while the Payton Award goes to the top player in all of 1-AA. UMass is one of two teams representing players on both award lists.

UMass running back Steve Baylark was one of 16 offensive candidates placed on the Payton watch list in August.

"Deservingly so. Had the kind of year a year ago that certainly deserves that kind of preseason notoriety," UMass coach Don Brown said. "But at the same time, when the whistle blows September first, nobody's going to care, he'll be a marked guy, can he step up and do those things with all of those issues in front of him."

Baylark, who stands at 6-foot-0, 225 lbs., recorded back-to-back 1,100 yard rushing seasons in 2003 and 2004 and has accumulated 18 touchdowns in that

Eds. Note: Collegian press time for this issue was prior to the start of the Massachusetts men's soccer team's season opener. Check out tomorrow's issue for full coverage.

With the summer in the books, classes starting up again and kids trying to squeeze out the last couple of nice days before fall, the Massachusetts men's soccer team has already dove head first into its schedule.

UMass began the fall schedule early: the season led off with a showdown with McGill on Aug. 24; then the competition got a little better as the Minutemen traveled to Foxboro for a tune up with Major League Soccer's New England Revolution on Aug. 29.

The men's squad ended last season with an 8-9-2 overall record and a 5-4-2 conference record; with its offensive leader , and recent selection for the preseason Atlantic 10 All-Conference team — back for his senior season, things are looking up for the Minutemen.

Here's a look at some of the position players , some returning, some new — who will take the field for the UMass men's soccer team this fall.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Members of the Massachusetts men's soccer team celebrate one of their six goals in the 6-1 victory over McGill on Aug. 24.

Forwards:

Oral Bullen — The two-time captain and A-10 Second Team All-Conference selection as a junior was recently named a Preseason All Atlantic 10 selection. Bullen has tallied 45 points in his career at UMass with 18 goals and nine assists. In the 2004 season, Bullen led the Minutemen in all offensive categories with 23 points by way of nine goals and five assists; those statistics put the star forward third in the A-10 in points and second place in goals for the 2004 season.

Ernie Billittier — Billittier has steadily earned more playing time over his career with the Minutemen. He played in 17 games as a freshman, all in the reserve role, and then started 17 games during his sophomore year. Last season, Billittier added depth to the midfield and forward positions, playing in 18 of 19 games.

Greg Cirillo — During the 2004 season, he utilized his quickness and his knowledge of the intangibles to help his team, playing in 17 games, scoring one goal and dishing out three assists. Cirillo's shining moment came in a game against conference opponent Xavier, when he scored the game-winning goal against the Musketeers in the second overtime.

Sam Griswold — Griswold played six games as a reserve last season. He made his collegiate debut against Santa Clara on Sept. 2, 2004.

Mike Desantis: Desantis graduated from Stoneham High School last year, earning two Boston Globe Player of the Year awards during his high school career. Desantis was also a two-time Massachusetts and Middlesex League MVP, while leading Stoneham to two state championships.

UMass well-prepared

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While the majority of UMass students spent their summer going to beaches, frequenting local bars, and working unbearable jobs, the members of the Massachusetts women's soccer team had a slightly different summer vacation.

The players may have snuck in the occasional beach trip, but much of their time was spent preparing for the season.

Team members played for club teams and in tournaments all around the country, an experience that coach Jim Rudy has conflicting feelings about.

"My mind and heart is 80 percent in support of that, and 20 percent in continual anguish with fingers crossed that nobody comes back injured," Rudy said. "You don't want to lose anybody because they (club teams) certainly aren't paying the freight, they don't pay the scholarships. But they provide a bit of a service. It keeps the players fit and it gives them an experience. If they are able to play at those levels it shows that we've done well and those people are reaping the results of what we've done here."

Junior midfielder Nadia Villarroel had a very memorable experience this summer, as her Stars of Massachusetts club team won the U-19 National Championship in Orlando on July 31.

Villarroel's situation is a perfect example of Rudy's mixed feelings on players playing for teams in the offseason.

"Nadia came back with two pretty bad ankles, but she's a national champion," Rudy said. 'And you don't want to take that experience away. How often do you get to be a national champion?"

Sophomore forward Britt Canfield, last year's leading scorer, got the opportunity to play with and against some top competition this summer. Canfield joined the New England Mutiny of the Women's Premier Soccer League, a league that features many players from the defunct WUSA.

"Britt got to step up into a high-level club program that's well run and loaded with quality players," Rudy said. 'Britt got a chance to train and play a little bit with pretty high-level players.'

With a roster stocked with New Yorkers, it comes as no surprise that UMass had a number of participants in the New York Empire State Games.

There were eight current and former players competing in all. The current Minutewomen that suited up were junior Stephanie Barrett, playing for the Hudson Valley team, senior Tiffany Hamill, playing for the Central team, and senior co-captain Amy Maffucci, playing for the Western New York team. Maffucci's team made it to the finals for the third time in four years.

While Rudy is fearful of losing a player to injury through playing on club teams, it's something that he understands his players are going to do. Rudy's understanding is certainly influenced because he was the same way as a player, trying to play soccer as much as possible.

"That's something I expect," Rudy said. 'It's not a demand, but it's something I expect and understand because we try to recruit soccer junkies. They want to be good and in order

UMass takes in students displaced Katrina

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

Area schools, including the University of Massachusetts, are doing their part to help those students in the Gulf Coast displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

It is estimated that more than 100,000 college students were displaced from schools in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Some students had to leave campus after they had begun the academic year.

Statewide, and even nationwide, colleges and universities have been offering an emergency application process to get the displaced students enrolled as quickly as possible.

UMass admissions began receiving requests for emergency applications soon after it became clear that re-opening colleges on the Gulf Coast quickly was unlikely.

Other schools in the area that have already opened up places for displaced students include Greenfield Community College, Westfield State College and Worcester State College. Across the state, Regis College, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Suffolk University have also opened their doors to affected students.

Those who were admitted to UMass will have to live off campus, according to Kevin Kelly, the UMass director of admissions. The University already has an estimated 300 students living in hotels as far away as Hadley due to a housing crunch already in place.

The only real requirement the displaced schools must fulfill is to be admitted to UMass is that they had to have been accepted previously at another institute of higher learning. Other schools have set up different requirements for students, looking at GPAs and whether the school can fit the students' academic requirements.

Several people have already been admitted to UMass and are meeting with counselors this week to discuss course offerings. Others declined to attend the University.

"Even those students who chose to enroll at another institution are very grateful for the consideration that we have extended them," said Kelly.

Some local schools, such as Westfield State College are offering extra benefits to the displaced students who are interested in attending. Westfield's President Vicky L. Carwein said in a press release that her college plans to waive certain fees, offer lowered tuition and pay for off-campus housing as a way to make the transition of transferring

Wal-Mart's expansion plan upsets residents

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

HADLEY — A Wal-Mart Supercenter may soon be coming to Hadley, and some residents are not happy about it.

Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, a group of residents who fight "to preserve Hadley's rural beauty," is protesting the proposed Wal-Mart expansion. The group says that a Supercenter would hurt the environment, bringing more air pollution with the expected traffic increases. The new development would also contribute greatly to urban sprawl in the Hadley area.

Some area residents are already unhappy with the current Wal-Mart, which has been the target of several protests from workers' union groups. Most of these groups believe Wal-Mart does not pay its workers a livable wage.

Wal-Mart East owns all the Wal-Marts in Western Mass. Two local stores have drawn criticism recently after the Environmental Protection Agency alleged violations.

In January, the Northampton Wal-Mart allegedly failed to report a hydraulic spill to environmental officials in a timely manner. The second violation was at the Pittsfield Wal-Mart, where an oil leak was not reported Aug. 12. Wal-Mart was ordered to pay $8,000 in fines.

If the expansion goes as planned, Wal-Mart will move from the Mountain Farms Mall to the Hampshire Mall, across the street.

Located on route 9, the Mountain Farms Mall has very little space available for expansion. However, the Pyramid Company, which owns the Hampshire Mall, allowed Wal-Mart enough space to expand into a 205,000 square foot store. The Supercenter would be built onto the rear of the mall, which already has corporate stores such as Target and Best Buy.

The Hadley planning board is now having public meetings about the Supercenter. The first of these meetings took place on Aug. 17 at the Hadley Senior Center. The meeting was held for the developers to present their plans, and the public was asked not to interrupt the presentation with comments.

MEGAN DALEY/COLLEGIAN

The Hampshire Mall is the site of a new Wal-Mart.

Wal-Mart is the center of attention for locals.

The following meeting took place this past Tuesday night at Hopkins Academy. It allowed the public to ask questions and state their opinions on the issue.

The proposed Supercenter would include a gas station, bank, grocery store and dry cleaners. The idea of a gas station made one local resident, Andy Morris-Freidman, particularly upset.

Morris-Freidman showed up at the planning board meeting with a sign around his neck. The sign, which said "No Way, Walmart," referred to his Web site, nowaywalmart.com, in which he talks about why the proposed Wal-Mart gas station is a bad idea.

The Web site says that the Supercenter's gas station would be within 50 feet of the rail trail, a popular biking route. The Web site encourages people to sign a petition saying they won't shop at the Hampshire mall "unless they change their project design to protect the rail trail."

Morris-Freidman is also planning a biker protest of 10,000 to protest at the Hampshire Mall.

Wal-Mart has tried to make some changes to its store design to make it more suitable to Hadley residents. The developer is trying to make the building more colonial, to fit better with Hadley's

Residents discuss Wal-Mart plans

HADLEY — Traffic and environmental concerns were paramount at the Hadley planning board's public hearing Tuesday night on the proposed Wal-mart Supercenter to be built at the Hampshire Mall.

Tuesday marked the first night that residents were allowed to voice their opinions and concerns about the proposed Wal-mart expansion to the planning board.

William Dwyer Jr, a member of the board, started the hearing with residents' comments, but asked that they keep their statements limited to two minutes long. They also requested that the only concerns to be brought before the board would be ones that fall into the planning board's jurisdiction, namely zoning bylaws of the proposed district on which Wal-mart plans to move.

Impending traffic problems were brought up by many residents, including Peter Maleady, who foresaw Route 9's already clogged roads becoming worse with the proposed construction. Some residents pointed to the case of the proposed Wal-mart Supercenter in Gresham, Oregon, where the proposal was denied due to traffic concerns.

The extra traffic would also lower the air quality of the valley, said one asthmatic resident. The quality of the groundwater was also brought up by Shel Horowitz, who asked the planning board to consider factors of water drainage off of the blacktop that would be added for the Wal-mart parking lot, saying that water run-off could seep to the groundwater.

"Once our water is ruined, it's ruined forever," said Michelle Morris-Friedman.

Some residents, like Deena Friedman, were also upset that the planning board had not made any forum for non-Hadley residents. "This is not just an issue for Hadley residents," she said, mentioning UMass commuters who use that road every day.

Several residents handed out information sheets about the possible impacts the Supercenter may bring to Hadley. Morris-Friedman, webmaster of NoWayWalmart.com, handed out fliers protesting the gas station planned for the back of the Supercenter.

The two-minute gag rule was also a sore issue for Morris-Friedman, who said that the rule "makes it seem as though you favor the Wal-mart contractors, who had as much time to speak as they wanted."

Hill Boss summed up the town's feelings on the Wal-mart issue when he said, "Wal-mart's plans for our little town are simply too large."

Gas prices affecting students

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

On Sept. 7, 2004, the average price for a gallon of gas was a ghastly $1.90. Americans voiced their displeasure throughout the entire country.

If they only knew then what they know now.

On Sept. 6, 2005, the national average price for one gallon of regular octane gasoline is $3.08 — an increase of 46 cents from Aug. 26, the Friday before Hurricane Katrina knocked out most of the Gulf Coast's oil industry, including nine refineries that account for nearly 10 percent of the U.S. gas production.

Hurricane Katrina was a catastrophic event with a human cost that cannot yet be fully evaluated. It was also, according to the Petroleum related Web site www.eai.doe.gov, exactly what oil market analysts feared the most this summer. Analysts contemplated what might happen should a severe hurricane impact oil production and refineries at the height of summer driving season at a time when gasoline inventories were low.

Heading into the final week before the Labor Day weekend, inventories were very near the bottom end of the average range, but given growth in gasoline demand over the comparable year-ago period (gasoline demand is 1.2 percent above last year's level over the last four weeks), the gasoline inventory situation was even tighter.

The bolstered prices have caused a groundswell of anger directed squarely at President George W. Bush. Bush's job-approval rating in USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Polls has fallen from 57 percent in February to 50 percent last week. In that period, according to the poll, the number of people who called fuel prices the top economic problem rose from one percent to nine percent.

In a Rose Garden speech last week, President Bush raised the possibility the aftereffects of Hurricane Katrina will lead to even higher gasoline prices and shortages in some areas. This statement comes even as his administration moved to release oil from an emergency government stockpile and to temporarily ease pollution standards on gasoline and diesel fuel.

Student killed over necklace

By Dan O'Brien

Several University of Massachusetts students will return to classes today knowing one of their friends will not be joining them.

Franklyn Nwachukwu, 20, a nursing major at UMass, was shot to death July 15 during a robbery in Boston.

"He was very quiet, out going and hardworking," said Franklyn's father, Obi Nwachukwu.

Nwachukwu was just accepted into the nursing program here at UMass. His parents say he always wanted to become a nurse. Those dreams were cut short at 10 p.m. on Friday, July 15 when a robber fired a single shot into his abdomen.

Boston police and Nwachukwu's family said the shooting happened as he left a family friend's house on 22 Lewiston St. in Hyde Park. Police believe he encountered three black men who attempted to take his chain necklace when shots were fired.

Nwachukwu was transported to Brigham and Women's Hospital where he was pronounced dead a short time later.

Police have made no arrests in the case.

Nwachukwu was to begin his junior year by beginning to take summer classes at UMass on July 18, just three days after he died.

A graduate of Hyde Park High School, Nwachukwu began the UMass pre-nursing program in 2003. This summer he was working at St. Katharine Drexel Church, organizing group activities with the Nigerian community. He also worked as an intern at Central Boston Elder Services.

Nwachukwu's family said his excellent grades were proof that he would one day be successful in a nursing career.

"From day one, that's what he planned to do," said Obi

UMass student's semester in New Orleans cut short

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

When University of Massachusetts student Emily Morse left on Aug. 18 to spend a semester at the University of New Orleans, she had no idea her experience would be drastically cut short.

Only nine days after her arrival, Morse evacuated the city and headed to Texas to escape the rapidly approaching Hurricane Katrina.

Morse, a senior English major from Penacook, N.H., was enrolled in UMass's National Student Exchange program, which sends students to universities all over the nation and allows them to experience different geographical and cultural environments.

Morse had always heard New Orleans was a good place to go, and she "fell in love" with the city right away. "The French Quarter's just absolutely beautiful. [I loved] the different mix of people, and there's always music on the street," she said. "It was just a really lively city, and the people are so friendly."

Morse had been warned that the university often experienced hurricane threats. During her first few days in New Orleans, a tour guide mentioned the city's precarious situation. "The tour guide said that since New Orleans is ten to twenty feet below sea level, they're always waiting for 'the big one,'" Morse said.

However, she never expected a storm so severe that the university would shut down for the semester and she would find herself back at UMass this fall.

After several days of orientation touring the city, Morse attended three days of classes before the storm hit.

On the afternoon of Saturday, Aug. 27, when Morse returned to campus from Lake Pontchartrain, she was told the campus would shut down at 6:00 p.m. that evening.

Initially, classes were only cancelled until Wednesday. "We all thought it was just going to be a small little thing, so I only packed enough clothes for four days on the road," Morse said. She left her computer, CDs and most of her clothing behind.

Morse and a group of friends drove to South Padre Island, Tex., where they spent a couple of days at the beach and visiting Mexico. "At the beginning, we were all like, 'Hurricane break! Whoo!'" Morse said. "Once we realized how bad it was, we all felt kind of

Mayor: 10,000 people haven't left homes

By Chris Adams, Gary Estwick and Martin Merzer
KRT

NEW ORLEANS — Authorities struggling to manage the largest relocation of Americans in modern history collided Wednesday with an unexpected obstacle: resistance from many of the evacuees.

In Houston, a plan to move evacuees from the Astrodome to two cruise ships in Galveston, Texas, was canceled for lack of interest, officials said, forcing the government to search for evacuees from other areas to move into the ocean liners' cabins.

In New Orleans, Mayor Ray Nagin authorized force to remove an estimated 10,000 people still living amid floodwaters, which were receding but also becoming increasingly polluted with oil, sewage, bacteria and life-threatening toxins.

Four people may have died from rare bacterial infections caused by contaminated water that entered open wounds, federal health experts reported. Initial tests of New Orleans' water detected levels of diarrhea-causing bacteria far exceeding safe levels.

As the dimensions of the human disaster became clear, forensic pathologists streamed to New Orleans. The official death toll there and throughout the region assaulted last week by Hurricane Katrina stood at 294, but estimates reached into the thousands.

New reports spoke of 30 people dead at a flooded nursing home in Chalmette, La., near New Orleans, and more than 100 people dead at a dockside warehouse.

Nevertheless, the rescue squads that patrolled deeper into New Orleans — as well as relief workers in Texas, South Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania and the District of Columbia — found themselves confounded by the reluctance of many survivors to leave their homes or move to distant shelters.

Five planes from West Virginia sent to ferry evacuees from Texas returned home without passengers. Flights expected to carry 1,000 evacuees to Ohio were canceled. Cots stood empty at the D.C. Armory in the nation's capital.

Throughout the Gulf Coast region, people decided that they preferred the familiar and the close to home — regardless of how awful it had become — to the unknown and the far away. In some cases, bureaucratic foul-ups and lack of coordination also played a role.

"Once you put yourself in the hands of the government, you could end up in Utah," said Michael O'Donoghue, 64, a holdout in New Orleans' Lower Garden District.

Ed Comley, a liaison officer for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said the agency has no additional plans to transport people to shelters in other states.

"There were several states that offered opportunities for people to go via plane and bus," he said. "There just weren't any takers. We can't force people to leave."

The relocation difficulties flared as officials turned their attention to other problems and, in some cases, to solutions:

— Federal officials prepared to distribute debit cards worth $2,000 each to displaced storm victims to offset the cost of food, clothing, gasoline and other commodities.

Michael Brown, FEMA's embattled director, said the plan would "empower hurricane survivors to really start rebuilding their lives."

— Katrina could cost as many as 400,000 U.S. jobs and slash economic growth by as much as 1 percentage point, the Congressional Budget Office reported.

— Repair crews inspected bridges and roads wrecked by Katrina, including 90 bridges in southern Louisiana alone. Contractors were hired to clear debris-blocked roads.

— Inch by inch, flood levels continued to drop in New Orleans as more pumps came back to life, but engineers still faced a Herculean task. Only 23 of the city's 148 pumps were working. One major pumping station, however, was draining 2,000 cubic feet of water out of the city every second.

Though the mayor of New Orleans authorized force to evacuate those remaining, the priority for rescue crews was still to search for residents willing to leave but trapped.

"We have thousands of people who want to voluntarily evacuate at this time," Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said. "We're using our resources at this time to save those who want to be saved.

"Once the voluntary evacuation has taken

Gov't issues 'debit cards' to victims

By Devlin Barrett

WASHINGTON -- The federal government plans to hand out debit cards worth $2,000 each to families displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

Homeland Security Department Secretary Michael Chertoff, under fire for his agency's response to the disaster, held a conference call with governors of states with evacuees and described the plan. While many details remained to be worked out, the plan was to quickly begin distributing the cards, starting with people in major evacuation centers such as the Houston Astrodome.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the cards are aimed at providing "some immediate cash assistance to those who are in shelters, those that were evacuated."

Republican Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who participated in the conference call, said the cards will be offered "to people in shelters as well as people who are not in shelters but who have evacuated the area and need help." He said the hope is the cards will encourage people to leave shelters voluntarily.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is administering the program. FEMA officials said the program is aimed at those most in need, so not all families that fled their homes will be eligible.

"For instance you may have some people who have insurance and insurance is meeting their living expenses while they have been displaced," said Ed Conley, a FEMA spokesman in Houston. "You have some people who may be looking at an option such as a cruise ship where all of their needs are going to be met. It is going to vary by family."

The cards are to be used to help victims purchase food, transportation and other essentials.

UMass researching chlamydia vaccine

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has reached an option agreement with the Maryland based company BioVeris, allowing the company to own exclusive rights to a possible cure for the sexually transmitted disease chlamydia. BioVeris has also agreed to donate $600,000 towards UMass research aimed at developing a vaccine candidate.

Even though doctors contend that the disease is drastically underreported, chlamydia remains the most frequently reported bacterial sexually transmitted disease in the United States. Each year there are 98 million new cases of chlamydia worldwide, and the U.S. reports 2.8 million new cases annually, resulting in an estimated healthcare cost of over $2 billion.

Chlamydia is transmitted by the chlamydia trachomatis bacterium, one of the smallest of all bacteria. It is easily cured with antibiotics, but if left untreated can lead to serious reproductive and other health problems.

In women, symptoms of Chlamydia include unusual vaginal bleeding or discharge, pain in the abdomen, painful sexual intercourse, fever, and painful urination.

In men, symptoms may include a painful or burning sensation when urinating, unusual discharge from the penis, swollen or tender testicles, or fever.

Creating a successful vaccine has been a continual struggle for scientists, and UMass researchers have been working to find a vaccine for over 20 years.

However, with the ongoing research of UMass scientists, the world may be closer to a cure than ever before.

Usually vaccines work by treating a patient with some form of the disease-causing organism — often a weakened of dead version — that can trigger a protective immune response. The immune system of a treated individual then makes antibodies which bind the pathogen, an infectious agent, and ultimately help destroy it. As part of the immune response, "memory cells" also form, which usually remain available to mount a quick, effective response when the pathogen is encountered again.

A portion of the disease-causing organism that can stimulate the immune system, an antigen, can be an ideal candidate for a vaccine, but isolating and characterizing a broadly protective agent has proved difficult with chlamydia.

According to the Web site curezone.com, the bacterium, much like a virus, grows only inside a host cell, and the critical antigen is a mixture of carbohydrates and fat instead of the usual protein.

If UMass scientists are able to isolate the candidate antigen, BioVeris will chemically characterize it, the process of assessing its potential as a human vaccine component will begin.

BioVeris is a health care company that develops, manufactures and markets products for diagnostic systems to be used for the detection and measurement of biological or chemical substances.

Despite all of the hurdles that still await in finding a cure for the disease, UMass scientists continue to persevere and are pleased about the partnership with BioVeris.

Community Radio hits local air waves

By Matthew Pilon
Collegian Staff

FLORENCE — Most radio stations don't mean it when they say "commercial free."

But a new low-power station is aiming to give the airwaves over to local media-marginalized communities without commercials or shareholder profits.

Valley Free Radio 103.3 FM, WXOJ-LP, is a non-profit, volunteer-run organization that went on the air from the Florence Community Center in early August after four years of planning and organization.

Through outreach to local networks of people, VFR's mission is to provide diverse music and talk programming as an alternative to commercial radio, a medium that VFR members say does not give fair representation to various minority, political, and religious groups.

VFR board member Noemi Valentin compared the station's outreach process to playing dominoes.

"You come into the organization and you bring your networks that you have," Valentin said. "Slowly, I start knowing you and everyone starts connecting with each other."

Board of directors co-chairman Timothy Scott explained the station's mission.

"We want the communities to take hold of the airways," Scott said. "Do you want to rely on commercial media to represent the interests of the people?"

Communications and outreach committee member Susan Seymour hosts a show, which she says contains themes of ethics and philosophy and stays true to VFR's mission of giving access to those who don't normally have it.

"I think of myself as the female anti-Rush Limbaugh," Seymour said of her show "The Naked Truth," which airs Monday nights.

She said the point of community radio is to reach out to "anything from youth to different religious perspectives to a tobacco farmer in Hadley."

"We're getting different perspectives as well as interesting perspectives," she said. "You're not going to hear this kind of stuff anywhere."

Board member Cathy Santosus joined the organization in April of 2004.

"I was always interested in using media or technology to support real communities," she said.

Scott said the station plays anything from the Beatles to Brazilian music and is always open to suggestions.

"We're not just playing the hits," he said. "There's a lot of music out there."

There are approximately 300 members signed up for the mailing list and about 30 people in the actual organization thus far, according to Valentin.

The Federal Communications Commission started the low power FM (LPFM) program in January of 2000 to enable certain groups to construct stations with transmitters and equipment that cost between $4,000 and $6,000, which is far less than a high power station. LPFM construction permits and licenses are only available to non-profit educational entities.

The main difference between FM and LPFM: no commercials are permitted.

Low power frequencies are not protected from higher powered frequencies by the FCC. For this reason, constructing LPFM stations in densely populated areas has been difficult, but groups such as the Prometheus Radio Project, whose members helped VFR construct their station at their "barn raising," are pushing for legislation that will expand the LPFM program.

Being a grassroots organization without legal non-profit status, VFR partnered with the Media Education Foundation, a non-profit organization started by former University of Massachusetts Communications professor Sut Jhally.

MEF creates educational videos that encourage critical thinking about mass media trends and media ownership.

Loretta Alper, executive producer at MEF, represents the organization on the VFR board of directors.

"MEF is committed to using its financial structure to help fledgling media organizations," she said.

Alper said that the station is "just learning how to fly."

"I think it's wonderful to hear people learn to make their own media," she said. "People who are looking for fresh perspectives will be drawn to it."

Amherst Listeners can tune in or join the mailing list through the station's website at www.valleyfreeradio.org.

Disease plaguing New Orleans streets

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. — Since military personnel have restored order in New Orleans and begun to drain the flooded city, health officials are turning their efforts to determining the potential hazards associated with the contaminated water.

A city-wide power outage and a broken 50-foot water main, among other things, have led to contaminated food and water supplies, exacerbating hunger and dehydration among the remaining residents.

City officials warn that the flood waters have mixed with feces and toxic chemicals, providing a cesspool for bacteria and germs.

Experts say unclean waters are likely to accelerate the spread of disease, including diarrhea, hepatitis and salmonella. Other potential problems include the spread of dysentery and cholera.

Health officials said Tuesday that standing water in New Orleans is contaminated with E. coli bacteria. Officials are also investigating whether a different waterborne bacteria killed four other victims at Houston's Astrodome.

"I think perhaps the most pressing human health issue is infectious disease," said Richard Di Giulio, a professor in the Nicholas School of Environment and Earth Science and an expert on environmental health.

Di Giulio, who is director of Duke's integrated toxicology program, noted that chemical contaminants from flooded refineries, hospitals and chemical plants could also pose serious hazards.

"In a disaster like this, chemicals are going to be spilled both into the air and the water," Di Giulio said. "There's a concern for pockets of chemical contamination in certain areas that will persist long after the flood waters have receded."

Those exposed to chemical and environmental contamination may be more likely to suffer long-term

The pile between the tree with the tin stuck in its branches and the wooden board against the power line — that's her own home and office.

Bryant lived on Howard Avenue, just off the shore where barnacle-bottomed casino barges wound up in place of now-gone beachfront homes. Blue spray paint marks the side of one tall building: "Thank you Biloxi Fire Police Department. Mom, we're OK."

Just down from Bryant's property, city workers wait for a bus to take them to the police station for another round of cleanup. Saturday is the fifth day of this, and they're jaded.

"Don't listen to the TV about the body count," says a man named Sam, pointing to a funeral home parking lot across the street. "Those three white refrigerator trucks are filled with bodies."

Bryant points to where bodies turned up near her house. She wears her long brown hair in a ponytail and a gold cross around her neck. She's thankful she fled to her sister's home in Wool Market, knowing the low barometric pressure from the hurricane would've sent her into early labor.

Three of her family members sift through her parents' rubble. They had already found her mother's diamond earrings and pendant among the mess. They also found a chair in the house that wasn't there before the hurricane.

"Save that," Bryant tells them. "That's from an island 12 miles away."

Wal-Mart raises concerns for residents appearance, by increasing the angle of the roof to a "more New England angle" and adding a brick facade.

James Maksimoski, the chair of the planning board, said that he liked the "attractive looking building."

The Supercenter would not be open for some time while it is under discussion by the Hadley planning board. However, the proposal has already passed the first step in the planning process as is, according to William Dwyer Jr. of the planning board.

Dwyer says that, although some residents have an issue with the Wal-Mart expansion, the plan fits the zoning purposes set for the area.

"We look at the zoning regulations. Whether Wal-Mart pays its employees a livable wage or not is up for discussion, but not by the planning board," Dwyer said.

Despite any public protest, Dwyer says that the Wal-Mart SuperCenter should not have trouble getting approval from the Hadley planning board, "barring any unusual zoning or environmental permit issues that might come up."

The planning board did, however, have some suggestions to make the new Wal-Mart better suited to the area. Joseph F. Zgrodnik pushed for more "green space" in the buildings design, asking that it be "incorporated more into the parking area and overall mall."

The planning board is also looking at several traffic signal and road changes to ease the increase in traffic that the Wal-Mart is expected to bring. Dwyer also told attendees at the meeting that the board was insisting on an inter-mall shuttle bus to facilitate traffic.

Immigrant victims run into trouble

By Oscar Avila and Hugh Dellios
Chicago Tribune and KRT

CHICAGO — Foreign governments and Hispanic advocacy groups scrambled Wednesday to help an especially vulnerable group of hurricane survivors: immigrants who often don't speak English or possess legal immigration status.

In a region coping with a devastated infrastructure, relief workers had to work extra hard to reach immigrant victims, especially with a reported shortage of bilingual volunteers.

Many victims compounded the challenge by heading underground, but officials from Mexico and Central America urged their countrymen to seek disaster relief, even if they are afraid because they are illegal immigrants. Leaders also urged U.S. authorities not to deport hurricane victims, and officials with the Department of Homeland Security said immigration enforcement would take a back seat to saving lives.

The hurricane was especially devastating for Hondurans who have crossed the Gulf of Mexico for decades to work at ports and fishing jobs in Louisiana.

Many Hondurans came to Louisiana for a more desperate reason: to flee the destruction caused by Hurricane Mitch, which devastated Central America in 1998. The U.S. government provided temporary legal status for Hondurans affected by Hurricane Mitch.

The Honduran government said at least 40,000 Hondurans could have been affected by the disaster. The government has set up a temporary consulate in Baton Rouge, and the ambassador to the United States has flown to the region.

The Mexican government also has reached out to its countrymen who have helped fuel a wave of migration to the South. Officials said about 40,000 Mexicans were thought to be living in Louisiana, which has historically drawn immigrants across the Gulf from Yucatan state.

Three Mexicans have died, and officials reported that at least 90 were missing.

The foreign ministry has established temporary 'mobile' consulates in Baton Rouge and Mobile, Ala., to help hurricane victims. They also are offering financial help and phone cards.

But Mexico also has urged immigrants in the United States to fuel relief efforts, just as their remittances provided a $16 billion engine last year for development and humanitarian projects back home.

Mexico's Secretary of Social Development invited Chicago immigrant leaders to a meeting Wednesday night with the intention of encouraging them to organize relief projects for hurricane victims.

Immigrants "are the philanthropists of the Mexican community. We must get involved," said Roberto Ramirez of St. Charles, Ill., a meeting invitee and advisory council member to the Institute for Mexicans Abroad, a government agency. "Whether or not it's just for the Mexicans, we have to do our part as human beings."

Janet Murguia, president and CEO of the National Council of La Raza, the largest Hispanic advocacy group in the United States, said the Mexican assistance is vital because U.S. relief efforts have been hampered by a shortage of bilingual volunteers, according to reports from agencies in the affected area.

Pam Knapp and husband Ricky paddle down Napoleon St. in New Orleans yesterday.

Hispanic leaders report even worse problems reaching undocumented immigrants. In past disasters, undocumented immigrants have received emergency aid but have not been eligible for government assistance during the reconstruction phase.

Murguia, part of a delegation that met with President Bush, said she has been assured that undocumented immigrants have "absolutely no fear of recrimination right now."

To reinforce that message, Mexican President Vicente Fox broadcast messages to Mexicans in the United States, trying to persuade them to seek out help and trust the authorities. "Don't be afraid to follow rescue officials' directions," Fox said. "They are capable people for these kinds of incidents and can help you."

Ethanol a possible alternative to gas

By Katie Schmitt
Iowa State Daily (Iowa State U.)

(U-WIRE) AMES, Iowa — Farmers in Iowa are predicting excellent potential crop yields this season, but whether that will show up in their potential gains remains to be seen.

"Gas is going to increase the total costs to harvest, but how much that is going to cost in proportion to the income of the harvest, I'm not sure," said Lucas Borras, a postdoctoral research associate in the agronomy department. "One of the most important things Ö is how it relates to farmers' costs."

The increase in gas prices is a direct effect of Hurricane Katrina.

"We have major ports in New Orleans, and other real traffic areas will see a price impact," said Roger Ginder, Professor of Agriculture Economics at Iowa State University.

"ISU will see a lag in impact from the higher fuel prices, but if you talk to some of my students today, they had stayed in town over the Labor Day weekend because they couldn't afford to drive home," Ginder said.

Brent Cunningham, a senior studying horticulture, said he feels the same way.

"It's looking pretty bad because of the hurricane," Cunningham said. "Farmers are going to be hurt, and it would be a good idea to use alternative fuel sources."

Alternative fuel sources, such as ethanol-based fuel, could be a good idea for the average student to consider using, but farmers have limited options. Because combines and other large tractors use diesel instead of petroleum, ethanol is not an option. However, biodiesel made from soybean oil is becoming a more popular idea among the farming community.

"Certain diesel fuel prices are not quite as high as gas, but they are well above the norm," said Robert Wisner, professor of agriculture economics.

Because of that, he predicts farmers will let their crops stand in the field, drying out as long as possible.

Ginder said they have developed a biodiesel which can range from 2 percent to 100 percent soybean oil. There has also been research in the use of animal fats from processing plants, fry grease from restaurants and feed stock to make other kinds of biodiesels.

Currently, gas stations are offering an alternative source of energy in the form of petroleum with 10 percent ethanol. However, students may soon see a newer E85 option at the pumps.

Wisner said E85 is a newer ethanol option which uses 85 percent ethanol rather than the current 10 percent.

"Most gas stations just have the 10 percent ethanol, but a few have 85 percent because only a limited number of cars can burn that," Wisner said.

"More E85 stations will be available before long. Minnesota passed a law requiring all fuel to have at least 20 percent ethanol, and we can't rule out that kind of legislature in Iowa."

Cunningham wasn't sure how far alternative fuel sources would go, but he could relate to the need for them.

"Anyone who uses fuel as part of their business will feel the pinch," Cunningham said. "This affects the whole economy."

Health crisis in New Orleans

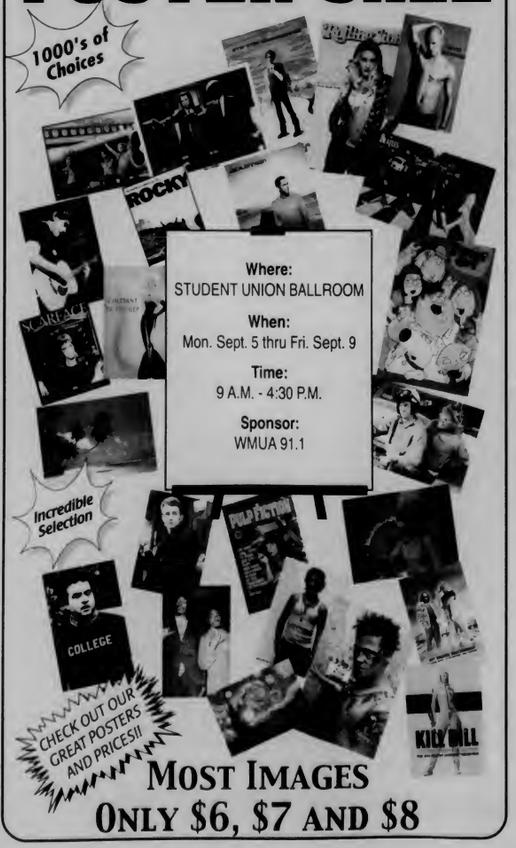
health consequences, he said, including effects on cancer rates.



And Katrina's impact is not limited to physical health—survivors may also suffer from post-traumatic stress syndrome as a result of their experiences.

Some experts noted that wild animals are also contributing to the city's health crisis. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin warned residents to be cautious of snakes and alligators that are usually confined to the swamps. Disease-carrying mosquitoes could be a problem as well.

"I want to emphasize that I would like everyone to get out because it's a health risk," Nagin said in a statement. "Mosquitoes that are biting dead people are starting to fly."

To expedite the decontamination process, both Di Giulio and Marie Miranda, an associate professor at the Nicholas School, will be aiding the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences in the design of a Geographic Information System. The GIS system will be used to create map overlays plotting the locations of chemical plants and refineries, among other things, in relation to potential hotspots of contamination where flooding has occurred.

Agency rescues abandoned pets

By Jacob Bintliff
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

This sign seeks to find just one of the possibly thousands of pets lost in the destruction of Hurricane Katrina.

(U-WIRE) AUSTIN, Texas — As New Orleans residents evacuated their city last week for shelters in Texas and other states, they were forced to leave behind all their non-essential possessions — including, in many cases, their family pets.

While human evacuees have been bused and resettled on a massive scale, their canine and feline counterparts have not been a priority for the major relief agencies, the American Red Cross and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, overseeing the evacuation process. The Dallas-based Texas Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals reports that around 300 pets were moved from animal shelters in the path of the hurricane to shelters in the Houston area on the Sunday before the storm made landfall. An additional 100 of those animals were then moved by the SPCA to the Dallas area where they have been sheltered or taken in by area foster homes. Those 300, though, represent only a fraction of the many Louisiana shelters that were not able to evacuate before the storm.

"There could be untold thousands of animals still left in the area," said SPCA spokeswoman Maura Davies.

To round up the cats and dogs left behind in shelters or in private residences, the Louisiana SPCA created a Disaster Animal Response Team that was dispatched to the New Orleans area on Friday. The Louisiana SPCA has rescued at least 300 animals directly from the disaster zone according to the organization's Web site. While rescued people have been evacuated to outlying areas and states, pets found by rescuers are not being taken out of Louisiana.

"We are trying to keep the animals as close to their original locations as possible so that pet owners will be able to locate them more easily when they return," Davies explained.

While the Louisiana SPCA has focused on rescue operations for abandoned animals, with the aid from the Humane Society of the United States, the needs of pets whose owners successfully evacuated them to Texas but are currently unable to care for them have become the responsibility of the Texas SPCA and its affiliated local animal aid organizations. Those organizations are looking for places to house the pets until their owners can take them back.

Davies said that the Dallas-area SPCA had no trouble finding more than 60 foster homes for all of its 100 animals.

"We've been just overwhelmed by the local response," she said.

The number of pets remaining in Houston is unclear because so many have been moved through or into the city in recent days. To deal with the housing needs of so many displaced pets, the HSUS has set up a hotline for individuals who would like to offer their homes as a foster home. Calls are being routed to the Louisiana SPCA disaster team, which has been acting on requests to rescue specific animals in the New Orleans area, said Humane Society spokeswoman Rachel Querry.

A.G. Reilly passes key gay marriage ruling

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — A proposed citizen initiative that would ban gay marriage passed a key hurdle Wednesday when Attorney General Tom Reilly ruled the ballot question is permitted under the state constitution.

The action by Reilly, a Democrat running for governor in 2006, clears the way for the Massachusetts Family Institute and its allies to gather signatures of thousands of Massachusetts voters, and throws new doubt on the fate of an existing proposal to ban gay marriage.

If the petition effort is successful, the question then must by approved by two successive sittings of the 200-member state Legislature. The question would then be placed before voters as a constitutional amendment in November 2008.

Reilly said that he personally disagreed with the amendment, but was following the letter of the law.

"I do not agree with this amendment," he said. "There are a half dozen other amendments that I do not agree with. And I will speak out at the appropriate time... Today, I'm doing my job."

Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, said he was pleased with Reilly's decision.

"It was obviously made on legal and judicial grounds, not swayed by political or special interest groups."

Marty Rouse, campaign director for Massequality, a pro-gay marriage group, said he was "extremely disappointed."

"We think that (Reilly) has now opened a public debate that could last three long years. It would be a long, expensive, and brutal battle. It will be toxic for the state to have this debate," he said.

The so-called "citizen's initiative" that Reilly certified on Wednesday is separate from an existing proposal to ban gay marriage that lawmakers hammered out after the court decision legalizing gay marriage.

The existing proposal has already been approved by a majority of the Legislature, and must be approved again next Wednesday to go before voters in November 2006. That plan would ban gay marriage, while legalizing civil unions similar to those approved in Vermont and Connecticut.

The citizen's initiative needs at least 65,825 signatures from supporters before it goes to a vote in a joint session of the House and Senate. But it has a lower threshold for approval from the Legislature: only 25 percent of lawmakers need to support it to send it to the ballot in 2008.

Some opponents of gay marriage, including Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, have said they prefer the new initiative, because it doesn't allow civil unions. Romney praised Reilly's decision on Wednesday, saying "the Attorney General made the correct decision based on the facts and the law."

The fate of the pending proposal is unclear as next Wednesday's vote nears. Some lawmakers who initially voted for the amendment now say they have dropped their support, in part because of the possibility of voters weighing in on the Family Institute petition. Mineau said he is actively working to defeat the pending proposal.

Refugees still reluctant to leave washed out homes place, we will concentrate our resources and our forces on the mandatory evacuation."

Representatives of the regular military and the National Guard said they had no plans to compel departures from the city.

In fact, Army Gen. Russel Honore, leader of the military task force, said his work in New Orleans differed dramatically from the operations he usually directs.

"We normally try to go break things," he said. "In this case, we're trying to fix things."

With Louisiana, Texas and other nearby states overwhelmed by the nearly 1 million people displaced by Katrina, officials in those states sought to place the overflow elsewhere — often in states far away and sometimes without the evacuees knowing where they were going.

In Washington, D.C., about 500 people ended up at the D.C. Armory, which was ready for at least 400.

Most were happy to be there, though several were surprised, having misunderstood an announcement: They thought their plane was headed to Dallas rather than Washington's Dulles airport.

"Is there any way to get back?" Melvin Taylor, 53, tears welling in his eyes, asked a reporter. "I've got two aunties, Rosemary Parker and Bernice Taylor, and some cousins I can't find. I don't like it here."

In many cases, relocation managers said, evacuees simply did not want to venture far from home, fearing that distance would further complicate their return to the lives they knew.

Sociological factors also played a role, experts said. Most evacuees were relatively poor, and many may never before have left their cities or even their neighborhoods. Thus, the prospect of starting life anew in a distant city was daunting — especially for families that are separated.

Mercelita Plessy of New Orleans' Lower Ninth Ward lost contact with her four children when they retreated to the Superdome shortly after the storm passed. Now, she's afraid to leave town.

"People say they're sending them to New Mexico, they're sending them to Texas, they're sending them to Georgia, Mississippi," she said. "Lord! How am I going to find my children?"

Officials in Philadelphia said last week that they were prepared to receive as many as 5,000 people, and 600 were expected earlier this week, but only 55 had arrived by midday Wednesday. Officials cited "logistical problems" and said some potential arrivals balked at leaving the Houston area.

In one innovative operation, Miami-based Carnival Cruise Lines chartered three festively named ships — the Sensation, the Ecstasy and the Holiday — to the federal government for use as floating shelters for the next six months.

Hurricane Katrina victims receive food and supplies from the government yesterday.

Student's mother: He died for nothing

Nwachukwu of his son's dream to be a nurse.

Several neighborhood teenagers in Hyde Park say their fondest memories of Nwachukwu were when they played basketball together. One of those teens said Franklyn "always had a smile on his face."

"He was a very, very nice boy," said Franklyn's mother, Anthonia Nwachukwu as she choked back tears. "He died for nothing."

Most UMass students were on summer break at the time of Nwachukwu's death. However, many of his friends from his residence at Washington Hall in Southwest still gave an outpouring of support on Nwachukwu's "thefacebook.com" profile.

"There isn't a day that goes by without thinkin about all the memories you, me and the fam had. You were one of my closest friends. You always held me down," said one message. A long list of messages to Franklyn is still posted on his thefacebook.com "wall" since he died.

The staff at the UMass school of nursing had kind words for Nwachukwu as well.

"He always made sure he said 'hi' to me before he left the floor," said Liz Theroux, the undergraduate secretary at the School of Nursing. "He used to say 'I always make his day with my smile.'"

"He was willing to make the sacrifices necessary in order to further his education. He was a cooperative, respectful and public-spirited young man," said Christina Scharbaai, UMass School of Nursing minority advisor.

Nwachukwu's family says officials from UMass Amherst sent flowers, cards and their condolences.

But little can be done to erase the pain for this devastated family.

"He was the smartest person I know," said Franklyn's sister, Lisa Nwachukwu, 16. "There's nobody else like him."

Nwachukwu's family planned to bury his body in their native Nigeria.

When the students saw that this hurricane was more serious than most, they drove overnight to a friend's home in Fort Worth, Tex., where they quickly realized the gravity of the situation.

Katrina, one the worst natural disasters to ever strike the United States, left the city of New Orleans under 20 feet of water in many places, forcing thousands of people to flee and leaving many others stranded with a mounting risk of disease. The death toll in New Orleans alone could reach 10,000, said the city's mayor, Ray Nagin, and the storm has displaced over one million people.

While staying in Fort Worth, Morse received an email from Sheila Brennan, the program coordinator for domestic exchange programs at UMass, inviting her to return to the Amherst campus.

Although Hurricane Katrina was more severe than most hurricanes or earthquakes students have encountered, Morse's situation was typical of a displaced exchange student, said Brennan. Students on domestic exchange have had their schools closed for natural disasters before, and displaced students will frequently choose to return to UMass. "I don't think [this was] a more severe situation for the individual, because generally schools evacuate," she said.

Morse returned to Massachusetts on Sunday and moved back into her apartment in the Boulders, where her roommates had been planning to cover her rent. She was quickly activated at UMass, and the provost's office offered to assist her if she had any difficulty getting into classes.

"I think we did it as quickly as we possibly could," said Brennan. "I encourage [displaced exchange students] to come back, not knowing when the university would open."

Although she was disappointed that her semester in New Orleans was so drastically cut short, Morse feels very lucky. "If I didn't meet the friends I met because of the tour and orientation, I probably would have been at the Superdome, which would have been a terrible experience," she said.

And although she lost belongings, she still has a home to return to.

"It's just so tragic that so many people lost their homes, especially the poor," Morse said. "People who couldn't get out of the city were poor or handicapped in some manner, and then they had to go through the whole superdome thing, if they even made it that far."

easier.

Many of the people applying to local schools are Massachusetts residents who were enrolled in Louisiana schools before the hurricane hit. Others from out of state are those simply struggling to find a school to accept them for at least the semester. Massachusetts schools are encouraging students to apply, regardless of their home state.

Some of the affected schools in Louisiana include Tulane University and Loyola University, located in New Orleans. President Scott Cowen of Tulane University is pleased with the efforts that other schools have made to help the displaced students.

"Our students can continue their academic careers uninterrupted, thanks to an avalanche of support from our colleagues in higher education," said Cowen on the school's Web site.

Cowen has also encouraged his university's students to seek other schools with similarly accredited programs and courses close to what they planned to take in New Orleans.

Kristine Lelong, a spokesperson from Loyola school, said that the university was now focusing on "moving forward."

UMass President Jack M. Wilson hopes that the local colleges' acceptance of these displaced students will "have some small impact on those individuals whose lives have been devastated."

Gas prices soaring

going towards gas.

"It's outrageous," said Steve Mantia, junior at the University of Massachusetts. "I just spent $50 to fill up my tank. It's changed the way I drive."

Students have also changed how and where they socialize.

"If I'm going to go out at night, I'm going somewhere nearby," said Mantia. "I can't afford to drive too far out."

In order to help Americans cope with the increased gas costs, www.cheatatshopping.com has released a number of tips in order to help customers save when filling up.

"The littlest things can make a huge difference. Checking your tire pressure, using the correct grade of gasoline for your car, driving less aggressively, and using the cruise control feature can all insure that you're getting the most out of your gasoline," the Web site stated.

The Web site also advises customers to shop at non-brand name gas stations.

"Most non-brand name gas stations use the exact same product as brand names. Save a few cents every gallon and get a very similar product," the site said.

While big oil businesses have been able to withstand the constant barrage of increasing costs, small businesses like Arctic Circle station in Lynn, Mass. have needed to take drastic measures to see their way through this crisis.

Instead of raising their prices in order to assure profit, they lowered the costs, only allowing themselves 10 cents profit on each gallon.

"We're not Exxon or Mobil. It's vital that we make a profit," said Jim Mackin, manager of Arctic Circle. "We need to be able to pay our employees. We need to be able to pay their insurance."

When asked if he thinks if gas prices will ever drop back down, Mackin remains "unsure".

"We're catching up to the times. Europe has been $2.00 a gallon, Canada has been $2.00 a gallon," said Mackin.

"Like it or not, $2.00 a gallon is a reality."

Help from UMass students needed now more than ever

With the semester fully underway and classes in full swing, University of Massachusetts students are once again getting into the daily routine of attending classes and living college life. We will all be able to take advantage of the snooze button on the alarm clock in order to put off that 9 a.m. class just a tad bit longer. However, while we continue on with our lives here at school, we must not forget the freshman who will not be having a freshman year as the result of Hurricane Katrina.

In an effort to alleviate the hardships and pain left by Katrina, many colleges and universities are graciously opening their doors to students who have no school to attend. UMass, along with other local area schools such as Greenfield Community College, Westfield State College and Worcester State College are offering emergency admission to qualified students who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina, according to a UMass press release.

This act of generosity truly speaks to the masses and shows the victims of this disaster just how united we can be as a nation when its citizens are in need. For this university, accepting the displaced students has become not only an obligation, but a priority. According to Kevin Kelly, Director of Admissions at UMass, "The Admissions staff is working closely with Financial Aid, the Registar, the Bursar and the Office of Information Technologies to make all the necessary arrangements. Even those students who choose to enroll at another institution are very grateful for the consideration that we have extended them."

It is very important that students at UMass and the surrounding five colleges do their part to help those in need as a result of Hurricane Katrina. The devastation that New Orleans has seen is resulting in widespread disease and infection, which are among the main concerns of the Red Cross.

For the students here, it may not seem very close of a subject. Rising gas prices, so far, are the closest we've experienced to any changes in our daily lives after Katrina. But every class freshmen on this campus get lost going to and every boring lecture they sit through while nodding off are now experiences students planning to attend Tulane University and other Southern universities won't have.

The experiences and memories those people in New Orleans have right now are things that are and continue to be very difficult for us to comprehend. We are lucky enough to still have a University and still have a fall semester. For all of these reasons, it is imperative that we do what we can to help those who are currently unable to help themselves.

In the press release issued by the University of Massachusetts, it lists many different organizations to contact (both local and national) where students and faculty can go to help. This disaster is something that will forever change the face of the south. Please give what you can and never forget that every single part of your daily college routine is something that students down in New Orleans are unable to experience.

The end of an era

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

While we were away for the summer, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and administrative thug Michael Gargano fulfilled the mandate of last year's infamous Diversity Action Plan to commandeer student organizations. Despite the recommendation of the Diversity Commission that the university dispose of Gargano, and over the protest of students and faculty, the administration has now turned their plan into a dangerous campus policy of racist exclusion and student subordination.

On Wednesday, June 29, the administration moved in and seized control of the Office of ALANA Affairs (OAA). On that fateful morning, OAA Director Nelson Acosta was informed that Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin would assume 'signature authority' for all OAA transactions and for the 'day-to-day administrative oversight for the Office of ALANA Affairs, Native American Student Support Services, the Bilingual Collegiate Program, the United Asia Learning Resource Center and the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Blacks and Other Minority Students.'

This travesty marks the end of an era in which OAA, created by students in 1976, supported student leaders and student activism in addressing racism and institutional discrimination in higher education and in the UMass community.

The administration's possession of the Office of ALANA Affairs is the latest in a series of moves aimed at limiting student voice in campus affairs and gaining totalitarian control over all student agencies, including the SGA and its budget. The coordinated attack on dissent and student autonomy is part of a well-planned agenda touted by Chancellor John Lombardi since his days at the University of Florida. He has made a career as an excellent fundraiser, but has often run himself into trouble for being at odds with student support programs.

The administration's possession of the Office of ALANA Affairs is the latest in a series of moves aimed at limiting student voice in campus affairs and gaining totalitarian control over all student agencies, including SGA and its budget.

The trade-off between student programs and higher net revenues for the university is a dilemma UMass began confronting in 1997 when it moved to de-emphasize race and affirmative action in the admissions process. This trend has prospered under Lombardi, who has placed inflated importance upon classist standardized test scores for applicants. The idea is to move the hallmark state institution of public higher education in the direction of an exclusive private school in order to attract big money from out of state students. The administration's actions are classiest and, consequently, leading this school to a status-driven downward spiral.

While such tactics may or may not be effective for raising money, they do not serve the Massachusetts public interest in maintaining quality public education for state taxpayers. Since 1997, black and Latino enrollment at our university has declined by approximately 20 percent, and those who have remained have felt increasingly isolated and excluded. This all suits Lombardi and Gargano's racist tendencies just fine, it seems.

Lombardi knew he had to wait until most everyone had left for the summer before enacting the radical undermining of ALANA, just like he released the unconstitutional picketing code during Christmas break and the Diversity Action Plan during spring break of last year.

The ironic part now is that the same John Lombardi is disassembling support services for minority students under the most transluscent of diversity banners. The fact that diversity is being manipulated as pretext for pushing through dictatorial campus policies was well articulated by the entire UMass community throughout most of last year. The new challenge lies in continuing the struggle for real diversity at a time when voices of dissention are actively pursued and shut down by this administration.

Our tasks as students, faculty and university employees this year will be to remain present on campus in body and voice, to seek diversity and useful education, and most importantly, to maintain our autonomy and the sovereignty over our organizations. The future of UMass as a viable provider of public education depends on it.

Our alternate realities with the same old messages

Amelia Sabadini

I'm not a Trekkie. I swear I'm not, but as I was channel surfing (avoiding even the most trivial forms of commitment helps to minimize the risks of disappointment and despondency), I came across one of the various treks.

Right away I knew it was an episode that was set in one of those evil alternate dimensions. I knew it before any of the backstabbing and double-crossing that are the standard order in malicious parallel universes even started. I knew because there is a key defining feature of any evil alternate dimension in nearly all quasi-main stream sci-fi. This trans-series constant is the molecular instability of any material used for clothing by any female humanoid life forms.

Sci-fi falls short of its full potential when it is used to further ideological confinement like [exploiting the female body].

Now this isn't an 'I'm-mad-about-provocatively-dressed-women' rant. Far from it, the sight of barely clad women doesn't upset me. However, context is crucial, and I have to wonder, what does it say about our culture's perception of women and their bodies that greater exposure of the female form is a given in fictions where evil has the upper hand? Even in situations where a malevolent force only has control of the immediate environment, women are still usually wearing comparatively less and/or behaving in a sexually aggressive manner.

It was pointed out to me that Princess Leia wears as little as she ever does in the "Star Wars" trilogies when she is held captive by Jabba the Hut. Also, a dead ringer symptom of a female character turning evil is the sudden onset of a voracious sexual appetite. "Smallville" alone uses this ploy about three times a season.

A male friend of mine insists that this 'horny-women-are-evil-women' device is simply used in sci-fi to demonstrate that the character has lost conscious control and is succumbing to evil. Yet this is exactly the point. The message that comes across is that no good woman in her right mind would behave this way.

I wonder why there aren't any evil incidents or alternate dimensions where the men are just barely dressed. I asked some women I know about this; specifically, what was their construction of an evil alternate dimension, and what were the men wearing there? The answers I got included mini kilts, boxers, the Playboy bunny outfit, and fig leaves (this one turned up three different times from women who were not acquainted with each other). From my sister it was, "Chaps, and that's it! Well, and the hat, of course." Obviously there's an audience for such depictions, so why haven't we seen them yet?

These suggestions may sound capriciously demeaning and contemptuous to some. However, I believe any audible contempt here resonates from the fact that women (and girls) do not like it that in the realm where the imagination is meant to flourish, the impossible becomes tangible, and morals are questioned, examined and turned inside out, they're still expected by many to put on the nice girl straitjacket. It's like going to Never-Never Land and not being allowed to fly.

I know this is all about fiction, but don't believe that my concern with this matter is frivolous. Stories (especially the ones that get told over and over again) play prominent roles in shaping concepts in the minds of a culture's children. Much of what we learn about right and wrong, what consequences certain actions will have and how we're expected to behave is taught to us with stories. As we grow older, we look to stories to sustain us and inspire us. Our stories influence our beliefs. Our beliefs influence our behaviors and our reality. So, you see, fiction is worth being concerned about.

What are the consequences for a culture of having stories repeatedly claim that women who enjoy displaying themselves and/or being sexually aggressive are evil? What of the stories claiming that good women are only sexual when they're forced to be? If we buy into these messages or even just passively accept them, can sexual contact ever really be seen as a form of genuine intimacy? Can women who sensuously enjoy themselves (dress provocatively, dance erotically, or initiate sexual contact) also expect to enjoy the same protections as the women who don't and the men who do?

I contend that these messages end up severing women's rights to their sexuality and are exponentially more harmful when they're reiterated in science fiction. Upholding repressive conventions about female sexuality in a forum where anything else is possible serves, via contrast, to make these antiquated and unfair notions seem insurmountable. Doing this is not only a strike against women and the concept of intimacy, but it is also an affront to science fiction itself. Sci-fi falls short of its full potential when it's used to further ideological confinement like this.

Fortunately, not all sci-fi is infected by the 'good-girls-don't-unless-something-is-wrong' philosophy, which is why I still watch "Battle Star Galactica." Yes, I know this show has a couple of traditionally bad/sexy women on it, but barring some radical plot twist, it also has one of the most progressive female heroines yet. We've seen Starbuck having more sex (with more partners) than anyone else on the show, and last season she rescued herself with absolutely no help from her love interest. We could do with a lot more stories about women like this and maybe a couple about the dimension with the boys in chaps.

More to learn outside class

Mike Anmuth

I have a poster in my bedroom that was given to me by the Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs of the "100 things you really need to do before graduating from UMass Amherst." The same poster can be seen all over the Whitmore Administration building, and since I have a lot of UMass spirit, I was excited when I was given one of my very own. On this poster, item number 86 says, "Remind yourself that learning also occurs outside the syllabus and the classroom."

There are many good points to this poster, and I recommend you stop and read it the next time you're in Whitmore. The item mentioned above really stood out to me. It expresses a great deal in such a simple way that one must consider it. After all, we go to college to get an education, to get a degree, and to get a transcript full of grades that will make either graduate school or an employer one day take notice of them.

College is not just a series of classes or credits, however, and this item addresses that very fact. I am proud of my transcript, proud of the classes I have attended, and proud of the ones that I should have attended more but in which I still managed to get a decent grade. But although I have learned immeasurable amounts in the classroom, I feel that I have also learned a great deal outside those four walls.

How many of us can say exactly what we learned in our freshman year literature course or in our freshman year math course? I can pick out bits and pieces that I still use today, but I remember hanging out with friends, learning about new cultures, staying out until the sun came up and not having to wonder what my parents would think, and forming the beginnings of a new chapter in life during that same freshman year. Of course I was proud of my grades, to show that I could do well in something more difficult than high school, but it is the experiences outside the classroom that I remember most today.

It is not to say that the classroom and the activities outside it are unrelated. Everyone has studied in the library at some point in time for their classes, perhaps alone or perhaps with friends or classmates. The syllabus does not just specify when exams will be held and when papers are due; it also gives a guideline for when we will have to get together in study groups and tells us that we can't show up to our 9a.m. class at 11a.m. after being out much, much too late the night before.

College is its own animal, and like a mechanical bull in a cowboy-themed bar, you hop on and ride as much as you can without being thrown off, and then you get back on for another go-round.

Item 86 speaks to me directly because college is not like anything else. It is not like high school - you are free to experience life unfettered by the requirement to be in class in certain periods of the day and the mandate to eat lunch at a certain time. It is not like the workforce, where people are social but cultural learning about others may not happen quite as frequently. College is its own animal, and like a mechanical bull in a cowboy-themed bar, you hop on and ride as much as you can without being thrown off, and then you get back on for another go-round.

"Remind yourself that learning also occurs outside the syllabus and the classroom" should be a mantra for college students. Whether you're studious or not, whether you enjoy going to class or not, whether your classmates and professor enjoy you being there or not, realize that there is so much peripheral learning that happens outside the structure of the lecture or the discussion group and that we must keep our eyes open for it. Of course, this is something that everyone must experience for themselves, so writing about it doesn't really give it justice.

Allow yourself to be absorbed into the college culture. Learn from your peers and your classmates and yourself. So much learning happens inside the college classrooms that we sometimes do not see the learning outside, but it is there, it is memorable, and when we look back on it later, often the outside learning is what is most prominent in our minds.

All hail the King of Blues

By MICHAEL RUSACK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The blues is often considered the music of emotion and pain. Many of the most significant bluesmen in history have turned to addiction of drugs or alcohol. Nearing his 80th birthday, the non-drinking or smoking blues legend B.B. King lives to defy the stereotypes and declare blues music here to stay.

Most men would consider themselves lucky to be alive and healthy on their milestone 80th birthday. And while Mr. King can do the same, it is his choice of birthday celebration that is the daunting detail. Tonight, just over a week before his 80th birthday, the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame legend will bring a historic festival concert to the stage of the Mullins Center.

The Concert comes during a difficult time for King, however. A native of Itta Bena, Miss., King considers himself deeply rooted to the area. Following the tragedies of Hurricane Katrina, King has spoken out about his anxiety and sympathy for all those affected.

"I have some friends and family down in New Orleans, and also on the Gulf coast of Mississippi," King told The Associated Press. "I've tried to call them several times but I can't get through to them so I don't know where they are."

In another Associated Press article, King also noted his affection for the city of New Orleans, once legendary for its blues nightclubs.

"New Orleans had a sound ... that no one has completely captured," he said in a telephone interview from Detroit.

Otherwise, this has been a milestone year for the King. He recorded a new album of duets including Eric Clapton, Elton John, and John Mayer. He has been touring many sold out dates, and recently saw the groundbreaking for the B.B. King Museum. The museum is planned to open in 2007.

King was born on Sept. 16, 1925, on a plantation in Itta Bena. He has been performing and recording music since the 1940s, though he originally began as a gospel musician. During the late 1940s he began playing blues and moved his act to the musical capital of Memphis, Tennessee.

The name "B.B." ("Blues Boy") came naturally to King when he hit the blues market. For King's trademark guitar, "Lucille," however, the naming wasn't such an easy process.

In the mid-1950s, King was performing at a dance in Twist, Arkansas when two men got in to a fight. The men knocked over a kerosene stove, and started a fire in the hall. Though he rushed to get outside to safety, B.B. left his guitar inside. He rushed inside to save the guitar, nearly injuring himself in the process. King later found out that the fight between the men was over a girl named Lucille. Ever since, this has been the name of all of his signature Gibson guitars.

In the 1960s, the name B.B. King started to become more popular when rock guitar greats like Keith Richards and George Harrison began to speak volumes of the breakthrough artist.

In 1979, King had what would soon become his biggest mainstream hit, "The Thrill Is Gone" (1970). B.B. King has since recorded over 50 albums, and has performed a daunting amount of concerts annually. At one point in his career, King would play over 200 shows each year.

B.B. has won three Grammys and was inducted into the Blues Foundation Hall of Fame In 1984. Later, in 1987, he was also inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987.

Information from the Associated Press and bbking.com were used in compiling this report.

'Virgin' pleases moviegoers

By JAKE MONTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"The 40 Year Old Virgin," written by Steve Carell and Judd Apatow, who also directed it, seems like a mildly funny premise. Yet after seeing the billboards, we all thought it would be like a two-hour Saturday Night Live skit, shallow, inane, and aimless. It most likely snuck through the studio, getting passed from one exec to another, without any of them ever paying attention while reading the script. After all, we've got to ask ourselves, how often does a Saturday Night Live icon like Steve Carell make a good movie his first time out? Never, right?

Steve Carell is Andy Stitzer, a forty-year-old man who collects old packaged action figures, wakes up each morning with a bulge in his boxers, has a videogame chair, watches Survivor with his neighbor, works in the back room of an electronics store, and has never had sex, and more importantly, as the film would have us believe, has never experienced love.

When three of his buddies invite him to a late-night poker game and the talk turns to the "nastiest sh— you've ever done," Andy is at a loss for words. He compares feeling a woman's breasts to feeling bags of sand, and the dirtiest dirty talk he can conjure up is, "Let's screw," and "Me so horny, me love you long time." They quickly blow his cover. Andy is a virgin, and his buddies, Paul Rudd, Romany Malco, and Seth Rogan, set out on a mission to rectify the situation.

Everyone in the film is hung up on sex. David (Paul Rudd), in a career re-inspiring performance (you may remember him as Alicia Silverstone's stepbrother in "Clueless"), is obsessed with an old flame, and for this reason decides to "retire his cock." Jay (Romany Malco) is cheating on his girlfriend. Cal (Seth Rogan,) who believes Andy is a serial killer

Documentary follows college band to the 'Last Dispatch'

By BRADLEY FARBERMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Like Cream, The Police and George Costanza before them, the indie pop/rock princes of Dispatch called it quits on a high note.

A really, really high note. The press have taken to calling last summer's farewell concert "the largest independent music event in history," and for good reason: 110,000 fans from fifty states and twenty countries gathered at Boston's Hatch Shell Amphitheatre on July 31, 2004 to experience Dispatch's music in real-time for the last time.

This is kind of a big deal, seeing as Pete Francis, Brad Corrigan and Chad Stokes Urmston, a trio of twenty-somethings collectively known as Dispatch, never inked a major-label deal, never had a radio hit and never appeared on MTV, all rarities for a band that made it to the Billboard Top 20 on three separate occasions, sold roughly 500,000 records, and packed venues likes New York City's Roseland Ballroom, Boulder, CO's Fox Theatre, Washington, D.C.'s 9:30 Club and Philadelphia's Electric Factory.

Even rarer was an opportunity to film the band's final concert and document the lives of its members in the twelve days leading up to said event, so director Helmut Schleppi ("A Foreign Affair") jumped at the chance. What resulted was a touching look at three people who had traveled the same road for eight years and had reached that road's end, together. "The Last Dispatch" premiered July 29 at the Somerville Theatre outside of Boston.

There was a time, however, when Dispatch was not exactly aiming towards having a movie made about their lives.

"[We were just] trying to get a better PA for the next gig," said Francis.

"Or trying to have a bass with four strings," said Corrigan.

"I thought we were just hanging out and having fun," said Urmston.

The three guitarists met while attending Middlebury College in 1996. Brad switched to drums, Pete switched to bass, they all sang, and a band was born.

For Dispatch, however, baby steps were in order.

"We started everything by going down to Duke," said Corrigan. Early on, the band spent a month at Duke University, playing frat houses and anywhere that would have them. The Cosmic Cantina, a local restaurant, paid them in burritos.

"We just did that everywhere," said Corrigan. "School was a good platform to playing clubs."

But working the club circuit was no easy task.

"We tried to play all these small clubs, and they'd say they weren't into it, or 'call us back the third Thursday of every month,'" said Urmston.

"It took us years to get a booking agent and to get out of certain rooms," said Francis. "We played the Wetlands maybe 15 or 20 times, and the Middle East."

But there were other problems, too.

"The hardest part was having no crew," said Corrigan. "No one helping us with sound, no guitar tech. Our scariest gig was in New York, when both of our guitars died."

Bad breaks aside, the band members look back on those early days with fondness.

"Even though there were hard times wrapped up in it, there's a brotherhood in meeting at the age we did and spending every second together in our formative years," said Urmston. "That doesn't come around again."

"It was a fun adventure, jumping in the van and getting lost, dodging deer," said Corrigan.

"There was a real sense of [not knowing] any better, and doing what we could to keep playing," said Urmston. "It was a good mix of being pretty naive and enjoying the energy people gave us back when we played, and enjoying each other."

Unfortunately, enjoying each other's friendship did not always translate into musical agreement. Things came to a halt in 2002 when, at the peak of their success, Dispatch went on break.

Band members Pete Francis, Brad Corrigan and Chad Stokes Urmston reunited for the premier of "The Last Dispatch," a documentary that followed the band up until their final concert.

"The hardest thing was having three painters trying to paint on one canvas," said Corrigan. "We did it pretty successfully for seven years. But you get tired of compromising. It's a bummer, but you're growing into three different people."

So different, in fact, that it became impossible to keep the band together. Two years after they went on break, Dispatch made it official with a marathon final show that drew 110,000 fans. It was the culmination of a career in independent music.

"It's so beautiful to see what grassroots and word of mouth can do," said Corrigan. "And it was fun as shit."

"We all have different musical avenues rockin' right now," said Urmston. "Each one of us is involved with different things."

Corrigan, for instance, just released his first solo album (under his nickname, Braddigan) on Third Surfer Records (his own imprint). Francis is readying his fourth album, "Everything Is One," and Urmston's band, State Radio, is on tour now (their fall itinerary includes a stop at Northampton's Calvin Theatre, supporting Badfish).

Everything is going swimmingly for a trio of twenty-somethings who used to call themselves Dispatch. But what about all those songs and the friendships forged over free burritos and deer-dodging?

"We still have each other, and we still have a heart for the music," said Corrigan.

From lunchrooms to centerstage, 'new punk' goes mainstream

By DAVID PESSAH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Mar. 1, 2001, Vinnie Caruana was personally selling his band's t-shirts for $10 before he was about to perform in a room roughly the size of an elementary school lunchroom. About 100 kids skipped their homework assignments to watch some older kids play this new brand of punk that had been growing in popularity all over Long Island. This "show", punk purists will yell at you if you call it a concert, was headlined by Vinnie's band The Movielife and supported by a handful of now-defunct acts and a short guy with an acoustic guitar who called himself Dashboard Confessional. Between the sets, kids sat down on crates and joked and hung around with their friends as if the venue was someone's garage. When the bands came out, the kids jumped and yelled along with them. After the show, all the acts stuck around to hang out and meet their fans, talking about music and relaxing until the place cleared out.

Before Fall Out Boy owned the number one spot on TRL and Simple Plan made Blink-182 look hardcore, the bands like The Movielife that paved the way for them were playing lunchrooms and warehouses in areas like Long Island, New York. At this time on Long Island, and in areas of California, DC, and Florida, middle-class kids took the guitar lessons they took after Green Day's album "Dookie" and added lyrics about relationships, friendships, drama, and more about relationships. Sometime around when New Found Glory hit MTV, collective suburban America caught on, and the music and show lifestyle caught on along with it. Dashboard Confessional played the inaugural show for MTV Unplugged Version 2.0 and opened for Weezer while The Used's Bert McCracken hosted on MTV and dated Kelly Osbourne, and more than Long Island was jumping along at the new punk shows.

Now, on Aug. 16, 2005, over four years after that night in the lunchroom, Vinnie Caruana sits outside of the venue smoking a cigarette with his band mates in I Am the Avalanche before he hits the stage. The Movielife has been disbanded, and I Am the Avalanche is touring with Silverstein and newcomers Scary Kids Scaring Kids and Evergreen Terrace in support of their debut album to be released on Sept. 27. This show is at The Downtown in Farmingdale, Long Island, and it is sold out, like most of their dates on this tour. The venue, larger and actually meant for concerts, not lunch, is packed with more black t-shirts and eyeliner than I have ever seen in one place at one time before. Kids as young as fifteen are mingling with bigger kids Vinnie's age (about 30) who've been doing this around Long Island since before the Movielife formed in 1997. Though some of the walking space and novelty had been lost since my first show years ago, there was still that energy of kids waiting to jump and sing along with each band.

When I Am the Avalanche took the stage, the audience in The Downtown crowded towards the band. Energized from an impressive performance from Scary Kids Scaring Kids, who likely increased their fan base that night, the sea of black shirts was ready to make waves. As the band ripped through song after song from their upcoming self-titled album, words were screamed and limbs were flailed. "Bloody Symphony" was dedicated to all of Vinnie and the band's supporters on Long Island, and "My Second Restraining Order" was about just that. As the band busted into their show favorite, "My Next Beating's in ..." the worked-up crowd was drenched in sweat and happy to fall on one another to get as close to the stage as possible, with kids crowd-surfing overhead to make it to the stage. I Am the Avalanche received tons of support that night from their fans, including Daryl Palumbo from prominent band Head Automatica, who was just another kid in the crowd watching one of his favorite bands.

As this new punk has been embraced by MTV and fans everywhere, small shows like the one at The Downtown are decreasing as bands now play arenas and tours like this summer's Warped Tour. Shows like The Movielife's in the lunchroom are almost nonexistent. Here on the island, though, where much of the scene started, hometown bands like I Am the Avlanche, Brand New, Taking Back Sunday, and Head Automatica continue the "show" and play venues like The Downtown to a small room of dedicated fans packed together to sing along. Here the t-shirts still cost $10-$15 and may be sold directly by your favorite artist. There are still no seats to be found or stadiums to navigate. And there's always that chance you'll get to meet your favorite artist lounging between acts or after the show.

'Icarus Girl' loses her wings, confusing fantasy with reality

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

Jessamy Harrison is eight years old and troubled in every way. She is caught between cultures. Her mother Sarah is Nigerian, and her father, Daniel, an Englishman. Already confused and troubled about her personality, it is all the worse when kids tease her about being multiracial. When the novel begins, she is a loner who hides in cabinets, reads in empty rooms, and doesn't go near kids her own age. Often, she throws tantrums.

Her mother suggests a change of scenery. She brings Jessamy to her family's homeland in Nigeria. Here she learns about the other half of her culture. She bonds with her grandfather, learns to cook Nigerian meals, and gazes at Nigerian clothing.

It is in the long abandoned boy's dormitory, aside her grandfather's house, that she meets Titiola. Jessamy nicknames her TillyTilly. TillyTilly is shy at first, and Jessamy coaxes somebody else out of her shell for a change and forms a new friendship. TillyTilly, however, only shows up in the abandoned boy's dormitory. Where is her family? Where does she go at night? How can she do such absurd things?

At one point, they visit an amusement park. With the entrance of TillyTilly, the gates swing open and the rides miraculously start. Later, Jess finds the door to her grandfathers forbidden study open and TillyTilly waiting. Things turn eerie. Jess goes to visit TillyTilly and finds a shrine around a painting of an old ghostly woman with exceptionally long arms. "She felt the hairs on the back of her neck prickle. It was a picture drawn in black charcoal... done in thick sweeping strokes, a sketch of a black woman with thick glossy hair, eyes wide and dark ... and her arms were grotesque. Surely nobody could have arms that long! ... Long and thin, tentacle-like, stretching to her ankles."

When Jess returns home with her mom and dad, TillyTilly follows with little trouble. The two girls visit the park and TillyTilly's secrecy is increasingly odd. Her conversations with Jessamy are threatening. There's alarm in the way she promises to "get" Jess's enemies.

There are moments absent of TillyTilly, involving Jess's parents, playdates with friends and a comical cousin. At one point, she even visits a psychiatrist. Jessamy seems to be regaining something of a life. All the while, however, we can't help but feel TillyTilly lingering over the story. She is just too cryptic, too puzzling, especially in her intentions.

Meanwhile, Jessamy is haunted by dreams of the long-armed woman; she throws tantrums in school, beating up children and even biting one of them. At one point she assaults a teacher, and we know it's in someway motivated by TillyTilly. She lurks over this story like impending doom.

The obvious question is whether she's real. Her parents are never around, she doesn't seem to live anywhere, and she can come and go without making a sound or being spotted. "Jessy, you guessed without me explaining that I'm ... that I'm not really here. I mean, of course, I'm really here, just not really really here if you see what I mean ... Most of the time I'm somewhere else but I can appear, and you haven't imagined me!"

The scenes with TillyTilly are never quite comfortable, and we question many times whether we are in fantasy or reality. If she isn't real, how can she bring Jess to places forbidden to outsiders? For instance, they visit the house of a school bully where we find sorrowful reasons behind her personality, a sequence we later find was real. She also seems able to bury Jess beneath the earth. "TillyTilly's arms enfolded her from behind and pulled her down through the staircase, the carpet ... There was a thick layer of brown darkness above ... and [Jess] realized with wonder and alarm that it was earth, the stuff in daffodils in the playground were planted in the spring." Jess regards her as having "magic powers." Maybe she does, or maybe Jess is mentally unstable.

Helen Oyeyemi wrote the novel at the age of nineteen when she was studying for her exams. It is remarkably written, with candid looks at the agony of childhood and desire of acceptance. Above all, it is its loneliness, and amidst all its heavy themes is a story that is alarming in its dialogue and frightening in its atmosphere and mood. TillyTilly is the heart of the novel. While we can relate more to Jessamy, the enigma of TillyTilly seems to engulf every chapter and follow our imaginations like a hallucination that won't leave.

Quality In Everything We Do

until he finds out the problem is just that he's a virgin, tells Andy he should date hood rats, because the first time he has sex he's going to be "really, really bad." If he dates hood rats, then by the time he gets to someone he cares about he'll be all right at it . but probably still pretty bad.

What could degenerate into a sexual odyssey of pornographic proportions something like "Deuce Bigalow" becomes a love story. Trish (Katherine Keener), who is always brilliant, shows up as a friendly divorcee who owns her own store called "We Sell Your Stuff on Ebay." The trick the film pulls off is that it makes us really like Andy and laugh with him, not at him. He's endearing. This is very deliberate, and proves that "The 40 Year Old Virgin" is a work of considerable artistic integrity. But it's so funny and entertaining you might not even notice it.

As the film progresses, Andy becomes a better and better salesman and is promoted at work. His boss, Paula, finds out he's a virgin, and comes onto him. But Andy soon realizes that Cal's strategy of dating hood rats until he gets better in the sack just isn't his style. Interestingly enough, as Andy becomes a better salesman at work, he gets better at selling himself, and Trish falls head over heels for him and begins to wonder why he doesn't seem to be interested in having sex with her.

This is the heart of the story, and because this film has such heart, you won't be laughing as much for the last forty five minutes. But it could be an absorbing drama for all we care, because by then we're firmly enamored with the characters. "The Forty Year Old Virgin" is an outstanding comedy, nothing close to those preconceived notions we all had after seeing the billboards. You'll leave the theater still laughing and with the pleasant notion that for Andy and the filmmakers it was a "labor of love."

Gamers will have to decide on the features they want with their XBox 360. Multiple versions of the console will be released, each containing special attributes for an increased price.

By Victor Godinez
The Dallas Morning News

Microsoft kicked over an anthill when it announced the price plan for the Xbox 360 a couple of weeks ago.

For $299, gamers can get the "core system," which is basically the console, a controller and a video cable.

Spend an extra hundred bucks on the "Premium" package, and you get the console, a detachable hard drive, a wireless controller and a clutch of other peripherals.

When the nerds learned the hard drive would not be standard equipment, the complaints rose like B.O. at an LAN party.

The main concern is that if the hard drive is not included with all consoles, then developers won't program their games to take full advantage of it.

David Reid, director of global platform marketing for the Xbox, tried to assuage those concerns in a recent interview.

What Microsoft is telling developers, he says, is: "Don't build games that require the hard drive, but build games that exploit it."

Gamers will be able to save their games to the hard disk, Reid says, and many games will use the disk to store upcoming scenes in a game, since it's much faster to load scenes from a hard drive than to load them from the DVD disk. And gamers who buy the core system will be able to buy the hard drive separately for $100.

Reid says he expects the premium version (with the hard drive included) to outsell the core system, at least initially. And even when casual gamers start buying the cheaper core package, the expectation is that most of them will upgrade eventually.

"In the end, (the core and premium buyers) really do end up being the same market in a lot of ways," Reid says. "It's just the pace that people get there."

Still, many gamers don't understand why Microsoft is creating two markets in the first place. If you buy the core console and then try to upgrade each piece individually to get the same hardware included with the premium version, you'd spend more than $200.

That would make the cheaper core system more expensive than the premium model, gamers argue, since Microsoft will be charging a premium on peripherals sold separately.

In addition to the lack of a hard drive, the core system also doesn't ship with a memory card.

If you want to save your progress or do any kind of online activity with Xbox Live, you'll need to buy a 64-megabyte memory card for $40.

Given that a memory card or storage device of some kind is nearly a requirement, the cost savings on the bare-bones core system gets even smaller.

To many industry analysts and hardcore gamers, the core system is a publicity stunt, a way for Microsoft to argue that its next-generation system costs only $300, when the only Xbox 360 package worth buying costs $400.

But Reid says Microsoft research shows that there is a demand for a cheaper, simpler system.

"One of the things that we heard very loud and clear in looking at the gaming audience in particular, but the entertainment consumer in general, is that it's no longer one size fits all," he says.

For example, to play original Xbox games on the Xbox 360, you'll need the hard drive, since that was a standard feature on the original Xbox and the games were programmed to use it. But Reid says many casual gamers don't have any interest in revisiting their older games, or perhaps never owned the original Xbox, and so have no need for the hard drive.

"There are some people for whom the core system is right," he says.

In the end, the debate will probably fade as long as most developers program their Xbox 360 games to use the hard drive in some way.

What gamers don't want, though, is a situation such as Sony had with Final Fantasy XI. When that online role-playing game was released, gamers were required to buy a $99 hard drive for the PlayStation 2 in order to play the game.

But only a couple other PS2 games ever supported the drive, frustrating gamers who had to keep using memory cards even though they had 40-gigabyte hard drives plugged into their consoles.

Speaking of expensive, check out some of the bundle packages retailers are starting to offer for the Xbox 360.

Many stores are telling gamers that if they want to pre-order their consoles to make sure they get one on the day the console is released, they'll have to buy a bundle that includes games, extra peripherals and so forth.

This isn't something that Microsoft requires, and many stores will surely have the stand-alone consoles available on launch day. But retailers know some people are willing to pay top dollar to be first in line.

Check out GameStop.com, for example. Its cheapest bundle starts at $700.

That sounds like a bargain, though, compared to the Omega bundle, which seems to include just about every game and peripheral unveiled so far.

The price?

A tidy $1999.69.

'Flowers' next in latest fad

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Correspondent

Jim Jarmusch's latest film, "Broken Flowers," exemplifies what appears to be the new fad in comedy-drama plots: A middle-aged to elderly man (it never seems to be a woman) is forced to revisit and confront his past and take inventory of his present life. It seems this concept is a vast, untapped well of opportunities to present the main character awkwardly adjusting to the people and places in his life which he had dropped contact with, and struggling to cope with how they have changed, while simultaneously realizing and coming to terms with his own mortality. The plot device of this particular film, however, only requires the man in question to revisit a small timeframe in his life, focusing on the women with whom he had relationships back then.

Broken Flowers
Directed by Jim Jarmusch
Starring Bill Murray

Grade A-

Bill Murray stars as the aforementioned man, Don Johnston, an aging playboy who has just broken up with the most recent of a long string of girlfriends. Don receives a letter with no return address or signature, supposedly from one of his past lovers. The woman claims Don is the father of her son, who is now nineteen and has gone missing, probably to track down his biological father. With the help of his best friend and neighbor, Winston (Jeffrey Wright), who fancies himself a sleuth, Don attempts to meet with the four surviving women whom he had relationships with at the approximate time of his son's conception. He visits each one of them unannounced, conservatively dressed, flowers in hand, advised by Winston to look for clues such as typewriters and pink stationery.

Like most Jarmusch films, the dramatic core of Broken Flowers is trimmed with gentle, absurdist comedy. The humor derives from everything, from a man conversing with his pet rabbit to a large number of carrot slices being speared on a fork. Don's former girlfriends include a professional Dr. Doolittle who is apparently successful at her craft, a sultry widow with an uninhibited daughter who just happens to be named Lolita, and a middle-aged biker chick. Jarmusch pans for nuggets of humor in the mundane and awkward situations Don experiences in his quest, such as an annoying toy on an airplane and cheap rental cars ill-fitting of Don's personality ("I'm a stalker in a Taurus!") While the comedic undertone manages to decorate and puncture nearly every scene, it rarely gets in the way of the genuine drama at the film's center.

Jarmusch proves himself to be a master of minutia, turning seemingly every event from Don's journey starting with the instigating letter into a significant chapter of the story. Such scenes serve as a rear spoiler for the film's pace, enabling Murray to work his magic as a man glumly sleepwalking through his grand adventure. The film works hard to not become the young-man-searching-for-his-biological-father cliché in reverse, although faint wisps of soap opera occasionally seep through. The film contains every item needed to earn the stamp of a hip indie film: a montage before the stylish opening credit sequence, an offbeat soundtrack, long tracking shots, and, yes, dream sequences. These may be timeworn traditions by now, but Jarmusch succeeds in making them seem fresh.

Since the ending of "Broken Flowers" contributes quite heavily to shaping the lasting impression of the film, it is difficult to avoid spoiling its secrets while describing the feeling I had while leaving the theater. The most I will allow myself to say about it is that parallels could be drawn from "Broken Flowers" ending to the ending of de Sica's "The Bicycle Thief." Should you decide to see this film, I cannot guarantee you satisfaction upon its closure, but you cannot help but gain some pleasure from the movie itself. There's a lot to enjoy in this film, which deftly delivers a solid drama punctuated by instances of irreverent humor. While the movie's narrow scope renders it incapable of becoming recognized as an epic, it carves out a little niche for itself, and that's all a film like this needs.

Bill Murray plays the role of Don Johnston, an aging playboy who receives a letter from one of his previous lovers that his son has run away, leading Johnston on a wild goose chase to find his son.

Seven cars we love to hate and the reasons why we do

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

There are some cars that, in general, people just hate. It could be that they are ugly, or poorly made, or maybe some combination of the two. It could just be that they have a bad reputation. Whatever the reason, most of these cars are not without redeeming qualities, and even the worst cars have admirers — even if they only admire them because they are terrible cars.

DeLorean DMC 12 — The DeLorean conjures up fond memories of "Back to the Future" for many people. Others think of John DeLorean's drug scandal. Somewhere in-between the nostalgia and villainy lies the fact that the DMC 12 was not a very well-designed car. The struts on the heavy gullwing doors often break so that they do not stay open, cars parking next to them force the owner to enter through the trunk, and even when new, the brushed stainless steel bodyðinsisted upon by John DeLoreanðdid not match the plastic bumpers and was impossible to clean. Colin Chapman of Lotus was called in to oversee the project, but disliked several aspects of the final product, including the unpainted body. Financial problems and slow sales eventually drove the company out of business. As the adage goes, if you buy a DeLorean, make sure you get two. You never know when you'll need parts.

AMC Gremlin — The Gremlin is one car that is remembered fondly because it was so ugly, and there's no denying that the name was appropriate for a car so unattractive. In addition to being ugly, it was not an exciting car to drive, and did not win many fans, even in its prime. Despite this, the car still retains a dedicated following, including people who enjoy racing the cars.

Ford Mustang II — Even Mustang enthusiasts lament the Mustang II. Decried as a "dressed-up Pinto" and a slow excuse for a Mustang, the car has drawn strong criticisms even from creator Lee Iaccocca, who had claimed to love the car when it was released. Its critics often forget several things, though. First, almost all Mustangs have been based on relatively boring cars, from the original Mustang's roots in the Falcon to the 1979-2004 Mustang's platform, shared with the Granada and LTD II. Second, even those who think they are ugly have to admit that the Mustang II draws a lot of styling cues from the original Mustangs, and many aspects of it can be seen in the design of the retro-styled 2005 Mustang. Third, the Mustang II sold better than any earlier Mustang had, and effectively saved the car during the gas crisis, a time when performance cars were not in high demand.

Chevrolet Corvair — The Corvair, most things considered, was not a bad car. It was strangely good-looking, sporty and enjoyed decent sales. That is, it enjoyed decent sales until Ralph Nader came along. As Nader put it, the Corvair was "unsafe at any speed," and, needless to say, that kind of publicity is not very good for a car. The Corvair soon met its demise at the hands of Nader, but the car remains relatively popular among enthusiasts who enjoy its quirks and, presumably, like to live dangerously.

Yugo GV/GV-X — The Yugo is the oddball of this list, in that it absolutely lives up to its reputation as an awful car. They were completely unattractive, slow and poorly made, but despite this they sold well when they were first introduced, probably because they were also extremely inexpensive. The car's reputation as unsafe was exaggerated, since it passed all U.S. safety inspections when it was imported, but its reputation as unreliable was grounded in truth. "Consumer Reports" said that it was one of the worst cars that they had ever tested, and there are many stories of Yugos falling apart even before they left the dealership. The Yugo legacy lives on in the fact there are hardly any left in running condition these days, due both to lack of interest and poor quality.

Pontiac Fiero — The Fiero, like the Corvair, was a quirky, sporty car with relatively good sales. Unfortunately, it also shared the Corvair's track record for safety. Rumors circulated, that the car was unsafe and often burst into flame, and the car's reputation was hurt. Strangely, the Fiero managed to avoid being axed by GM and continued production for several years after the rumors came out. Today, there are still plenty of surviving Fieros, and even if they are not all that attractive, they are still beloved by many enthusiasts.

Ford Edsel — No list of poor design choices would be complete without a look at the oft-insulted Edsel. Ford had very high expectations for the car, named after Henry Ford's son. When introduced, there were over 25 models planned for production, nearly none of which were actually built due to slow sales. The Edsel's unpopularity stemmed from its "bold" styling; as one critic put it, the car looked like "a Buick sucking a lemon." As often happens, the car's ugliness won the hearts of some people, and the car retains a dedicated following, despite its extremely slow sales when new.

'Reunion' premiering Thursday on Fox

By David Bianculli
New York Daily News

The new drama "Reunion" has among the more unusual premises and structures of any new show this fall.

It'll take an entire season of this new Fox show to pay off, if interest in its mystery and characters can be sustained that long. Right now, as the series is structured, it's literally too early to tell.

"Reunion" begins (Thursday night at 9 EDT) in the present day, with a detective (Mathew St. Patrick) descending upon a woman, initially unidentified, to ask her questions about the death of one of her old classmates.

It's the year of her class' 20th reunion. Of six close friends who graduated high school together in 1986, only five are alive, and the death turns out to be a cold-case mystery.

The gimmick here is that this week's pilot episode flashes back 20 years and spends the entire hour with the characters, conflicts and pop tunes of 1986. Next week, the action, and the music and costumes, will move forward to 1987, and so on and on and on, one year per episode, until we get to the present-day season finale and the solution to the murder mystery.

Jon Harmon Feldman, who wrote the pilot, and Jon Amiel, who directed it, both have strong experience with flashback television. Feldman wrote for "The Wonder Years" and created "American Dreams," while Amiel directed the multilayered, multidecade miniseries "The Singing Detective."

Even some cast members have experience traveling in TV's Wayback Machine. Will Estes, who stars as Will, this show's noble poor guy, played J.J. on "American Dreams." And Chyler Leigh, who portrays Carla, this show's love-stricken best friend, dabbled in the Madonna decade once before, as the spiky-haired record-store salesgirl on "That 80s Show."

The cast also includes Amanda Righetti (Hailey on "The O.C.") as Jenna, the slightly trashy Madonna wannabe; Dave Annable as Aaron, who worships Jenna from afar, and sometimes from anear; Sean Faris (Dino from "Life as We Know It") as Craig, the spoiled rich guy, and Alexa Davalos as Samantha, Craig's unfaithful girlfriend.

In the opening year of 1986 alone, there's a death, a pregnancy, an affair and other intrigue. Leigh, who in real life turned 4 years old that year, is seen in the pilot's present-day scenes portraying a 38-year-old.

The makeup and costume artists have a lot of fun here, and will continue to do in each episode as they change looks to match the era. So will the soundtrack compilers, though it's doubtful future episodes will spend as much on music rights as the pilot does.

Evoking the era is one thing "Reunion" does very well.

Involving you in the plot and characters, as well as the gimmick, isn't. At least not yet, but there are 19 more years to come.

Fox's latest series, "Reunion" follows six characters over a twenty year period. Each episode is the equivalent to one year, featuring the sounds and styles characteristic of the time.

Bob Denver, TV's Gilligan, dies at 70

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It was supposed to be just a three-hour tour and, if the critics had their way, "Gilligan's Island" would have been forgotten after its three short seasons on television.

But somewhere along the line in rerun eternity, television audiences fell in love with the goofy character of Gilligan played by Bob Denver.

It became a love affair that endured throughout the life of Denver, who died Friday at age 70 of complications related to cancer treatment at Wake Forest University Baptist Hospital in North Carolina. He had lived in recent years in Princeton, W.Va.

"One thing I can say about Bob and the show is he entertained generations, and everybody approached us and him in particular with love and a smile," said Russell Johnson, who played the egg-headed professor on "Gilligan's Island." "That's a tremendous legacy for someone from Hollywood to leave."

Gilligan may have been his signature role, but when he took the part in 1964 Denver was already widely known to TV audiences for another iconic character, Maynard G. Krebs, the bearded beatnik friend of Dwayne Hickman's Dobie in the "The Many Loves of Dobie Gillis," which aired on CBS from 1959 to 1963.

"In all the time I knew Bob, personally and professionally, we never had a harsh word," said Hickman, who added the two remained close friends over the years, even though they were as different in real life as the characters they portrayed.

California state Sen. Sheila James Kuehl, who played Dobie's lovestruck pursuer, Zelda Gilroy, remembered Denver as a mentor, both in acting and life.

"What he taught me about acting was when you work to make the other person look good, you end up looking good yourself," she said. "What he taught me about life was that you could love your work, but it was really more important to love your friends and family."

Maynard G. Krebs' only desire was to play the bongos and hang out at coffee houses, and he would shriek with terror every time the word "work" was mentioned.

Gilligan, on the other hand, was industrious but inept. His bungling stranded his tour boat's skipper and their five passengers on an uncharted desert island for all of TV eternity and, when the seven castaways actually got off the island in a film sequel, they wound up back there when Gilligan bungled the reunion cruise a year later.

His character was as lovable as he was incompetent, and viewers embraced the skinny goofball kid with the white sailor hat. So did the Minnow's skipper, Jonas Grumby, played by Alan Hale Jr., and who always referred to Gilligan affectionately as "little buddy."

"As silly as it seems to all of us, it has made a difference in a lot of children's lives," Dawn Wells, who played farm girl Mary Ann Summers, once said. "Gilligan is a buffoon that makes mistakes and I cannot tell you how many kids come up and say, 'But you loved him anyway.'"

TV critics were less kind, dismissing "Gilligan's Island" as corny at best and stupid at worst. It was canceled by the network in 1967, but found new audiences in syndicated reruns.

"It was the mid-'70s when I realized it wasn't going off the air," Denver told The Associated Press in 2001. "I certainly didn't set out to have a series rerun forever, but it's not a bad experience at all."

After "Gilligan's Island," Denver starred in other TV series, including "The Good Guys" and "Dusty's Trail." He also made numerous film and TV appearances.

But he never escaped the role of Gilligan, so much so that in one of "Late Show" host David Letterman's top 10 lists, things that would make the studio audience applaud, one of the items Letterman announced was Denver's presence. The actor's brief appearance yielded a raucous response.

Born in New Rochelle, N.Y., on Jan. 9, 1935, Denver discovered acting while studying law at Loyola University in Los Angeles. While struggling to make it as an actor, he taught private school in Pacific Palisades and worked for a time at a post office.

Minutewomen drop first four contests

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team went into the 2005 season hoping to ride the momentum of its strong finish in 2004. Instead, the team ended up repeating its rough start from last year by losing its first four games.

The Minutewomen opened up against Fairfield and lost 2-1, giving up both goals in the last final 25 seconds of the first half. UMass' goal was scored by first time starter and sophomore Racheal Mervine, just as the clock reached zero at the end of the game. Both teams started slow, as the first shot wasn't taken until the 15 minute of the first half.

UMass hosted Boston College in its second game, losing 4-2 on two separate goals. UMass' Kara Murphy and Kwylan Jaggassar provided the Minutewomen's only two goals, with both goals coming on Patricia Borneo assists.

The team did have its chances in the second half at evening the score, but failed on two different penalty corners taken by Jamie Bawden and Katelyn Woolfrey. UMass also got three good shots on goal in the last three minutes of the game but came up empty handed.

"We have to sure up our goalkeeping, but we also have to take advantage of our goal scoring opportunities," coach Patty Shea said. "We had quite a number of goal scoring opportunities in the Northeastern game and the BC game that we did not take advantage of."

The Maroon and White lost its third game to Northeastern University by a score of 4-1. Once again the team surrendered goals in bunches as the Huskies scored their first three goals in a five minute and 29 second span. UMass' only goal was scored by Borneo early in the second half.

Another bright spot was the seven saves made by sophomore and first year starting goalie Becky Letourneau. Once again, the Minutewomen had chances to score in the second half but were shut down by Northeastern's goaltender, Liz Centofanti, who had six saves in the final 15 minutes of the game.

In UMass' most recent game they lost 2-0 to Harvard in a hard fought battle. Both of the Crimson's goals came in a span of one minute and 17 seconds towards the end of the half, continuing the team's trend of giving up goals in bunches.

If anything good came out of UMass' slow start, it was the experience of playing top teams in preparation for league play. Another thing going for the team is history, as it dropped its first six games in 2004 and then ended up going on to the Atlantic 10 Championship after winning seven of its last nine games.

"There's really nothing to worry about, it's not really the outcome or anything like that," Shea said. "It's really about what's going on the field, and some of the things that I'm really happy about is they're playing the game at a more sophisticated level. It's the details that are going to make the difference."

The Minutewomen will look to bounce back when they face a tough and experienced Vermont team in Burlington this Saturday at 1 p.m.

Arroyo pitches Sox to 10th win in 13 games

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox are getting what they need from their starting pitchers: long outings and strong performances.

Bronson Arroyo became the fourth Boston pitcher in five games to pitch at least eight innings, and the Red Sox overcame a three-run deficit with the help of David Ortiz's two-run single to beat the Los Angeles Angels 6-3 Wednesday night.

"You go eight innings, you are doing something really well," manager Terry Francona said.

During Boston's last five games, Arroyo and Matt Clement each went eight innings, and David Wells and Tim Wakefield pitched complete games.

Curt Schilling was the only member of the current rotation to fall short of eight innings in his last start, but showed improvement in working 6 1-3 innings in Monday's 5-3 loss to the Chicago White Sox.

"You kind of feed off each other," said Arroyo (12-9). "You're thinking about Wakefield going nine last night. ... I'm sitting down on the bench thinking the same thing, trying to get deep in the game."

Mike Timlin got three outs for his seventh save, but a rotation battered by injuries to Schilling and Wade Miller and inconsistency earlier in the season is just where Francona wants it with 24 games left. Boston maintained its four-game lead over the New York Yankees in the AL East.

"Obviously, early in April we didn't" let pitchers go as deep into games, Francona said. "We don't want them to get into the dog days of September and have them dragging. So we really try to monitor them closely."

Ervin Santana (8-7) gave up all six of Boston's runs.

Ortiz, whose homer in the bottom of the ninth gave Boston a 3-2 win in Tuesday night's series opener, tied the game with his single in the third, one pitch after he appeared to swing his bat far enough for a third strike. It was ruled a ball and, after third base umpire Larry Young upheld the call by plate umpire Fieldin Culbreth, Angels manager Mike Scioscia yelled from the dugout and was ejected.

The hit followed walks to Alex Cora and Johnny Damon and a single by Edgar Renteria that dropped between three fielders in short center field. After Ortiz's single gave him a major-league leading 122 RBIs, Trot Nixon broke the tie with a double.

"The two walks and the ball in center field that dropped obviously were bigger contributors in that inning than the missed call on the check swing," Scioscia said.

Santana (8-7) worked four innings, dropping to 1-4 with a 9.00 ERA on the road. He's 7-3 with a 3.30 ERA at home.

"It's the same ballgame," Santana said. "I don't know what happened. I try to do my job on the road, too."

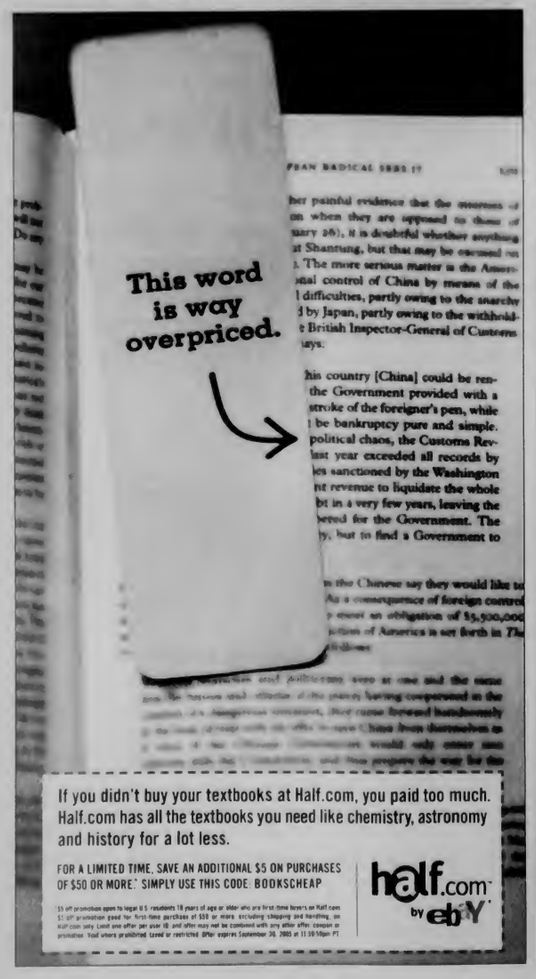
Arroyo gave up three runs and five hits in the first two innings then allowed just three singles in the next six. He even retired the first two batters in each of the first two innings before getting into trouble and finished with two strikeouts and no walks.

"He really turned it around and he became aggressive," Francona said.

The Red Sox improved to 10-3 on their season-long 14-game homestand, winning for the third time when trailing by three runs or more. They're a season-high 26 games over .500 and start a three-game series Friday night at Yankee Stadium.

The Angels, with just 26 runs in their last nine games, lost their fifth straight road game and their 11th in their last 12 at Fenway Park. Their AL West lead was cut to a half-game over Oakland, which overcame a four-run, ninth-inning deficit to beat Seattle.

"We have to step up and try to win games like that, close games," shortstop Orlando Cabrera said. "You don't have to get seven, eight runs every night."



Arroyo fell behind 2-0 in the first when Vladimir Guerrero tripled in a run and scored on Darin Erstad's single. Cabrera's RBI single made it 3-0 in the second. Then Arroyo retired 18 of the remaining 21 batters he faced without allowing any runners past second base.

The last three hits off Arroyo were singles by Casey Kotchman in the fourth and sixth, and by Jeff DaVanon in the sixth. DaVanon also doubled off Timlin.

Kevin Millar's ninth homer of the season made it 3-1 in the second, an inning in which Santana struck out the side.

Santana gave up Boston's last two runs in the fourth on a walk to Bill Mueller, a triple by Cora and a sacrifice fly by Damon.

Notes: DaVanon started in center field for Los Angeles and went 2-for-4. It was his second appearance in 15 games. ... Boston's 48-21 home record is the best in the majors.

Toulouse steps right in

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Midway through a recent morning practice on the wide-open field adjacent to the Mullins Center, one UMass women's soccer player is whipping through one-on-ones with her legs kicking about to resemble something straight out of a Levi's commercial.

Stutter step, fake left, fake right, stutter again, through the five-hole of the defender — nutmeg. All before you can finish saying her name.

And get this — that's not even what she considers her strongest aspect.

Meet Melissa Toulouse, one of head coach Jim Rudy's highly-touted recruits for 2005, a defender with a flowing mane and an unbelievable knack for the ball — especially when it comes to being airborne.

One of the biggest concerns with last year's squad was their lack of presence in the air. Despite having one of the faster teams in the Atlantic 10, they still got beat on headers in the air, and suffered in the end (a first-round exit in the A-10 playoffs).

You might get the sense of what direction this story is going in.

Rudy took to the airwaves himself with some phone calls, and ended up landing two outstanding recruits in 5-foot-9 New York native Vanessa Patry, and Toulouse, who hails all the way from Arlington, Va. Both players have exceptional skills when it comes to the air.

But Toulouse seems to have the right tools for soccer. She was named a preseason All-A-10 All-Rookie earlier this month, the only Minutewoman to get any preseason accolades.

"There are some kids who come in that are everything you've expected them to be, in terms of recruiting," Rudy said. "Then there's some that come in with a little less, on rare occasions, and some will come in with a little more. [Toulouse] is better than what we thought."

A four-year letterwinner at Bishop O'Connell High School, she captained the Knights during her senior year, and they went on to become the top-ranked high school team in the nation this past year. While she only tallied one goal, it was her defending skills that caught scouts' eyes, racking up nine assists and leading the team with just four goals against.

And let's not forget that fancy footwork.

"Her skills on the floor are better than what I thought," Rudy said. "Her air game's good, but her ground game, tackling and holding the ball under pressure, and dribbling and shooting are quite good too. She's very confident with the ball."

But in Melissa's world, a coach's approval is not enough.

"I wouldn't actually consider my footwork a strength. I've always wanted to improve upon it," she said.

What can be agreed upon, however, is her ability not only to play big in the air, but to push for starting time on a team that returns all but one of its starters.

It's been an interesting kind of push, though. Toulouse admits the amount of conditioning has been her biggest adjustment to the college level, but certainly she's never had to gather around a campfire and sing "Kumbaya" with 21 teammates as she did several weeks ago.

On Aug. 16, the Minutewomen, after an idea originally conceived by junior Stephanie Barrett, embarked on a camping retreat on a large amount of property behind senior Morgan Czaja's home in nearby Adams. They sang, they laughed, they stuck marshmallows on twigs and watched them sizzle, and they even got a bit spooked by Barrett in a prank.

It's a reflection of Rudy's distance from the norm, too — in a good way, obviously. Sure, he may have coached two of the greatest players in the history of women's soccer (Michelle Akers and Brianna Scurry), but how else are you going to snag a smart girl being recruited by American, Boston University, Cornell, and A-10 powerhouse Richmond?

"He's a little different, but he's great," Toulouse said of Rudy. "On my official visit, that's one of the things that turned me onto this school. He was so welcoming, really warm. He really wanted you to be part of the team. He's almost like a father figure when I'm out here."

Note to A-10 soccer coaches: always smile, and learn how to make smores.

While she's a bit of a ways down Interstate 95 from here, Toulouse has her roots in the area. Her father is originally from Wilbraham, and her grandmother still resides in Western Mass.

Which can mean only one thing.

"My dad's originally from around here, so I kind of got the Boston background. I'm a Red Sox fan," she said.

It doesn't sound like the adjustment will be much of a problem.

Walker shines in between pipes and we're able to move up and that messes up the other team a little bit more."

Two of the players that have stood out defensively have been Tiffany Hamill and Walker.

Hamill, a senior defender, was commended by Rudy in the preseason for her hard work and energy, and the praise has continued into the season.

"You see her playing and you can't help but get excited," Rudy said. "She really worries the other teams. They have to deal with her, and it wears players out. It's a great advantage."

Walker played almost every minute of every game last season, and the experience appears to have paid off. She played well down the stretch last season, and with two shutouts already this year, her confidence continues to rise.

"It's amazing what a lot of experience does," Rudy said. "When you play every minute you gain confidence because you're always making the decisions. And with time that's what's going to help her. The more pressure we're under, the more confidence she's going to get."

"We play for Walker, so it's awesome when we give her a shutout," Barrett said. "She's always saving us from behind, so it's nice that she can get some recognition and keep her shutouts going."

If nothing else, the two early wins are a huge improvement over last year's miserable 0-5 start.

"It's a complete 180 of how our season went last year," Walker said. "It feels great. Our team's playing awesome. You could tell from the first day of preseason, everyone's been giving 100 percent. The team has a lot of confidence right now and we're ready to go."

Patriots put spotlight on Moss

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. — The New England Patriots marvel at the talent of Randy Moss. They'll see it up close Thursday night when the receiver who grabs attention as well as passes makes his debut with the Oakland Raiders.

Yet if anyone should know that one star can't win a game by himself it's the Super Bowl champions, who built their success on the team concept.

"We played a team similar to that before in Philadelphia, and Terrell Owens is one of those players, dynamic players that can change the game," linebacker Willie McGinest said. "And I don't think one guy can control everybody else."

Owens caught nine passes for 122 yards in the Super Bowl 6 1/2 weeks after ankle surgery, but the Patriots beat the Eagles 24-21 for their third title in four years.

Thursday night's NFL opener begins the Patriots' quest to become the first team to win three consecutive championships.

In March, the Raiders obtained Moss from Minnesota, where he averaged 82 catches for 1,306 yards and 13 touchdowns in seven seasons, although he was slowed by a hamstring injury last year.

His rare combination of speed, jumping ability and excellent hands drew raves from the Patriots.

"He doesn't really have any real weakness," coach Bill Belichick said.

"He's a special player," linebacker Chad Brown said. "He can do things no other player can. I've actually had him come around on a reverse on me. My job is to contain him, and it was a little frightening."

The Patriots have managed the past two seasons to handle teams with exceptionally talented individuals. They're 34-4 in that stretch, including 6-0 in the playoffs.

"The type of character we have around here, guys don't quit," McGinest said. "Guys play hard and they look forward to challenges like that."

The Raiders were 5-11 last year and 4-12 in 2003, but made it to the Super Bowl the previous season and lost to Tampa Bay.

Moss is just part of the challenge posed by the Oakland offense. There's also quarterback Kerry Collins' strong arm and running back LaMont Jordan's chance to show he can be a productive starter after four years as Curtis Martin's backup with the New York Jets.

"LaMont's impact could be the key for us," Collins said, "could give us that balance that we lacked to make defenses play us a little more honestly."

That would make the combination of Moss and Collins, who has thrown for more than 3,000 yards the past five seasons, even more dangerous — as long as Moss' tendency to draw attention to himself and his controversial comments and actions don't get in the way.

He said last month he had used marijuana but it's in the past. He was fined $10,000 last season for pretending to pull down his pants and moon the crowd in Green Bay during a playoff win by Minnesota. And he was criticized for leaving the field with two seconds left in a regular-season loss to Washington.

Collins thinks coming to a new team can be a rebirth for Moss.

"Some of the things that have happened with Randy have been well documented," and may have been "overblown in importance," Collins said. "He's his own guy, and at times he loves the spotlight and at times he really hates it."

Oakland coach Norv Turner has seen a Moss who works hard, helps young teammates and can be a huge help to an offense that might have to score a lot because the defense allowed the second-most points in the NFL last year.

"He's been a great plus for our young receivers," Turner said. "He's helped them grow and kind of take things to another level in terms of their preparation."

Patrick wasn't born to race

By Tom Gardner
Associated Press

Danica Patrick became an amateur race car driver by accident. She became a professional contender by determination.

It all started 13 years ago when her younger sister, Brooke, thought it would be fun to race go-karts around their Illinois home.

"Brooke is the reason why we're all here," said their mother, Bev Patrick. "Brooke wanted to do it. Danica wasn't so sure. Brooke lasted about a month and a half and the rest is history as far as Danica is concerned. Who would have ever known? We never started out to raise a race car driver."

Her now famous daughter's debut was pretty infamous, Bev Patrick said.

"The first race they ever raced, both of them got lapped, and it was a six- or eight-lap race at the local track. Brooke beat Danica," she said.

"It didn't take but two races or so that they weren't getting lapped and she was getting faster. It was just a quick progression for her. Once Danica got real serious about it, we could see her dedication to it."

Two years after being lapped as a 10-year-old, Patrick was capturing regional World Karting Association titles. At 16, she moved to England to compete in Formula Vauxhall, then Formula Ford, where she finished second in the 2000 Formula Ford Festival, the best showing ever by an American.

"I made it my full-time career, forever, probably, at about 16 when I left school," she said.

Her mother said the move was tough on her parents.

"She went on her own. We went over and visited, not as much as we would have liked and probably not as much as we needed, but we had jobs and we had Brooke at home," she said.

"She thought it was fun the first year. You know, you're 16, on your own, mom and dad's credit card, racing and all that stuff. I don't think I ever hung up without crying. Every day."

Danica Patrick, 23, made auto racing history in May as the first woman to lead the Indianapolis 500. She dropped off the pace with six laps to go after running low on fuel, and finished fourth.

She goes into Sunday's race at Chicagoland Speedway as the top rookie in the field and 12th in the IRL point standings. She is 10th in earnings this season with $913,255.

She attributes her success to her parents.

"They provided racing for me. They got me to the race track, got me go-karts and supported me," she said.

Both show their emotions in the pits on race day. Bev Patrick often appears with her head bowed above clasped hands. TJ Patrick is more energetic, often cheering his daughter.

"We obviously handle our passions in different ways," Bev Patrick said. "He wears all his emotions on his sleeve and I try to keep it all in check. I am praying for her safety, of course. It's just both of our passions for the racing. His just come out a little more animated than mine do."

Minutemen open season with swagger

He did score the team's only touchdown, though, on a one-yard quarterback sneak to cut the deficit to 16-6 during the final minute of the third quarter.

Even still, he was shut down by the UMass secondary all game, as he only caught four passes for 29 yards.

The Minutemen were charged on offense by their junior running back and Walter Payton Award candidate Baylark, who gained 120 yards on 29 carries.

Senior quarterback Tim Day was able to complete 13-of-27 passes for 158 yards and two scores.

The Massachusetts defense was led by Brandon Smith, who had two interceptions inside the 10-yard line and James Ihedigbo, who racked up six tackles and two sacks.

With under two minutes remaining in the first half and UMass leading 9-0, Richmond took possession and appeared to be gaining some momentum after a 28-yard run by Tim Hightower to the UMass 28-yard line.

Minuteman senior quarterback Tim Day completed 13-of-27 passes for 158 yards and two touchdowns in the team's win over Richmond.

On the next play, though, freshman quarterback Levi Brown was intercepted by Shannon James, ending the drive and changing UMass' game plan.

On its first play of the drive, Day hit wide receiver Brandon London for a 51-yard scoring strike down the right sideline to deflate Richmond's hopes before the half.

"Prior to [the interception], we were just trying to get out of the half," UMass coach Don Brown said. "But when we get the pick and the good field position, we've got to take our shots down the field. We were going to take three of them there because there was still enough time that we could have done something. That ended up being a really big cushion if you look at the entire football game."

It was a sequence of events similar to last year's meeting between the two teams, as Tutt hit wide receiver Harry Wilson with a 40-yard Hail Mary as time expired in the opening half to give UR a 21-14 lead.

"Right before the half, that was huge, and it was close to being intercepted," Day said of his pass. "We got lucky there, and it was a big play before the half that propelled us into the second half.

"We know our defense is going to be great, and when we get up, we've got to be able to knock them out. That's what we did."

After forcing the Minutemen to turn the ball over on downs at the Richmond 21-yard line late in the third quarter, the Spiders caught UMass off guard with an end-around to wideout Matt Hale, which was good for a gain of 48 yards up the right side.

Seven plays later, Tutt entered the game as the quarterback and pushed his way up the middle for the one-yard score. The two-point attempt failed when Tracy Belton intercepted Will Healy's pass in the endzone.

UMass kicker Armando Cuko wrapped up the scoring with his second field goal of the game with 4:14 left on the clock. The score was set up by Smith's second interception of the night.

The Minutemen started the game off strong, forcing Richmond to turn the ball over on downs on its first series of the game.

They used a long, 13-play, 59-yard drive before stalling out at the Spiders' seven-yard line when Cuko drilled home his first field goal of the game to put UMass ahead 3-0.

The Maroon and White had great field position on its next series after Richmond's drive stalled out at its own 10-yard line.

After Minuteman wide receiver R.J. Cobbs returned Chris Radford's punt eight yards to the Richmond 38-yard line, Baylark advanced the ball 10 more yards on the ground.

Three plays later, Day hit London with a 15-yard pass to move the ball to the 14-yard line.

Two plays after that, Day dropped back to pass, but was forced to scramble left out of the pocket due to a Richmond blitz. He was able to get rid of the ball while still moving towards the left sideline, and the pass floated over a set of defenders and into a jumping J.J. Moore's hands to give the Minutemen a 9-0 lead.

Cuko's extra point try was blocked.

NOTES: Shannon James' interception was the 17th of his career, the most by any active Division I player in the country ... Transfer running back Matt Lawrence, who left UConn after last season, had one carry for nine yards before spraining his right ankle, causing him to sit out for the remainder of the game ... Brandon London's 51-yard touchdown reception was the longest reception of his career ... Steve Baylark rushed for over 100 yards for the 12th time in his career, including both times he has played at UR Stadium.

Pierce eyes possible match with Davenport

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Near the end of her career, Mary Pierce has regained the promise of her youth.

Pierce's resurgence continued Wednesday as she advanced to her first U.S. Open semifinals with a commanding 6-4, 6-1 win over friend and fellow Frenchwoman Amelie Mauresmo. She'll play either Lindsay Davenport or sixth-seeded Elena Dementieva on Friday.

"It's amazing," Pierce said. "I'm 30, 17th year on the tour, and there's still firsts for me. That's pretty exciting."

Davenport, seeded second but ranked No. 1, and Dementieva, a runner-up here last year, play Wednesday night, followed by an all-American quarterfinal between Andre Agassi and James Blake. Another American, Robby Ginepri, played Guillermo Coria late Wednesday afternoon.

Pierce is the oldest woman remaining at the Open, but she's playing with a joy she rarely showed during her turbulent younger years. She has reconciled with her father, Jim, who was banned by the WTA Tour for four years, and she credits her family support for her recent success. Though former coach Nick Bollettieri works on some technical aspects of her game, Pierce's brother, David, is her regular coach.

"For me, this is what a coach's dream is, to be able to rekindle the kind of promise and love of the game that a player had when she first started out," Bollettieri said after watching Pierce's victory alongside her brother. "She's very happy and healthy."

Pierce was 20 when won the first of her two Grand Slam titles at the 1995 Australian Open and rose to No. 3 in the rankings. Five years later, she won the French Open.

But slowed by a series of injuries, she dropped out of the top 200. She has a history of shoulder problems, and was recently off the tour with a groin injury.

Pierce re-emerged as a major threat at the French, where she reached her first Grand Slam final in five years. She was routed 6-1, 6-1 by Justine Henin-Hardenne, the worst drubbing in a French final since 1998, prompting her to apologize to the fans afterward.

The loss only fueled her desire, though. She reached the quarterfinals at Wimbledon before losing to eventual champion Venus Williams, and her victory in San Diego was her second title since 2000.

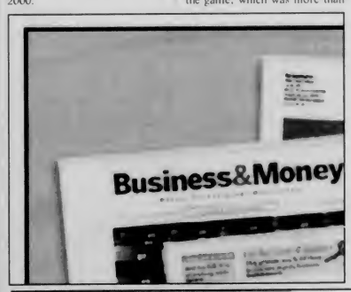
The next day the Maroon and White matched up against Michigan (2-1-0), which had posted two consecutive shutouts against Detroit and Denver.

The Minutemen managed a 3-1 victory over the Wolverines in the final game of the Fall Classic, despite being outshot 26-8 in the game.

Bullen, junior Michael Donnelly (his second career goal) and freshman Tony Bassett (his first career goal) scored in the game, which was more than the Wolverines could handle — they only managed one goal in the game, coming with 55 seconds left in the first half.

"This was a great win for us," Koch said after his team's triumph over an undefeated Michigan. "It's tough to play back-to-back against two great teams like Michigan State and Michigan. The credit truly goes to the players for their hard work this weekend."



In preparation for their first match on Sept. 3, the Minutemen had two exhibition matches to tune up for their trip to East Lansing.

The first was McGill, which came on August 24, and was an early success, as a 6-2 triumph left Koch praising his team's effort.

"I was pleased with how the second team regained their composure in the second half after allowing two goals," Koch said after the 6-2 victory. "I was very pleased overall with how the first team played also. We limited McGill's time and space which was a good part of our game."

The coach did see some early rust, however.

The match against the Revolution's reserve squad on Aug. 29 went as most expected, with the Minutemen coming up on the short end of a 7-0 decision.

Defense has stepped up play early on for Minutewomen

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

For Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy, one of the most highly anticipated aspects of this season was seeing how the new defensive system he installed in the offseason would pan out.

Rudy was so excited about the new zone system of play that during a preseason interview, he gave an impromptu X's and O's lesson diagramming how the defense would work.

Perhaps it was Rudy's enthusiasm, or maybe just a solid X's and O's understanding of the defense, but either way, it's clear that his team bought into the new system. And the results in the first three games have shown just how strong this defense can be.

In the first three games of the season, UMass (2-1) has allowed only two goals while recording two shutouts.

The defensive play has been especially sharp at home, as the Minutewomen have recorded a pair of 3-0 wins at Rudd Field, first against Hartford in the season opener, and again in the third game of the season against Marist.

The only setback for UMass was a 2-1 loss against a tough Boston University squad on the road.

"Our big test defensively was at BU, and for a period of time we did well against them," Rudy said. "The Marist game probably wasn't a fair test of what we'll see in the A-10, but my thing is to get through and get a W. And I really like the zeroes on the scoreboard."

Rudy was able to employ this new defensive strategy because of the large number of returnees from last year's team. The entire midfield and defense are back from last year, as is goalie Kristin Walker.

With all of the returnees, the team was able to learn the defense in the spring, and now it's just a matter of executing it.

"We've adjusted pretty well," defender Stephanie Barrett said. "We started it last spring, and our defense hasn't really changed much. It helps us put pressure on,

UMass sophomore defender Kaelyn Caldwell plays the ball against Marist last Friday at Rudd Field. The Minutewomen won 3-0.

Midfield

The midfield should be a position of strength, as the team returns the same core from last year. The center midfield, led by Bellini and sophomore Jenny Roehrig, looks like an especially strong unit.

"We have three players who have seen a lot of time in the middle," Rudy said. "Bellini is the playmaker, Jenny is the glue that holds it together and Tina Nunes is big in the air and can win balls for us. They've done very well in there."

While Bellini primarily controlled the action around the middle of the field, Roehrig displayed an offensive flair last year. She was second on the team is scoring with 13 points on five goals and three assists, and her three game-winning goals tied her with Canfield for the most on the team.

Working out in the flanks will be senior Tiffany Hamill, sophomore Caitlin Footit and junior Nadia Villarroel. All three of these players are coming off outstanding offseasons.

Villarroel's club team, the Stars of Massachusetts, won the U-19 national championship, while Rudy has been impressed with both Footit and Hamill's work in the offseason.

"Caitlin Footit increased her stock immensely," Rudy said. "And Tiffany Hamill just turned it loose. She made an incredible jump for us, not only on the field but off the field as well. She's been an absolute terror on the flanks. She's like the Energizer Bunny times three. She's looked really good."

Defense

The defense should be another strong spot for the Minutewomen, as they return everyone from last year's unit and have added highly-touted recruit Melissa Toulouse.

The anchor of the defense is Maffucci, and she is joined on the backline by a talented group including senior Morgan Czaja, junior Stephanie Barrett, sophomores Tina Rodriguez and Kaelyn Caldwell, and Toulouse.

Barrett and Rodriguez each played almost every minute of every game last year, and will be expected to do the same again.

Toulouse, who was named to the preseason A-10 All-Rookie Team, comes to Amherst following an impressive high school career at Bishop Dennis J. OiConnell High School in Arlington, Va. where she was named a Third Team All-American as a senior.

This group will have the challenge of adjusting to the new zone defense, something that Rudy does not think will be a problem.

"It's a different system of play, but they've bought into it," Rudy said.

Goalkeepers

Back in goal for UMass is junior Kristin Walker, who started all 18 games last season and recorded four shutouts. Also in the mix in goal is senior Kristen Rutland, who missed last season due to illness.

Rudy will look for his goalkeepers to be more aggressive as the backline in the zone defense, and he feels both goalies are capable of coming out of the net and playing the ball.

Youngsters pick it up

Team.

The rest of the offense is a bit of an unknown for Rudy, as the only other consistent offensive threat last year, Lindsey Fairweather, was lost to graduation.

Also contributing to the uncertainty of the offensive lineup is the loss of three players for various reasons. Senior Adair Blyler is out for a month with mononucleosis, sophomore Vanessa Lima missed time in the preseason with what Rudy hoped was strep throat and not mono, and Merina Andersen, a junior transfer from Lasell, is not yet eligible.

Due to this shakeup, Rudy will look to two inexperienced players to help Canfield on the frontline. Sophomore Elizabeth Weinsten, who didn't see much action last season, and freshman Vanessa Patry will be expected to step into the lineup in the early goings.

Patry is one of only two freshmen Rudy recruited, and he feels she is capable of making an immediate impact.

Morse busted for steroid use

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — Seattle Mariners rookie Mike Morse was suspended 10 days Wednesday for violating baseball's steroids policy, and said he was still being punished for an "enormous mistake" he made in 2003.

Morse became the ninth major league player penalized under the sport's tougher drug rules. He hit a go-ahead single in the seventh inning for a 3-2 win over Oakland on Tuesday, and on Wednesday the grievance by the players' association to overturn the suspension was denied by arbitrator Shyam Das.

"This result is unfair and unfortunate. It punishes Michael Morse again for conduct for which he has already been punished," said Michael Weiner, the union's general counsel. "The PA does not believe the parties ever intended for the Basic Agreement to compel such a harsh result."

Morse, 23, was batting .287 with three home runs and 23 RBIs in 209 at-bats since being called up from Triple-A earlier this season. The infielder-outfielder was acquired last season in the trade that sent pitcher Freddy Garcia to the Chicago White Sox.

"We think you cannot evaluate a program based on the results of a single case, that overall, the rules that we negotiated are designed to be strict but fair with the overall goal being to deter use," said Rob Manfred, executive vice president of labor relations in the commissioner's office. "To the extent that anyone disagrees with the result in a particular case, it might be the result of our desire to deter use."

In a statement before Wednesday's game against the Athletics, Morse apologized to "the fans, my teammates, the Mariners organization, baseball and to my family," and he offered an explanation.

"Back in November 2003 when I was 21 years old, I made an enormous mistake in my life; I took steroids while in the minor leagues," he said. "My thigh muscle, which I had previously torn, had never healed and I was scared that my career was over. I was desperate and made a terrible mistake which I deeply regret."

"In May 2004, I was punished and suspended, which I deserved, for my mistake. I embarrassed myself, my family and my team. I am responsible for the mistake of taking steroids and the positive result was not due to some over-the-counter supplement, protein shake or tainted test."

Morse said the steroids, however, remained in his body and that he was again suspended in July 2004 while in the minors. He said those remnants resulted in another positive test this year, and he appealed those results.

"I am troubled that I will be suspended for the third time despite the fact that the scientific evidence supports that I kept my promise that I would never use steroids again," he said. "Even the (arbitration) panel states in its written decision that the panel recognizes that this result may be viewed as unfair to Michael Morse."

"I find it unfair that I am being punished three different times for making the mistake of taking steroids in the 2003 offseason. At least there is some solace in the fact that the scientific evidence supports that I kept my promise that I would never use steroids again," his statement said.

Balanced scoring attack helps bring some magic back to Rudd

game that saw UMass mostly on its heels.

"We couldn't get the ball out of our own end," Rudy said. "But for the first 40 minutes we played beautifully."

But as soon as the second half began, the Terriers marched furiously. Within the first 75 seconds of the first half, junior forward Lauren Erwin slid on a cross from freshman Ashley LoCasale and nicked it by goalie Kristin Walker for her first goal of the season.

Nine minutes later she was on the passing end, setting up Melissa Shulman for her 26 goal of her career, good for fourth-best on BU's all-time list.

Junior Nadia Villaroel prevented the shutout with a goal in the 88 minute, a blast from five yards out to cut the lead to one, but they would not get another scoring opportunity in the game.

The Minutewomen rebounded nicely last Friday, however, with another shutout, this time over the Marist Foxes.

Senior Lindsey Bellini scored on a penalty kick in the first half, and the defense held tight while the offense continued to surge in the 3-0 downing of Marist on September 2.

Britt Canfield had a terrific scoring opportunity in the seventeenth minute with a breakaway, but she was taken down from behind by a Marist defender inside the eighteen-yard box setting up a penalty kick. Bellini shot it to the goalie's right for the go-ahead.

Villaroel then scored her second goal in as many games in the 61 minute, taking a header from Patry and kicking it off the goalie's hands for a 2-0 game. Villaroel now leads the Minutewomen in goals with two.

Canfield then scored her first of what should be many goals in the 2005 season after taking a feed from Patry. Coming in from the right, she faked out her defender, crossing her up with a fake to the right. The shot curled into the upper right corner of the goal to round out the scoring.

Fast start for UMass

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

RICHMOND, Va. — Starting a season stacked with lofty expectations, the No. 15 Massachusetts football team completed its first order of business last Thursday by disposing of Atlantic 10 foe Richmond 19-6 in front of a crowd of 6,040 at University of Richmond Stadium.

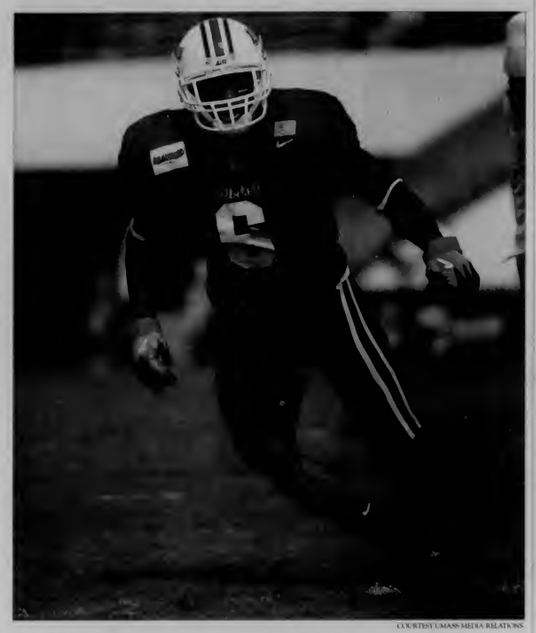
The Minutemen (1-0 1-0 Atlantic 10) wrap up their brief two-game road trip on Saturday at noon in Hamilton, N.Y. against Colgate, which dropped its season opener to Central Connecticut on Saturday.



Picking up right where they left off last year when they won four of their final five games, the Minutemen once again used timely defense and a solid performance by running back Steve Baylark to dispose of their opponent.

Heading into the game, most of the questions around the UMass camp revolved around Stacy Tutt, Richmond's biggest threat, who splits time between quarterback and wide receiver.

In last season's meeting, Tutt paced the Spiders' offense while playing the entire game under center. He passed for 132 yards and two touchdowns but also ran for 117 yards and one score in Richmond's 24-14 win in Amherst.

Last week, however, Tutt only played four snaps as the quarterback and was highly ineffective for the Spiders (0-1 0-1 A-10), throwing no passes and rushing three times for four yards.

As the final seconds ticked off the clock on the Rudd Field scoreboard after a hard-fought 2-1 loss to Richmond in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the Massachusetts women's soccer team set its eyes on the 2005 season.

Following the game, coach Jim Rudy and numerous players expressed excitement over what would be in store for the team in the future.

Nine months later, and the wait is finally over.

Rudy's recruiting trips, which netted two top prospects, are over. The various club team seasons and tournaments, in which UMass players were very successful, are over. And now that a difficult training camp is complete, all that is left for the Minutewomen to do is to take the field and prove that all of the anticipation was worth the wait.

With 17 players returning from last year's 7-11 squad, Rudy was able to incorporate a new zone defense during the spring, which he hopes will bolster a defense that was very stingy down the stretch last season.

"In the spring, we put in a new zone system of play," Rudy said. "We were able to put it in because we had so many people coming back. It was a big gamble to go from one method of defense to another one that really relies on experience, but we feel pretty good about it."

This new system will certainly be put to the test by some tough competition, as UMass will face seven teams that are ranked regionally, including two of its first three opponents.

The biggest change this year for the Minutewomen will be transitioning from a young team last year with low expectations to a more experienced team this year expected to be in every game.

While last year's team was highlighted by a group of eight freshmen, known as the "Kiddie Korps," this year's version features 10 upperclassmen, as well as the eight sophomores who all saw a lot of action as freshmen. Rudy will look to senior co-captains Amy Maffucci and Lindsey Bellini to lead his squad

"We're not the Kiddie Korps anymore, but we're still a young team," Rudy said. "We have eight sophomores who are doing very well, and we have two very good freshmen. That's half our roster that is young. But that's who we are, and I think it bodes well for the future."

Here's how the Minutewomen break down by position:

OFFENSE

The offense will once again be led by Britt Canfield, who had a huge freshman year, leading the team in scoring with 22 points and 11 goals. Canfield employs blazing speed to get by defenders, and she was aptly named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team and to the A-10 Second

Strong start at Rudd

By BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The 2005 version of Massachusetts women's soccer doesn't just want to have fun. They want to work hard, and more importantly, win.

Done and done.

After waiting a little less than a month one year ago to notch their first win, the Minutewomen are sitting pretty above .500, at 2-1, after over a week and a half of competitive regular season soccer.

Rudd Field has been favorable in the early-on in 2005, as the Minutewomen are currently perfect at home (2-0 at Rudd). In both of their wins at home so far, Coach Jim Rudy's new defensive scheme has allowed no goals and just seven shots on goal, while they have taken 19 and scored six.

Overall, they've outshot their opponents 35-31, scored seven goals and seven assists for 21 points, and converted over half of their shots on goal (57%). To put things into perspective, last season it took the team until the end of September to reach seven goals, and by then they were behind the ball at 2-5.

"We've tried to beat our goal of doing better with our non-conference opponents, doing better with our conference opponents, and see where that takes us," Rudy said. "That part's good, and I like the zeros."

Credit a more aggressive approach on all areas of the game, both offense and defense, to this fast start. The Minutewomen are hungry, and the fruits of their labor are paying off early with two solid wins and a hard-fought battle against one of the more balanced teams in New England.

"The Cyndi Lauper generation is over," Rudy said following their first win of the year, a 3-0 downing of Hartford.

Rightfully so.

The 2005 debut for UMass was a memorable one for freshman Vanessa Patry, a highly-recruited 5-foot-9 forward out of Delmar, N.Y. who has been on U.S. Olympic Development.

Key on the word 'development' here, because she wasted absolutely no time adjusting to the college level. In the sixth minute of the opening game against Hartford on Aug. 26, Patry took a feed from speedy forward Britt Canfield down the right side, and booted one into the net for her first collegiate goal.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass sophomore forward Britt Canfield has scored one goal this season. She led the team in scoring as a freshman last year.

The Minutewomen went on to cruise over the Hawks 3-0 to achieve their fifth season-opener win in seven years, and their first season-opener shutout since beating Texas-El Paso, 2-0, back in 2000.

"Everyone's always saying to me that all of the defenses are going to be a lot better at the college level, so this is pretty exciting for me," Patry said.

Sophomore Jenny Roehrig made it a 2-0 affair with three minutes to go in the first half, taking a touch pass up from junior Stephanie Barrett and hitting it to the left side of the net for her first goal of the season.

UMass's attack slowed down to a more defensive tempo in the second half, led by a great tackle from Tiffany Hamill, and in the 59th minute Barrett was again present on a UMass goal. This time she took a feed from freshman Melissa Toulouse and made a looping pass over the middle, which was then chipped in over Christina Nunes for a 3-0 contest.

While the Minutewomen weren't so fortunate two days later in Boston, the improvement was still evident, as they put up a solid first half before faltering to the Boston University Terriers.

In 2004, four Minutewomen went down with injuries against the Terriers, and while they only had three players on the bench in this affair on August 28, nothing season-ending occurred this time around in the 2-1 loss.

The Terriers' stingy defense limited the Minutewomen to just four shots in the entire game, only one on goal, to BU's 17, and forced a

Cannella announces hiring

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is coming off one of the program's most successful season's ever, and it appears that the team may have just gotten a bit stronger.

The team announced yesterday that Jake Coon has been hired as an assistant coach to fill the void left by former assistant Chris Gabrielli, who left the team to become the top assistant coach at Butler University earlier in the summer.

Coon spent the last five years at Nazareth College in the same coaching position, and he has also played goalie for the Rochester Rattlers of Major League Lacrosse since graduating from Nazareth in 2000.

"Jake is a great young coach who has been involved in the game for his whole life," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He is a fantastic player, and he is one of those guys who can make the great player, great coach combination, which is tough for a lot of great players to do."

Coon will primarily focus on working with the goalies, but he will also help assistant coach Jason Miller with the defensive midfielders and man-down situations.

The 2006 lacrosse season will be a unique one in the cage for the Minutemen, as four-year starter Bill Schell graduated in the spring.

Coon brings a championship pedigree to the Minutemen, and he was also Nazareth's first ever four-time All-American.

As a freshman in 1997, he was the starting goalie for the team that won the Division III national championship. In 1998 and 2000, Coon was given the Ensign C. Markland Kelly Jr. Award as the Outstanding Goalie in Division III.

During his five-year tenure as the assistant coach there, the Golden Flyers made it to the NCAA Tournament four times.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Jake Coon was announced as the new assistant coach for the UMass men's lacrosse team yesterday.

In 2004, Nazareth goalie Alex Civalier was named the Most Valuable Player in the championship game even after his team's losing effort.

"I'm a big fan of not only what he was as a player, but [who he is] as a person and as a coach," Cannella said. "That unselfish attitude that he is going to bring in here is going to mesh with my philosophy and also Jason Miller's."

Coon holds the Nazareth College record for most career saves with 769, and his average of 7.32 goals allowed per game in 2000 is also a school record. He holds the NCAA Division III Tournament record for most saves in a single game with 32.

"He is a self-made guy," Cannella said. "He has worked hard to get to where he's at right now. He is a blue collar type of guy, and that is a great fit because we are a blue collar team.

"To get to where we want to be, we have to work very hard, and I think Jake fits right into that. I think it will be seamless. I think once he gets here, he'll be comfortable, and the guys will be comfortable with him."

Minutemen split first two games

After two exhibition games, one a 6-2 victory over McGill and another a 7-0 trouncing at the hands of the New England Revolution's reserve squad the Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-1-0) split its first two regular season games in the Michigan State/Radisson Fall Classic in East Lansing, Michigan.

On Sept. 4, the Minutemen dropped their first match against Michigan State 2-1 on a game-winning goal in the 75 minute, facilitated by a UMass foul by the 18-yard box.

Trailing the Spartans 1-0 in the first half, senior captain Oral Bullen scored on a penalty kick after a handball was committed inside the goal box. The goal was Bullen's 19th of his career, his first of the season, and put him within 14 points of the UMass top ten scoring list.

The Minutemen were outshot 15-5 in the first half, but held the Spartans to just five shots in the second. Redshirt freshman Zach Simmons made seven saves in his

Local hotel holds BBQ for displaced students

By MELISSA BLANKSTEEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HADLEY — Many sophomore transfer students hung out at the pool and enjoyed a barbeque provided by the Howard Johnson hotel yesterday.

These students are those left without housing at the start of this academic year. With the University of Massachusetts accepting its largest freshman class, housing has been tight.

According to Pam Griffith, manager of Howard Johnson, over 100 students living in local hotels came to the barbeque.

"We wanted to give them a decent, fun, relaxing meal," Griffith said. "We feel bad for the students. They are in transition now. We want to make it easy for them."

The students have been in the hotel since Sunday. According to the students staying there, the University plans to have them placed in campus housing within four weeks.

"Things are going smoothly," Griffith said. "We're really glad to have the students here."

Curt Shumway, the chief executive officer of Hampshire Hospitality Group, which runs Howard Johnson in Hadley, came up with an idea of letting the students eat for free while living at the hotel.

"It's a very good idea," Karah Kidger of Salem said.

"The workers here are really nice," Emily Auger of Great Berrington said.

The students have been enjoying many of the perks of being in the hotel, such as pool, room service, air conditioning and private bathrooms. But, there have been cons as well.

They report having problems getting on the Internet and getting through to people at UMass Housing Services. They also have a 10 p.m. quiet time that "is strictly enforced" according to Griffith.

"The bus service is kind of sketchy," Seth Mansur of Greenfield said.

The students often cross the busy Route 9 to get to the bus. Because the students have not bought parking permits yet, the hotel has posted the bus schedule in the lobby.

But the last bus from campus is at 12:30 a.m. and they feel like they're missing out on a big part of the UMass atmosphere.

However, the students believe that the wait to get on campus is worth it.

"My car is all packed and ready to go," Mansur said.

Some of the students' dorm supplies are waiting in their car in the parking lot, but some have parents waiting for the call to come back to help officially move in.

"[UMass Students] are so nice," Auger said. "People are around all the time."

"The campus is really beautiful," Kidger said. "Every time I'm on the bus I look at how pretty it is."

Although ready to leave and still hoping to make their way to Southwest, the students are still enjoying some of the perks of Howard Johnson.

"It's really funny to be treated like a gentlemen," Mansur said.

UMass '#9 party school' in the nation

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you like to party, smoke pot and don't like to study, the Princeton Review suggests the University of Massachusetts Amherst might be the school for you.

But not everybody's happy about the Review's findings. UMass News Director Ed Blaguszewski calls the findings "foolishness."

The Princeton Review's Web site, which helps potential college students get into the schools best suited for them, released its annual "Best 361 College Rankings" list on Aug. 24.

UMass Amherst tops the list for certain categories such as the largest "party school," the most "unsightly" campus and "students who (almost) never study."

Here is a list of how the Princenton Review rated UMass:

- #3 Long Lines and Red Tape
- #3 Students Dissatisfied with Financial Aid
- #9 Students Who (Almost) Never Study
- #9 Party Schools
- #13 Reefer Madness
- #20 Campus Is Tiny, Unsightly or Both

Blaguszewski says UMass officials were quick to dismiss the rankings when they were released Aug. 23.

"It really is junk science and there's no basis scientifically to come to that conclusion, based on how they conduct that survey."

Officials at the Princeton Review, which is not affiliated with Princeton University, say they surveyed 300 students from each college and university featured.

Blaguszewski says there are 24,000 undergraduates at UMass, which means only one percent of the

UMass receives grant to curb substance abuse

By KATIE HUSTON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts was awarded a $1.5 million grant from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services in July to enhance services to students engaging in underage and/or dangerous drinking practices.

UMass is one of 12 colleges and universities nationwide to receive the grant. "It was a highly competitive process," said Dr. Sally Linowski, associate director of University Health Services and director of the Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention, who estimated that over 100 institutions applied.

Linowski and Dr. Gloria DiFulvio, a faculty member in the School of Public Health, submitted the grant in November of last year.

The money will be used to implement a program called BASICS, Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students, through the Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention at UMass, which was established last October.

The program has been used with college students for 14 years and has proven highly successful. "We wanted to use strategies that work and that have been shown to reduce consequences of drinking for individuals," Linowski said.

In contrast to the current program, where first offenders attend a two – and-a-half-hour-class with 20 to 25 students, BASICS offers students a personalized,

Construction set to begin on power plant

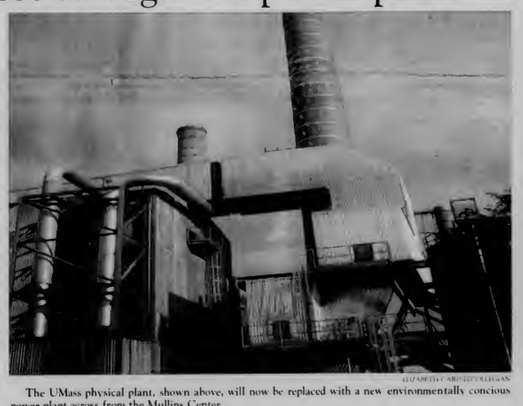
By MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a short stint of debate from the community, ground is finally ready to be broken in the construction of the new $106.5 million power plant at the University of Massachusetts.

The new 98,000 square foot Central Heating Plant will be located at the west side of the Mullins Center, which is technically in the town of Hadley. This site was selected because it was the most efficient place to connect the old steam lines that run under campus, officials say.

Eventually, the plant will be able to produce enough steam to heat and cool all the buildings around campus.

Construction is set to begin in November and continue up until April of 2008.



UMass officials met with selectmen and members of the community on Aug. 31 to ease concerns of any number of problems that the construction may cause. The closest neighbors to the facility are farmers who live on Stockbridge Street in Hadley. Two years ago, neighbors told the University they were concerned about lights, noise pollution and the plant's esthetics.

"We've actually been meeting with them for a few years now," said Jim Hunt, communications manager of Campus Facilities and Planning. "We think that we've been successful in satisfying all of their concerns. We've been able to produce low light levels, low sound levels and probably most importantly, low emission levels."

Greenhouse gas emissions will be reduced by 85 percent because coal will no longer be burned. As for the noise issue, the south facade, which faces the University's primary playing fields, is encased in glass to block out the sound while also exposing the inside of the building. The plant will meet more stringent criteria than the state requires and will give off a sound level of three decibels. Special streetlights will be strategically located to decrease glare.

The plant will burn natural gas and oil, replacing the existing plant located on Hicks Way, which burns coal, some fuel and natural gas.

"Not only will it provide five times as much electricity as the current steam, which was built in the 1950's, but the new plant will also cut

Campus Diversity plan brings new officials

By MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts has hired a new associate provost as a part of its implementation of the Campus Diversity Plan.

Charlena Seymour, the provost and senior vice chancellor, hired Andrew Effrat as the new associate provost for Faculty Recruitment and Retention, a position which will include the responsibility to attract a more diverse faculty to UMass.

"It's going to be a major rebuilding of the faculty," said Effrat in a recent press release. "I am honored and delighted to be a part of this exciting opportunity to work with Provost Charlena Seymour and many other colleagues as the University embarks on a major effort in rebuilding and diversifying the faculty and the University as a whole. This effort will enhance our capacity to fulfill our mission as a nationally competitive public research and teaching University."

Seymour says that Effrat was selected for the position because he "brings a wealth of knowledge, experience and sound judgment to this very important facet of our campus community."

Seymour went on to add that she was "pleased he will be serving as a key part of our leadership team."

In the past, Effrat was the interim dean of the School of Education and has extensively studied the subject of education policy issues, on which he is now considered an expert. He has a master's degree in sociology from Harvard University. When Effrat worked with the School of Education, he helped start major policy research to explore aspects of education reform in Massachusetts and started some leadership preparation initiatives.

This new administrative position is just one of the changes that will be taking place to fulfill Lombardi's diversity plan, "A Blueprint for Change." The first thing that Lombardi did before the end of the last academic year was name Associate Chancellor Esther M. Terry as overseer of diversity issues on campus.

Effrat and Terry will be working together over the next five years to hire an additional 250 faculty members that Lombardi's diversity plan recommends. Effrat and Terry have the responsibility to make the campus an attractive and welcoming place to work for minorities.

The diversity plan also calls for recruiting and keeping minority students, as well as faculty members, providing more academic support for first year students, providing a more diverse curriculum and reorganizing the Office of Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Lombardi's diversity plan was met with mixed feelings from students when it was introduced last year. Following a report from the Commission for Campus Diversity, Lombardi wrote several drafts of a diversity plan, all of which can be found at: www.umass.edu/campus diversity.

The part of the plan that caused the most uproar was the recommendation for the creation of the Center for Student Development (CSD), under which such organizations such as the Office of ALANA affairs and the Office of Jewish Affairs will now fall.

Pavel Payano, Student Government Association President and a member of ALANA, told the Springfield Republican last year, "It's the student affairs part that's really scaring the students. They see the administration taking ownership of something they created."

Although Lombardi addressed some of the student concerns in his second and third drafts of the plan, he still felt it important to implement the CSD for this year.

$51.8 billion approved for Katrina aid

Refugees find shelter on Cape Cod

By Matt Pitta
Associated Press

BOURNE — A plane carrying more than 100 refugees displaced by Hurricane Katrina arrived at Otis Air National Guard Base on Cape Cod Thursday, and state officials were preparing for the arrival of at least one more planeload.

Gov. Mitt Romney said the group included the hurricane's most "severely distressed" victims, some of whom were plucked from rooftops in flood-ravaged New Orleans only hours earlier.

"They're being, in some cases, literally plucked from the water and from the roofs and are being put on this aircraft," Romney said. "Some may need medical attention as soon as they arrive."

Dozens of volunteers applauded as the refugees were led off the plane and into a nearby hangar, where counselors and clergy members were on hand to receive them. Two older people were led off the plane in wheelchairs, and several small children and babies were carried off by adults. Some of the refugees led dogs on leashes.

The plane carrying 111 people left New Orleans before noon and arrived at Otis just after 2 p.m. The plane was expected to return immediately to Louisiana to pick up a second group and return to the Cape after midnight, Romney said.

"This is a group of people who in many cases are literally coming from flooded areas," he said. "They're wet; they have no clothing but the clothing that they're wearing."

From Otis, the refugees were to be transported to Camp Edwards, located on another section of the sprawling Massachusetts Military Reservation, where state and military officials set up temporary housing in brick barracks capable of housing up to 2,500 people.

The refugees will be registered into a computer database and undergo a screening process, including a medical and mental health evaluation. They will then be given a photo ID and given their housing assignment.

debit cards for families to use on immediate needs.

The overwhelming, bipartisan support for the measure masked murmurs of concern about a rapidly rising price tag, as well as a growing atmosphere of political jockeying in Congress less than two weeks after the hurricane battered the Gulf Coast.

Democrats criticized Bush and the GOP leadership in Congress at the same time, and Republicans in turn accused the Democrats of seeking partisan gain from human tragedy.

Congressional Democratic leaders said they would refuse to appoint members to a committee that Republican leaders intend to create to investigate the administration's readiness and response to the storm.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called the GOP plan "a sham that is just the latest example of congressional Republicans being the foxes guarding the President's hen house." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said it was like a baseball pitcher calling "his own balls and strikes." Both urged appointment of an independent panel like the Sept. 11 Commission.

Republicans said they intended to go ahead despite the threatened boycott. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee told reporters there had been a "system wide failure" in the response to the storm. Citing problems at the local, state and federal levels, he said, "We will get to the bottom of that" in a congressional investigation.

Beyond that, said New York Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the House GOP campaign committee, "it is reprehensible that some elected officials are looking to score political points in the wake of Hurricane Katrina's devastation."

Even before Bush spoke and Congress acted, the government provided fresh evidence of the impact of the storm.

The Labor Department reported that roughly 10,000 workers filed for unemployment benefits last week after losing their jobs as a result of the storm, and said the level would rise sharply. In a painful irony, analysts said Thursday's number would have been higher yet except that the storm forced claims offices to close and prevented more of the newly jobless from filling out their paperwork.

Bush, his poll numbers sagging and his administration buffeted by criticism of its response to the storm, dispatched Vice President Dick Cheney to the region and met with GOP congressional leaders at the White House. At mid-afternoon, flanked by members of his Cabinet, he stepped to the microphones to pledge additional help, ask for patience and announce a national day of prayer for Friday of next week.

Referring to the debit cards in the legislation making its way quickly through Congress, he said, "The first step is providing every household with $2,000 in emergency disaster relief that can be used for immediate needs, such as food or clothing or personal essentials."

Five College news in brief

UM Admissions director named

The University of Massachusetts may be one step closer to attaining a permanent director of admissions.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, announced in June the appointment of Kevin Kelly to serve as interim director of admissions and consultant. Kelly began his duties July 1.

Kelly served in a variety of admissions offices around New England, which included Northeastern University, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Dean College and Boston University.

UM to get $4 million in funds

Pending approval from the U.S. Senate, University of Massachusetts researchers will receive $4 million to fund research regarding antennas and environmental micro-biological energy harvesting.

If approved, $2 million would go to the UMass Center for Advanced Sensor and Communication Antennas. Researchers there have been working with the Air Force at Hanscom Air Force Base on the project. The center received $6 million from the federal defense bill over the last two years.

The other $2 million will go to environmental micro-biological energy harvesting research. Microbiology researchers, including microbiology professor Derek Lovley, recently discovered and developed microorganisms that can efficiently convert waste from organisms into electricity.

Hampshire President named

A new president was named on Aug. 12 for Hampshire College, the small non-traditional college of 1,300 students who participate in individualized fields of study overseen by a faculty sponsor.

Ralph J. Hexter is the college's fifth president. He comes to Hampshire from the University of California — Berkley.

"It's so very exciting that Hampshire is really a very bold experiment, but a very successful one," Hexter told the Hampshire Gazette.

A grizzly recovery: thousands of bodies littering New Orleans

By Erin McClam
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — With the waters receding, New Orleans faces a ghastly task of epic dimensions not seen by an American city in perhaps a century: collecting, identifying and then burying potentially thousands of corpses, many of them bloated, decayed or no doubt mangled beyond recognition.

Already, officials said they have 25,000 body bags on hand in Louisiana, and a temporary warehouse morgue is being readied to handle 5,000 dead.

The challenge, though, is more than a question of space and equipment. Among other things: How do you establish the victims' names, especially when many of them were so poor they probably did not even have dental records? And how do you return the dead to their relatives when no one knows where the family members are?

In the confusing tangle of federal, state and local workers here, a preliminary plan has emerged to deal with the bodies.

"The mayor is very strong on the fact that you handle the remains with dignity and respect, especially considering the celebration of life that we have in New Orleans," said Sally Forman, a spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin.

At two collection sites — one at the corner of Interstates 10 and 610 and one in neighboring St. Bernard Parish — federal mortuary teams collect any information that may help identify a body, including the coordinates of where each corpse was found. They have also collected whatever personal effects were on the bodies, in hopes that something — say, a hairbrush — might be used later to identify the victims.

At the temporary morgue set up in nearby St. Gabriel, the bodies are photographed, and forensic workers hope to use dental X-rays, fingerprints and DNA to identify them.

The bodies that can be identified will be turned over to a funeral home of the family's home choice for burial. As for the bodies that cannot be identified, "the sites for burial have not been chosen," said Melissa Walker, a spokeswoman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals.

Identifying the dead will be complicated by the intense New Orleans heat some corpses have been exposed to. Also, being submerged in water can damage fingerprints quickly, said Amy Mundroff, a forensic anthropologist who worked on identifying victims after the Sept. 11 attacks (more than 2,700 dead at the World Trade Center alone) and the crash of TWA Flight 800 off Long Island in 1996.

Dental X-rays could prove helpful, but those rely on a match with a person's dental records. And such records could be difficult to track down — if they are available at all — for many of the destitute residents here. It is also possible that Katrina destroyed some dentists' records along with their offices.

DNA in bones is long-lasting. But few victims are likely to be found with personal effects — hairbrushes, toothbrushes and the like — that could yield DNA samples for comparison, Mundroff said.

Evacuees receiving benefits with little questions asked thousands of storm victims now dispersed to numerous states, he said the government was working to "ensure that those of you who receive federal benefits administered by the states of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana will continue to get those benefits in the states where you're now staying."

He said the government would formally grant those victims evacuee status, meaning they would be able to register for their benefits without producing all of the normal documentation — much of which may have been lost in a desperate retreat from storm-threatened homes. He urged storm victims to contact the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and asked them to be patient if they encountered delays.

Bush said the evacuee status would apply to "the full range of federal benefits administered by the states," including Medicaid, welfare, food stamps, housing, school lunch and more.

"In all the steps we take, our goal is not to simply provide benefits but to make them easy and simple as possible to collect," he said.

Later, looking ahead to the massive reconstruction effort, Bush quietly waived sections of a federal law that requires payment of prevailing wages on government contracts. Prevailing wages are based on surveys that take into account union and non-union pay. One business organization welcomed the move, while the AFL-CIO criticized it.

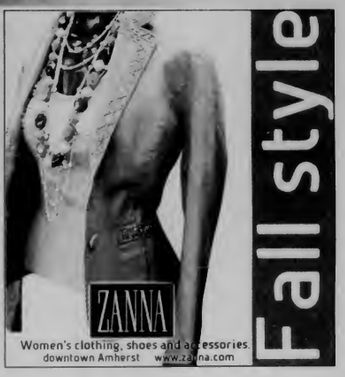
Conservatives, in particular, said they hoped the government's billions would be spent wisely.

"We have all the hallmarks here of a rush to spend money," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., whose home state was damaged by the storm. "We have got to be careful that this does not become a feeding frenzy — this is our grandchildren's money."

Democrats, too, said they wanted the money to be well-spent. At the same time, Reid and other Senate Democrats unveiled a far more comprehensive proposal to provide health, housing, education and other benefits.

The White House said $50 billion of the $51.8 billion bill would be distributed through the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has been the subject of widespread criticism in the past week.

The official breakdown said $23.2 billion was for housing aid and grants to individuals, of which about $640 million was for the unprecedented debit cards.



State and local governments are in line for $7.7 billion in reimbursement costs.

White House officials said the money was needed without delay to prevent an interruption in the massive operation designed to repair the damage along the Gulf Coast and bring hope to an almost unimaginable number of evacuees forced to flee.

The bill brought the total in disaster aid to $62.3 billion — a total that is certain to rise as the full impact of the storm becomes clear. With much of New Orleans still covered by fouled floodwaters, for example, there is as yet no estimate for the cost of pumping out the city — or rendering it safely habitable again.

Survivor winner in deep water with courts

By M.L. Johnson
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Richard Hatch, who won $1 million on the first season of the reality show "Survivor," was indicted Thursday for failing to pay taxes on his winnings from the CBS show.

Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion, filing a false tax return, wire fraud, bank fraud and mail fraud. U.S. attorney Robert Clark Corrente said Hatch, 44, did not pay taxes on his "Survivor" prize, income from a radio show and rental income. The Newport resident also allegedly used donations to his charity, Horizon Bound, to cover personal expenses.

Prosecutors charged Hatch with two counts of tax evasion in January. He agreed to plead guilty, but backed out of the deal in March, saying he thought CBS was responsible for paying the taxes on his prize. CBS has said Hatch was well aware of his obligations to pay taxes on the money.

On Thursday, Hatch was on a plane headed for Houston to help hurricane victims at the Astrodome and could not be reached for comment, said Rod Mitchell, a spokesman for Hatch's attorney, Michael Minns. Mitchell did not immediately comment.

The grand jury, which received the case after the plea deal fell apart, indicted Hatch for filing false 2000 and 2001 tax returns, which omitted his income from the reality show. $327,000 he was paid to co-host "The Wilde Show" on WQSX-FM in Boston and $28,000 in rent on a property he owns in Newport.

The indictment said Hatch had two accountants prepare tax returns that included his "Survivor" winnings but did not file them when he learned he would owe hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxes. In 2002, he had one of the accountants prepare a second return that did not include his TV show winnings. He filed that one, which called for a $4,500 refund, the indictment said.

Hatch was also accused of misusing $36,500 from a nonprofit camp he set up, Horizon Bound. For example, he allegedly kept for himself a $10,000 donation made in return for his appearance on the NBC game show "Weakest Link." He spent the money from the game show on a construction project at his house, the indictment said.

Richard Hatch, winner of the first "survivor", has been indicted for failing to pay taxes on his million dollar winnings. Hatch faces 10 charges, including tax evasion and filing a false tax return.

Hatch faces a maximum of 75 years in prison if found guilty on all charges. He also could face millions of dollars in fines.

On "Survivor," Hatch stood out for being a cunning and ruthless competitor, and spent much of his time in the nude. He won the show's first season in August 2000. He has since appeared on other TV shows, most recently the "Battle of the Network Reality Stars" on the cable TV channel Bravo.

Since the television show, Hatch has weathered a series of legal battles. He was arrested in April 2000 on a charge of abusing his then 9-year-old son. That charge was later dropped. In 2002, Hatch was found innocent of assaulting his ex-boyfriend.

U. Minn. endures rash of underage drinking violations

By Elizabeth Cook
Minnesota Daily (U. Minnesota)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS — In the past week the number of party complaints has doubled, and there was an increase of underage drinking citations.

According to reports, one of these incidents was at approximately 1:40 a.m. Sunday in Pioneer Hall. Steve Johnson, deputy police chief for the University of Minnesota Police Department, said security monitors responded to a noise complaint. The monitors observed that the students had been drinking. The students refused to provide their information, so police were called.

According to reports, when officers arrived, the students blew in to a preliminary breath tester. One student was unable to properly blow into the device, and was then taken to detox on the account of not being able to care of himself, police said.

All the suspects were issued citations for consumption as a minor.

In another incident, at approximately 1 a.m. Sunday, police observed a man lose his balance and almost fall over outside the Sports Pavilion on University Avenue Southeast.

The officer then stopped to check the welfare of the man who said he had drank "way too much" alcohol.

He was then cited for consumption as a minor and given a restorative justice form.

A restorative justice form is included with all consumption by a minor cases and open public drinking citations given by university police. In the program, violators are given the option to erase the misdemeanor from their record by attending a community conference, among other options, Johnson said.

CARELESS DRIVING

At approximately 2:50 a.m. Monday, an officer observed a green vehicle swerving and accelerating toward the intersection of 18th Avenue Southeast and University Avenue Southeast, according to reports. When the driver of the vehicle saw the officer, he immediately stopped, even though the light was still green.

The light then turned yellow and the car waited until it turned green again to go, police said.

When the light changed, the officer turned on his lights and began pulling over the suspect. A red car drove up behind and around the officer's car, blocking the officer from the green vehicle.

The officer then withdrew enough to pull both vehicles over. While the driver of the red car pulled over, the other driver continued down the road.

Officers pulled over the green vehicle and could smell alcohol on the driver. The driver was found to have been drinking and was younger than 21; the vehicle was towed.

In the red car, the driver, who was 21, said he had two beers earlier. He was given a field sobriety test, passed and was issued a careless driving ticket.

The passenger of the red vehicle, who was also the owner, became outraged with police and began yelling profanities at them.

Study finds 'freshmen blues' lowers health

By Sarah Storer
FSView & Florida Flambeau (Florida State U.)

(U-WIRE) TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Freshman year of college can be a difficult time. First-year students are faced with balancing classes, outside jobs and sometimes children.

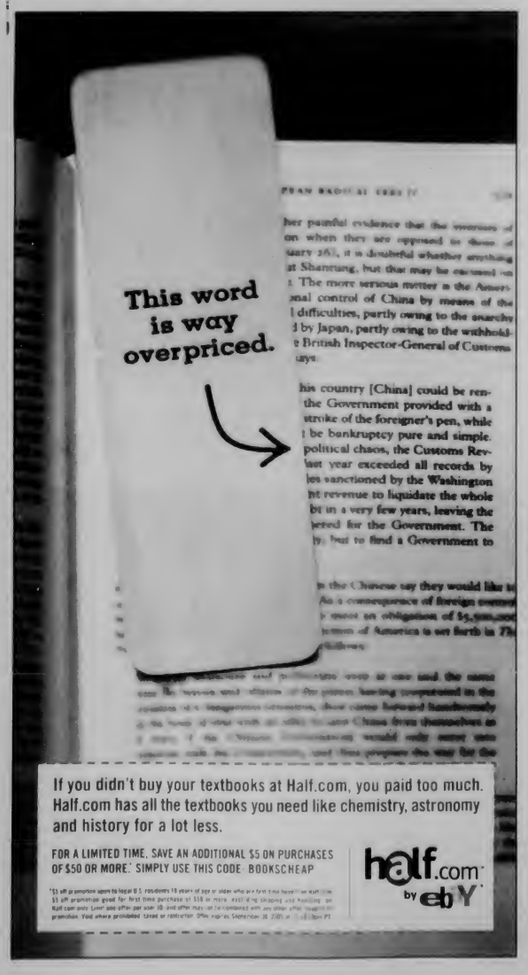
Many freshmen are living on their own for the first time, with a roommate they may not know, in a city they may have never been to before. The increased loneliness and stress first-year students feel is known as the "Freshman Blues."

According to a study published in the May issue of Health Psychology, the "Freshman Blues" may also decrease health.

"Lonely students had less robust immune responses to the flu shot than other students," researchers said.

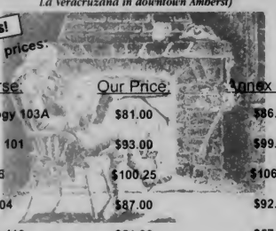
The study was done at Carnegie Mellon University, using 37 male and 46 female freshmen. Each received a flu shot at a university clinic, and then filled out questionnaires on their health behaviors. For two weeks, starting two days before they received the flu shot, the students recorded their moods — including feelings of stress and loneliness — four times a day.

During the two-week period, saliva samples were obtained from the students four times a day for five days. The samples were measured for levels of the stress hormone cortisol.



Researchers found that students with a "weak social network" — few close friends — had a poor immune response to the flu shot, independent of loneliness. Loneliness itself, however, was also associated with a poor immune system response to the flu shot — for as long as four months after the shot, the researchers found.

The findings support the premise that chronic loneliness can help predict a person's health and well-being, researchers said.



"You can have very few friends but still not feel lonely," said Sarah Pressman, the lead researcher, in a prepared statement. "Alternatively, you can have many friends, yet feel lonely."

Loneliness, she said, may not be relevant to students' social groups; it may be caused by a poor immune response to the flu shot.

However, social factors are important for health, Pressman said, because "they encourage good health behaviors such as eating (healthfully), sleeping and exercising well, and may buffer the stress response to negative events."

Poll: most college students dislike math

By Jamie Smith
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

(U-WIRE) NORMAL, Ill. — According to an AP-AOL news poll, a study found math as the most feared and hated subject in school. Almost four in 10 adults surveyed said they hated math in school.

"This study was conducted in a pretty scientific way so it is hard to argue with the data. It is consistent with my experiences with college students and secondary school students who I see through the teacher education program," Roger Day, associate professor of mathematics, said.

Janet Warfield, associate mathematics professor, agreed.

"A lot of people, if I say I am a math teacher, immediately say, 'I hated math, I was never really good at math.'"

Day said he can tell when a student dislikes his class or fears math.

"Whether it be a physical activity, an academic endeavor or a job, attitude is so critical. Without confidence it is hard to be successful and if you have the attitude that [math] isn't going to be useful, it's pretty tough to motivate yourself to succeed," Day said.

Math is also used in everyday situations outside of the classroom.

"When you drive down Veterans Parkway in relatively busy traffic, you have to decide, 'should I change lanes, am I going to make the red light, how fast should I go, how slow?' Now, you don't stop and think that this was exercise 12 in my algebra book last year, but you're doing estimation about distance and speed and moving a vehicle," Day said.

Warfield said she believes the way math was taught to them might be the culprit for students who dislike it.

"[In math] students are expected to do a lot of memorization and copying what the teacher has shown them to do and it's boring. And what happens when you memorize things without understanding them is that you don't remember because you have no connections with them in your mind to other things that might make sense to you," she said.

"The belief that mathematics is just about rules and formulas and procedures is such a limited perspective about what mathematics is. I don't think our system does a very good job of helping people see that math is much more than Pythagorean Theorem or the quadratic equation," Day said.

Despite the results of the study, both Day and Warfield feel that the number of students enrolled in mathematics classes has risen in recent years.

Lindsey Daniels, sophomore elementary education major, said she sometimes fears math, but also enjoys it.

"[Math] frightens me a little, but it makes it more of a challenge as well," she said.

Warfield said students need to be challenged to think and should not be told and expected to memorize what the teacher says.

Day said he tries to run a classroom in which his students are actively involved and to see things from a conceptual perspective.

"I think over the years, I've tried more and more to help students see what is there to math — beyond this little piece that we are doing in the classroom, how you can use it in your endeavors in life," Day said.

UMass ranking sparks debate

student population was included in the survey. Princeton Review admits that the 300 students went to the group's Web site on their own to answer survey questions.

Nevertheless, Princeton Review officials are defending their survey.

"This is a 'Consumer Reports'-style survey," said Robert J. Franek, author of "The Best 361 Colleges" in a statement Aug. 23. "The thoughts and opinions of 110,000 students from 361 of the best colleges in the country should not be discounted."

"This is a self-serving collected sample," Blaguszewski said. "It may be a selection of the populous that is very interested in partying."

UMass has been trying to shed its "Zoo Mass" party image for years, but riots surrounding sporting events recently haven't helped the University regain its reputation as a prestigious learning institution.

Student reaction to the survey is mixed.

"I do think it's a party school," said Adam Simon, a senior Criminal Justice major. "Whether students party or not, they know what kind of school it is."

"I think [UMass] is only a party school if you put yourself into that environment," said Lynna Lon, a senior Economics major who added that she chose to live in the Central Residential Area to find a less party-oriented atmosphere.

"If you live in Southwest, most likely you'll party," she said.

"I don't think it's accurate," said Maxine Dube, Associate Speaker of the UMass Student Government Association. "They surveyed such a small amount of people."

Blaguszewski assures students that UMass does not try to overlook alcohol related issues. The University just received a federal grant to look into the issue last month.

"It doesn't mean we don't take seriously issues related to alcohol abuse and partying," Blaguszewski said.

Program helps students reduce drinking

non-judgmental and non-confrontational opportunity to step back and take a look at their drinking habits.

Program participants will fill out a series of surveys about their drinking habits and attitudes toward alcohol, keep a drinking log for two weeks, and meet twice with a BASICS staff member, who will give personalized feedback on how to lower the risks associated with drinking.

"What has been shown by research, and from students' feedback, is that just the opportunity to stop and take a look at your drinking, and talk with someone in a non-judgmental way, causes many students to just reduce the amount they drink when they drink, or how often," said Linowski.

First offenders, students found with an open container in a residence hall and minors in possession of alcohol, will be referred to the program. However, the program is available to any student who wants to step back and take a look at their drinking habits. "Anyone can access BASICS, whether or not they get referred as a judicial process," said Linowski.

Although students' drinking typically escalates in college, particularly during the first two years, the binge drinking rate at UMass is well above the national figures. Nationwide, the rate of binge drinking, which is defined as five or more drinks for men or four or more drinks for women in one sitting in the past week is 48 percent. At UMass, 59 percent of students are classified as binge drinkers.

The high rate is not unique to UMass, Linowski said. "We're a large, public, rural university in the Northeast, and those demographics tend to have the highest rates of drinking across the country," she said.

However, Linowski feels that the BASICS program will be an integral part of UMass' commitment to wellness and the whole person. "We want people to be happy, to be healthy, to have a great time at UMass, and if they choose to drink, to have that be a positive aspect of their life — not something that's getting them into trouble, or getting them hurt, or causing them problems in their relationships," she said.

The Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention will continue hiring and training prevention staff through the early fall, and the program should be up and running by Jan. 2006, Linowski said.

New power plant could bring a healthier environment to Amherst carbon monoxide emissions by as much as seven times the previous amount," said Hunt.

According to Hunt, this new plant will not only benefit the environment, but the town of Amherst itself.

"This plant will emit less toxic emissions, use less energy and work extremely more efficiently," said Hunt. "We're also helping the economy by the hiring of local labor to run the plant, and local construction crews to build it."

The large building — 55 feet at the peak, 250 feet wide and 400 feet long — will have large eaves, edges of borders that hang at the edge of the roof that overhang the wall, and will attempt to give the appearance of a pitched roof being tied to the ground.

Work on the heating plant began more than two years ago when 150,000 tons of gravel was hauled to the site to provide the base for the plant.

Mass. Gov. Mitt Romney recently announced his plan that would send $20 million of UMass' $60 million surplus towards the construction of the new power plant. UMass President Jack Wilson and UMass Amherst Chancellor John V. Lombardi both expressed support for the proposal.

The University requires an electrical permit from Hadley, and has received environmental permits from federal and state regulatory agencies.

The best years of my life

Katelyn Harding

Yup, it is that time of year. When students going into their senior year are realizing that, gasp, in only a short while, they have to actually enter the real world and make something of themselves. Throughout the years, UMass has provided us with unique experiences that will forever remain precious to us. But while these memories are important to cherish and hold onto, we need to realize that we have time left at UMass, and we should stop and appreciate it now, before we graduate.

I'm sick of people waiting until after they graduate to reflect back and realize that their college years "were the best years of their life." Why don't you sit down now and say that "these are the best years of my life?" Appreciating the present will do you good for the future. Spoken in the movie "Waking Life," Life was raging all around me and every moment was magical." This person is looking back, remembering their life, and how great it was. But wouldn't it be so much better to realize while it is happening how precious these college moments are?

There is always the chance that I might meet someone tomorrow who could change my future. That is why we need to love the present, not just live in it, and not just appreciate it when it is the past.

I have been very blessed, as a lot of you can say you have been as well, to have met an assortment of amazing and interesting people in my travels around the UMass campus. From my group of guy friends who keep things interesting with the bars they created in their houses, to my girls who remind me everyday why I am so lucky that I found them. There are the people that I met in the dorms who I keep in touch with and when I talk to them, we can always pick up wherever we left off. And I continue to meet new people every day.

Before coming to UMass I was not very open-minded, coming from a place where I was very secure and protected. In high school, you make friends with people because either you grew up with them, or because you do the same activities, such as a team or a club. But in college, you realize that the friends that you make complement you. You are not friends with them because you have the same hobbies; you are friends with them because they are an extension of yourself. I am not forgetting about my cherished friends from home, they have been, and remain, a source of strength for me. In addition to them, I am happy to say that the friends I have made the past couple years at school have helped me develop into the person I am at this very moment.

There is always the chance that I might meet someone tomorrow who could change my future. That is why we need to love the present, not just live in it, and not just appreciate it when it's the past. If we do not realize how special these moments are, we will never be able to fully remember them, if only lasting for an instant.

I'm grateful for my friend who I can sit up with all night and talk politics with, him knowing just about everything, me not so much, but yet he still listens to what I have to say. I'm lucky for a pal of mine that has opened my eyes to an ever-growing field of music that I never even dreamed possible. I love my friend who, even though she moved back home to New York, I can still call her up on the phone, and we can help each other with any problems that either of us might have at that moment.

So this is a thank-you to my friends that I have met along the way. My UMass experience would not be nearly as memorable without you guys. Cheers to the past, most importantly the present, and looking forward to the future. Buckle up; we still have eight months to look forward to. Realize that "There's only one instant, and it's right now, and it's eternity." Appreciate and take advantage of what you have now, because it will be over before you know it.

The oil crisis goes to level green.

Gov't fails Katrina victims

Adam Sutton

Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast like a WWII air strike. Its 140 mile an hour winds tore buildings to piles of splintered lumber and broke two levees in New Orleans, drowning the below sea-level city under water 20 feet deep in some places.

Residents who decided to sit out the storm, despite New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin's city-wide evacuation order, emerged to see what none of them expected: New Orleans was virtually gone. The city was now an oil-stained lake, spotted with roof top islands and bodies under a gray sky.

Anarchy swept over the city with looters smashing merchants' windows and malevolent degenerates beating, murdering and raping at will. The situation remained uncontrollable as some city police officers deserted and committed suicide.

People swam and walked by debris and bodies to the New Orleans Convention Center and the Superdome for aid. There, a combined 45,000 suffering people — some dying — waited days for food, water, doctors and evacuation to safety.

Around this time, three days after the levees broke, President Bush decided enough was enough — he was coming back from vacation. He put down his copy of "My Pet Goat" and on Friday he surveyed the destruction.

His address, after stepping off of Air Force One, lacked respect and conviction as he said "This is a devastating storm. This is a storm that's going to require immediate action now." Action now? The levees broke three days ago.

After his half-hearted words of consolation and determination, Bush even joked about how he used to come to New Orleans and enjoy himself, "sometimes a little too much"while a woman in a blue business suit stood behind him trying to stifle her tears.

The President's initial, uncoached reaction to the sight of Katrina's destruction shows the true nature of our immature, unqualified and frightening leader. Has this man no respect for what he just saw? The country is mourning a city wiped from the face of the Earth and he is cracking jokes about partying.

Further signs of our president's incompetence are the reactions of his appointees in dealing with this catastrophe.

Michael Brown, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the agency in charge of remedying this type of disaster, said he was unaware of the 20,000 refugees awaiting aid at the New Orleans convention center until a full day after news crews covered the story. However, this is not a surprising comment from a man who had no previous disaster relief experience before his appointment and in fact was the head of the International Arabian Horse Association.

Another Bush appointee, Michael Chertoff, the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, the parent agency to Federal Emergency Management Agency, said that the government had no way of knowing that a disaster of this scale could happen. However, chief of engineers for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, after the hurricane had dissipated, said, "We certainly understood the potential impact of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane" in New Orleans. I don't think that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers keeps this type of information a secret. Either Chertoff is incompetent or a blatant liar. Either way, he should not be the head of our homeland's security.

This catastrophe has shown United States citizens the President's lack of maturity to deal with this type of national disaster, that his unqualified appointees have completely failed at their jobs to protect Americans and that the Department of Homeland Security is merely a political tool and federal money pit.

The illusion that the U.S. Government is intelligent enough and capable of protecting its citizens at the required level, whether it be a natural disaster, disease or terrorist strike, just went out to sea.

Is John Roberts mainstream?

Michael Sances

The English had always struck me as especially skeptical of their government, and a summer here in Oxford has not disappointed in this regard. "Blair and Bush and sheepish Putin were trapped in their ring of steel," wrote Suzanne Moore in the right-wing Daily Mail on July 10. "Prince Charles, please don't patronize us about the Tube when you never go on it." On the next page, Peter Hitchens was sarcastically asking if "our 'heroic' leaders are courageous enough to ride the Tube."In fact, Teflon Tony has yet to even pay his respects at the bombing sites.

If only the battle lines were as clearly drawn in the United States, and the budding intelligentsia of our universities did not give in so easily to the myth of a polarized electorate. There is a gap in America, and a widening one, too, but it's not the one you'd hear about on National Public Radio.

Take the recent nomination of John Roberts to the Supreme Court, the battle over whether Roberts is mainstream or otherwise has been loud enough that I've been able to hear it some 3,000 miles away. But what strikes me as most interesting is the criteria for determining whether the man is "within the mainstream" of American society — namely, the positions he took as a lawyer advocating on behalf of the Reagan and Bush Senior administrations; or, alternatively, his alleged membership in the Federalist Society, which, as I understand it, presents itself as a conservative alternative to the liberal American Bar Association.

"As deputy solicitor general under the first President Bush," the abortion rights group NARAL has been screaming, "Roberts argued to the Supreme Court that 'Roe was wrongly decided and should be overruled.'"

True, but so what? Roberts was acting as a surrogate here, and the quote therefore tells us nothing about his own opinions.

Arguing over whether the Federalist Society or the American Bar Association is more "mainstream" is just as absurd. They are both exclusive clubs of the rich and powerful, and their members have very little in common with the average American.

A New York Times story about Roberts tells us in passing that the man is worth "$5.3 million, including a stock portfolio worth more than $1.6 million." So this is mainstream? You won't hear this mentioned as a contentious issue in any discussion on Roberts, because any nominee to the Court, regardless of their opinion on abortion, would by definition have belonged to the same elite class.

A New York Times story about Roberts tells us in passing that the man is worth $5.3 million, including a stock portfolio worth more than $1.6 million. So is this mainstream?

Personally, I would prefer Roberts not be confirmed to the Court, but mainly because of a decision he made — as a judge, and therefore acting of his own volition — a week before Bush nominated him. The case concerned the legality of the military tribunals being conducted at the American prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. A judge had ruled in November that the trials were contrary to both domestic and international law; on July 15, a three-judge appeals court unanimously reversed that decision. One of the justices on that court was John Roberts.

I've heard one voice question the possibility of favoritism; nothing more. I assume that this is because the issue of Guantanamo Bay is accepted by the elite bipartisan consensus.

Debates among my peers, and in the U.S. Senate, support this conclusion. It is fashionable to argue over who authorized what, what was an interrogation tactic and what was plain abuse. But the strongest arguments against the often brutal treatment of detainees can be silenced by the claim that the prisoners at Guantanamo are "dangerous people who will stop at nothing to kill innocent Americans"(Republican Senator Jim Bunning of Kentucky), not to mention incredibly well-fed; thus the "debate" continues indefinitely.

Virtually never mentioned is that the residents of America's nascent international prison system have not been charged with any crime — that was in fact the point of holding them outside of the United States. The President maintains the power to detain anyone he wants arbitrarily and indefinitely. That mistreatment and abuse follow is only natural, and is, to a great extent, secondary.

"The power of the executive to cast a man into prison," wrote Winston Churchill in 1943, "without formulating any charge known to the law, and particularly to deny him the judgment of his peers, is in the highest degree odious, and the foundation of all totalitarian government whether Nazi or Communist."

Certainly, there are grounds for opposing the nomination of John Roberts to the Supreme Court. But his stance on abortion is a red herring, leading only to an endless, irreconcilable argument about not only where Roberts stands, but which stance is the correct one. More to the point, if we allow such a constitutional breach as is happening at Guantanamo and elsewhere, what rights do we really have?

'A pound of flesh'

Ethan Burke

Leaders of the industrialized world are basking in their own self-righteousness after agreeing to cancel much of the debt for 18 of the world's poorest and most indebted nations.

This gesture has been heralded by U.S. Treasury Secretary John Snow and Britain's Treasury Chief Gordon Brown as "an achievement of historic proportions" and a "new deal between the rich and poor of the world." Debt cancellation is a just action, but not when it requires "a pound of flesh."

Debt cancellation is built upon the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative, a World Bank/International Monetary Fund program that began in 1996 with the goal of "reducing the excessive debt burdens faced by the world's poorest nations." Loans were given ostensibly to provide funds for economic development. However, these loans have conditions detrimental to economic development.

It appears the same harmful conditions will be attached to debt cancellation, though final details have not been announced.

What are these conditions?

Before giving debt relief, international financial institutions (which include the World Bank, IMF and regional institutions) design Structural Adjustment Programs or Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers. These require any number of harmful stipulations for indebted nations that lead one to question who truly stands to benefit from such programs.

Should we be surprised when riots and protests break out across the third world, especially when food subsidies are cut and foreign firms overcharge people to access their own water?

Common conditions include: limiting government expenditures, eliminating subsidies and price controls, lifting import/export restrictions and opening the country to foreign investment.

Putting conditional debt relief into context reveals a tool of exploitation, not an act of altruism.

Historically, nations have often protected local industry by taxing or restricting imported products. Protectionism makes foreign products more expensive and allows local producers, who may not be able to compete with cheap foreign products, to sell their products within their own country.

All developed countries have used (and still use) protectionism. Yet, these same countries deny protectionism to countries that accept desperately needed debt relief and "development" loans.

Development of large industries takes time and significant investment. Without state protection or support, large industries have no chance for survival through development stages while competing with efficient well developed businesses, which is why all wealthy nations have used protectionism during their industrial development. The idea that industry will develop in poor countries under present conditions is a fallacy.

Emerging businesses in the third world competing with U.S., Japanese and European corporations is like Michael Jordan playing one-on-one with a junior varsity high school student. But even this analogy doesn't go far enough given the huge government subsidies given to U.S. and European companies. It's more like Michael Jordan shooting at a regulation hoop while the junior varsity student gets the shrunken carnival sized hoop where the ball barely fits.

It doesn't take an economist to realize the absurdity of prohibiting poor countries from using the same successful policies as rich countries in the name of promoting their "development." Yet intelligent, powerful people continue to insist on these policies, despite evidence to the contrary.

In what industries are the poorest nations expected to compete in the global market? There are no domestic, electronic, computer or auto industries developing. Local farmers and ranchers cannot compete with highly subsidized hi-tech U.S. and European agribusiness, making their products unprofitable. What's left?

Weak, undeveloped and indebted nations are left with two marketable assets: natural resources and cheap labor. Foreign firms move in unimpeded to exploit both labor and resources in a system that amounts to a new form of colonialism.

Aside from preventing development, Structural Adjustment Programs take an additional toll on the poor. Forcing governments to limit expenditures mean cutting social services (healthcare, education, water services, etc.). Eliminating subsidies and price controls mean food and water cost more for people who already suffer from poor nutrition.

Should we be surprised when riots and protests break out across the third world, especially when food subsidies are cut and foreign firms overcharge people to access their own water?

Would the U.S. government submit to such conditions? If not, why the double standard?

We don't have to speculate because the U.S. government has not embraced these so-called neo-liberal policies, despite demanding them from indebted and impoverished nations. The U.S. continues to subsidize and protect its industries while running huge budget deficits. Recent examples include subsidies to Boeing, pharmaceutical companies and agribusiness; an array of tariffs most notably steel, textiles, lumber, electronics; and prevention of a Chinese oil company from purchasing Unocal.

Fiscal spending, taxes, trade and other issues of this magnitude should be decided through a democratic process within each country, not forced upon nations.

What choices face highly indebted poor nations? They can accept conditional loans or suffer from the debt burden. They can hand over their economy to corporations or be shunned by the world economy and suffer the consequences.

Debt relief should bring about justice, rather than a new colonialism adapted to the global economy.

MO ROCCA IN THE CAGE

By Nick Brown
Collegian Correspondent

Morocco. The World Book Encyclopedia defines Morocco as "a fine leather made from goatskin tanned with vegetable extracts, used in binding books." Then there is Mo Rocca. Not to be mistaken for book binding purposes, Mo Rocca embodies the essence of satire. Approaching subjects of a very serious and relevant nature, Mr. Rocca has assisted the world in finding laughter in the unfortunate and painfully laughable world of American politics.

Mo Rocca

If you watch your average network news every night you might know a little bit about your local and international situation. If you've ever watched "The Daily Show" with Mo Rocca (or that other guy, John Stewart), you have glimpsed a genuine miracle in news reporting today.

Satire at its best allows us to see the absurdity of any situation. There is laughter to be had in the darkest of times. Getting his big break with John Stewart on "The Daily Show," Rocca helped bring the absurdity of mainstream media into the lives of countless Americans. Generally known for spoof interviews and ridiculously random reports, Rocca combined deadpan facial expressions with the most absurd news stories to create a world where ridiculousness is under every rock and around every corner.

Mr. Rocca spent several years entertaining and enlightening American audiences with his blend of ballistic anecdotes and conventional wisdom. His work on the 2000 presidential campaign for "The Daily Show," otherwise known as "Indecision 2000," helped win the show an Emmy and a Peabody award. He has also written for several children's programs, including "The Wubbulous World of Dr. Seuss," "Wishbone" and "Pepper Ann."

Since his departure form "The Daily Show," Mo Rocca has become a staple of the VH1 series "I love the 80's," as well as a regular contributor to CNN, Fox News, GQ magazine, Newsweek and several other notable publications.

With such credentials under his belt, you can be sure we'll be hearing from Mo Rocca for a very long time. And let's be honest, the world could always use another sharp mind to magnify the rampant idiocy that all too often goes completely unnoticed. Where would we be without minds like Andy Kaufman or Jerry Seinfeld? Such humor is rarely trivial and never irrelevant.

Mo Rocca will be performing his unique brand of satirical politics tonight at the Curry Hicks Cage at 10 p.m. Tickets are free to all UMass students and can be picked up at the Fine Arts Center box office.

Should you find yourself laughing to the point of pain, do not be alarmed. It is completely normal to rupture one's spleen when witnessing such poignancy wrapped in a thick veil of idiosyncrasy.

All too often people turn to broadcast or cable news for their daily dose of information. All too often our news is dry, lifeless and unfortunately sober. What Mo Rocca brings to the table is the essence of comedy; it's not all just slapstick and cheap gags. What makes us laugh is not just innate absurdity, but instead real life under the light of skepticism and curiosity.

Were we to lack such characters as Mo Rocca in this world we might find ourselves in a dull, sober and dismal place — not that the world can't be a dismal place. It can be terribly unforgiving. Fortunately for us we have the likes of Mo Rocca to remind us that there is laughter to be had in almost any situation.

Cake's quirks put the 'pressure' on the Calvin Theater

By Cameron J. Woods

Tonight in Northampton, for those lucky enough to have bought tickets in advance, music fans will be able to have their Cake and see it live too. The geek-rock band Cake, most famous for their 1996 hit "The Distance," is stopping off in Northampton as part of their tour in support of their new disk, "Pressure Chief."

Sept. 9

The Calvin Theatre will open its doors to the near capacity crowd for the 8 p.m. show with opening act, and Pioneer Valley perennial performer Erin McKeown. Led by front man John McCrea's unique speak-singing style of blending pop-culture digs with poetic twists of phrase, the 11-year-old band has gained quite a cult following.

The band's ability to explore their own self-created niche without changing their sound drastically from one disc to the next is something that has kept their fan base loyal from "Motorcade of Generosity" (1994) through "Pressure Chief" (2004).

At the onset, the band had been labeled as a one-hit wonder, but though they have never quite reached the "superstar" level, one must admire the tenacity with which Cake has endured in a music world that has forgotten so many other quirky rock bands. The band, which originally formed in Sacramento, Calif. in 1993, caused some murmurs with their original single, "Rock n' Roll Lifestyle," which fused in the brassy sounds of trumpet with a strong rock sound. One the most interesting fusions of wind instruments in rock music since Ian Anderson broke out the flute for Jethro Tull.

Opening the night for the band will be Erin McKeown, who is promoting her new disc, "We Will Become like Birds." The energetic 27-year-old has explored a variety of genres with her previous three studio releases, as well as learned how to play the majority of the music on them. Much more than an ordinary singer/songwriter, McKeown has, in the last six years, made her name known

During their 11 year career, Cake has managed to find mild success with their bizarre brand of rock.

'Emily Rose' feels more like boring T.V. courtroom drama

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

"The Exorcism of Emily Rose" was originally a limited release. In a miraculous turn, the film has shot its way up through the charts and emerged as the main headliner of this week's release. The reason for this drastic shift in reputation and demand is because "The Exorcism of Emily Rose" had an internet trailer that was terrifying. Word spread furiously and quickly to keep all eyes watching and anticipating this film's release dates.

Hollywood producers keep up to par with internet gossip. In the film world, it has grown so popular and powerful in communicating opinions that it can make or break a film. Earlier this year, intense internet buzz brought an exorcist prequel called "Dominion" off the shelves and into the theaters where curious horror fans flocked to see it and returned with mixed responses. Now comes the arrival of "The Exorcism of Emily Rose," which is getting much higher praise than "Dominion" and has been launched to a much wider release than any other limited film in a long time.

The trailer gets this film right and it is very disappointing to say, the film as a whole, does not. There are two movies here and the trailer only shows one of them — the better one, as it turns out. The better of the two films watches the possession sequences, the supernatural elements and the spectacular exorcism. The lesser film is caught up with a trial that longs to make sense of situations that should be left unexplained. It longs to turn the film into a courtroom drama and that has a fatal error.

'The Exorcism of Emily Rose'
Directed by Scott Derrickson
Starring Laura Linney, Tom Wilkinson
Sony Pictures
Grade C+

Father Moore (Tom Wilkinson) is being charged for negligent homicide. A young girl of extreme illness was entrusted in his care by her religious parents. All parties agreed on demonic possession. An exorcism was performed and a day later she was dead. Her name was Emily Rose (Jennifer Carpenter) and she was a bright, shy, warm girl who was off to college on a scholarship. This is where her troubles began. She formed a close relationship with Jason (Joshua Close). Soon after, demons seek to inhabit her body and after many attempts, they succeed. Jason stays close with her right through the experience up to her trip home and even through the exorcism. Her parents watch obliviously. Priests and doctors try hopelessly to help, but young Emily is doomed.

These scenes are shown through flashback sequences which are discussed through a trial that is seriously out of place. Representing Father Moore is a lawyer on a hot streak, Erin Bruner (Laura Linney) had successfully defended a man that was guilty of murder and got him a release in a highly publicized case. Now she is assigned to the priest against a Catholic prosecutor, Ethan Thomas (Campbell Scott), who is determined to send the priest to jail for life.

Thomas uses the charge that Emily was schizophrenic and epileptic — that psychiatric and medical care would have saved her, had a certain priest not encouraged her to abandon medical care and undergo exorcism. In a miraculous twist, Bruner uses a different approach, one that I won't reveal, but one that inspires objections on the basis of "silliness." In fact, all the courtroom scenes are silly. This entire courtroom angle is wrong for an exorcist movie. The legal jargon and the witness accounts are unwelcome.

The film works in its flashback scenes. The exorcism material, the horror themes and the dark atmosphere are very effective. If it had made up more than a half hour of this two hour film, I might have a different opinion on the whole matter. The possession that only happens at 3 a.m., the demons hunting Emily, Father Moore and Erin Bruner, the scenes of hallucination and hysterical fits induce sincere scares. Jennifer Carpenter gives a very severe and frightening performance; she deserves comparison with Linda Blaire. She is not given nearly enough screen time, but her scenes are phenomenal. The other performances pale in comparison and are merely standard.

Had the film been true to its trailer, it would be an exorcist movie and not one long trial about an exorcism gone wrong. Had the camera turned away from the thoughtful jury and returned rightfully to Emily Rose, it would've had something. Had its focus been less on Father Moore's level of responsibility and more on his telling of Emily's story, we would've had a new exorcist movie. We would've had an amazingly good exorcist movie.

Seu Jorge tells it like it is at Pearl Street

By Jordan Levin
Knight Ridder Newspapers

In "The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou," Seu Jorge is a strange figure in a strange movie — a rail thin, dread-locked man who keeps popping up to strum David Bowie songs in Portuguese on the guitar, one of a crew of misfits on a Cousteau-like expedition in a surreal satire led by Bill Murray. Dreamily intoning songs like "Life on Mars," Jorge seems like a figure from another world.

Seu Jorge

Northampton
Sept. 9

And that he is. The man who one British paper said should be nominated as the coolest guy on the planet, grew up in a brutal slum outside Rio de Janeiro. After his brother was murdered in a battle with a rival gang, the family ended up on the street, and 20-year-old Jorge spent several years homeless.

"Because the gangs try to reduce any form of retribution by the family, they break them up and make them homeless to reduce their power," Jorge said by e-mail. "I lost weight, got addicted and did not sleep. When you are on the streets the gangs try and burn you when you are sleeping so you don't sleep for long!"

He found emotional and literal refuge in music and acting. He began sleeping outside a theater because it was relatively safe, and was eventually allowed to sleep inside its gates. The people there heard him playing a beat-up guitar someone had given him, which led to an audition for a musical play, and then a career as an actor. He also became a musician, first with a circus-like samba-pop group called Farofa Carioca, then as a solo artist, releasing "Samba Esporte Fino" in 1999, which was named album of the year in Brazil.

In 2002, he landed the role of gangster Knockout Ned in the film "City of God," Fernando Mereilles' devastating portrait of gang warfare in Rio's slums, which became a critical and cult hit. That in turn led to the part in "Life Aquatic," and friendships with stars Bill Murray and Willem Dafoe, who appear in the music video for "Cru," Jorge's latest recording.

It has been a long journey with an almost impossible start. "Getting out of the favela is a big deal," says Jorge, now 35. "The gangsters are so powerful, drug trafficking is rife and no one has jobs. Survival is the key word. Getting out of the favelas ... is everyone's aspiration. How you do it is up to you."

He says friendships with Hollywood stars and parts in hit films haven't made him forget his roots. "I am a realist with my feet firmly on the ground. What it is is another step up the ladder of life."

For all its terrors, life in Jorge's poor neighborhood of Baixanda Fluminense also had its fun and inspiration.

"One positive side to favelas is that music is still a key part. Instead of getting down about their situation, the people have regular ... samba dances, and for that short time everyone is happy and friendly," Jorge says. His father played percussion in a small orchestra, and he's inspired by Brazil's classic tropicalia artists, like Gilberto Gil, Caetano Veloso and Tom Ze, as well as musicians like Zeca Pagodinho, part of a new generation of samba musicians popular in the favelas.

"Cru" (which translates as "raw") is sparse contemporary samba, where Jorge's rough voice comes through with a wide range of emotion: yearning on love songs like Jorge's "Tive Razao" ("I Was Right"), musing and mournful on "Fu Sou Favela" ("I Am Favela"). There's a somber cover of a Serge Gainsbourg song, "Chatterton," about suicide, and an oddly slow, dreamy version of Leiber and Stoller's "Don't," made famous by Elvis Presley.

"I love Elvis as he was a white guy bringing black music to the masses!" Jorge says.

But for the most part he writes and picks songs as they move him. "I write about life as I see it. I don't preach. I just tell. I don't see myself as political either, I just tell it as I feel. If this is interpreted differently and can help people, this is a bonus."

Good things come in threes

By Paul Thompson
Penn State Daily Collegian

When I reviewed Kanye West's new record last week, I failed to make a point I probably should've. It's not easy following up a great hip-hop debut, and if Kanye didn't quite hit the mark with "Late Registration," he certainly isn't alone. It took Jay-Z five years to cook up a proper compliment to "Reasonable Doubt;" Nas never could quite pick up where "Illmatic" so promisingly left off; and if you think Snoop's ever going to top "Doggystyle," you must be stealing from his stash, nephew. There's just hardly ever been a rap act who has made a classic right out of the gate and then come back with something better.

But De La Soul, blue-ribbon winners for possibly the most under-appreciated hip-hop act ever, did it again, and then, did it again. De La's debut, the lighthearted, lighthanded "Three Feet High and Rising," found a strange place where the realities of ghetto life and the realities of psoriasis (that's dandruff, yo) could bump elbows in peace. It worked in spite of itself; but for the follow up, De La threw down a scathing critique of the music industry and their new lives as semi-celebs and called it, fittingly, "De La Soul Is Dead." It might've pissed off a few fans looking for another goofy Technicolor game show like its predecessor, but the brutal honesty (and warped funk) of "Dead" turned De La from one-liners into vital monologists.

Not content to bounce along with a huge chip on their shoulders, De La came back with "Buhloone Mindstate," a whiplash inducing carnival ride through '70s soul, random noise bursts with announcements, and most of all, some very nice rhyming. It's a head trip of a record, just like the two that came before it; but in its own whacked-out way, it's even better.

Here's an indication of how weird "Buhloone Mindstate" is. A third of the way through the record, the hip-hop screeches to a halt and is replaced by nearly five minutes of sublime saxophone by funk legend and former James Brown associate Maceo Parker. De La follows that up with a pair of far East MCs counting in Japanese and yes yes ya'lling all over a head-bobbing break-beat. And what about the next track? Well, it begins with a duet of primal screams. You get the picture.

But far from being annoying or challenging, De La's third record is just plain good; "Buhloone Mindstate" seems perfectly crafted from start to finish, with every line sinking deep into every beat. It helps that this was producer Prince Paul and De La's third full-length collaboration, since the comfort they had bouncing ideas off of each other is clear with each new wild style they craft. And it certainly doesn't hurt that Posdnuos (to say nothing of the almost-as-amazing Trugoy) is maybe one of the five greatest MCs of all time, with a duck-and-run flow and maddeningly complex rhyme scheme that's as fun to break down as it is to listen to. He goes off on any subject, in any direction he pleases, with razor-sharp precision and mic-rocking power. When he says, on "In the Woods," "f being hard, Posdnuos is complicated," he's not just bragging; he's calling out all other smug if not thug MCs who mask their deficient lyrics with Beretta-toting. Hey, 50: even now, he means you.

"Buhloone Mindstate" might've even set the bar a little too high for De La. Its follow-up, "Stakes Is High," found them following the trends at the time rather than leading the way, and though last year's "The Grind Date" was as enjoyable as anything the old guard of rap has put out in a long time, it was no match for De La Soul's classic trilogy. Through a million samples and some of the finest rhyming ever pressed to wax, "Buhloone Mindstate" proves something all too rare in the world of hip-hop artists: if you're good enough, you can keep making hits, again, and again, and again.

Friday, in an episode of Sci Fi Channel's space opera "Battlestar Galactica," fans are going to hear something from former "Xena: Warrior Princess" star Lucy Lawless that many have not experienced — her own New Zealand accent.

"You haven't heard it yet, you know," says Lawless, calling in from the New Orleans set of her upcoming CBS movie "Vampire Bats" (she and the crew evacuated safely before the arrival of Hurricane Katrina), a sequel of sorts to "Locusts."

"There seems to be a spate of things where they really want me to do (the accent)," she says. "I really resisted at first — 'Two and a Half Men' and everything — I really didn't want to do my own. I don't know why. I just felt like it's doing a trick or something. Finally, I said OK.

"It's interesting in this case, because (my character's) a journalist and Australians have such a reputation for having been such a major presence in the world of tabloid journalism."

In "Final Cut," written by Mark Verheiden ("Timecop," "Smallville") and directed by veteran documentarian Robert M. Young ("Children of Fate: Life and Death in a Sicilian Family," "Dominick and Eugene"), Lawless plays D'Anna Biers, a reporter for the Fleet News Service.

In the wake of shootings of civilian protestors on another ship by troops from Galactica, President Roslin (Mary McDonnell) and Capt. Adama (Edward James Olmos) grant D'Anna unlimited access to the space cruiser and its crew in hopes of improving relations between civilians and the military.

When D'Anna stumbles across a couple of hot stories, she has to decide whether she'll go along with her original plan to do a hatchet job or instead do a more balanced portrayal of life aboard the lead vessel of a ragtag space fleet of human refugees fleeing an army of mechanistic Cylons.

Asked whom she used as an inspiration for D'Anna, Lawless cites one of CNN's most visible reporters.

"I thought about Christiane Amanpour," Lawless says, "but I wanted to go a little closer to home (accent-wise). She's got a pretty plummy accent. But I did kind of base it on her, because I wanted the performance to be visually annoying. With all respect to Christiane Amanpour, but you know how she turns her collar up? I just wanted to have things like that. I wanted her to be threatening, just in terms of fashion.

"Everybody else on Galactica is struggling. Nobody wears jewelry or anything. I thought, 'Well, people have always found ways to adorn themselves.' My character actually has some great clothes and changes of clothes. She's hooked into some black market, I don't know what.

"She's annoying in that way. I wanted her to get people's backs up from the start. My character's got all the bells and whistles and will not apologize for it, thank you very much."

Because of the character she's playing, Lawless got to work with many "Galactica" regulars.

"I was interviewing them all, so I got a real bloody good look at the cast and crew. I just adore Edward James Olmos. He's such a darling. Mary McDonnell — legends. Some of the young crew are so impressive. They're all just bloody nice.

"I particularly liked Trisha (Helfer, who plays humanoid Cylon Number Six) and Kandyse McClure (who plays Petty Office Dualla). I got to hang out with them more than others. They're sweet as could be and highly intelligent young women.

"You know who the biggest surprise in all of it is? Michael Hogan (who plays Col. Saul Tigh). Oh my God, that guy is hysterical. You have no idea when you see him on screen, but he is such a goofball. I really fell in love with him."

with her versatile sound.

Teaming up with producer, engineer and composer Tucker Martine, McKeown has brought her music to a new level. After finding Martine, she decided that she would make the new album in New Orleans. McKeown is quoted on her Web site as saying, "Last year was my first time visiting the city, and I was lucky enough to be shown around by a good friend who lives there. New Orleans has the unique quality of being both a hugely sad and an ultimately joyful place." This mixture of emotions is reflected in the music that McKeown creates.

With a bunch of collaborating artists on "We Will Become like Birds," the sound is varied from one song to the next, but each holds an emotional resonance that is powerfully carried. McKeown will be returning to Northampton for a Nov. 22 solo performance at the Iron Horse. Tickets are on sale through the Iron Horse's Web site, www.ihեg.com and are $17.50 in advance and $20 at the door.

There are still some tickets available for this show and are very affordable at $30, as opposed to what the scalpers will be hawking them for along Main St. So if you like your rock music mixed with satire and a more-than-a-bit-of-jazz inspired heavy bass guitar, then hurry and grab your tickets, because once the show is over there will be no leftovers.

Positions still available for Arts and Living Writers.

Therion bring symphonic metal to Palladium

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

Have you ever wondered what the epic scores of Richard Wagner would sound like if they were fused with the extreme sound of metal? Sweden's Therion would be more than happy to show you. With 15 years of experience under his belt, Therion's mastermind, Christofer Johnsson has moved one step closer to perfecting his fusion of classical and metal music with the aide of band mates, the Niemann brothers, Kristian and Johann, as well as over 170 other musicians and singers. The result of this massive collaboration is the band's latest release, the double-album masterpiece, "Lemuria/Sirius B."

Therion
Worcester Palladium
Worcester
Sept. 13

Formed back in 1987, Therion began as a death-metal band under the name Blitzkrieg. The band adopted their current title in 1988. After releasing several albums and receiving a generous display of support from the metal underground, the band underwent some drastic changes leaving Christofer as the last original member. In these desperate times for the band, Johnsson decided to go out with a bang and release the critically acclaimed, Theli. However, what he thought would be Therion's last record would become the cornerstone of a thriving musical voyage. This album bravely displayed the beginnings of the classical/metal fusion that would become Therion's signature sound.

In 1998, the album "Vovin" was released solely by Johansson. This album was the first to feature an actual symphonic orchestra differing from the synthesized sounds of "Theli." The album remains Therion's best-selling record to date and marked another step in the band's musical progression. The albums, "Deggial" and "Secret of the Runes" followed. "Deggial" further refined and built upon the band's symphonic sound while the concept album, "Secret of the Runes" was heavily influenced by Scandinavian folk-music and mythology.

Therion's latest double release, "Lemuria/Sirius B" can only be described as a fruition of the band's previous efforts to establish their unique sound. Boasting the highest production as well as the largest orchestral accompaniment, no expense was spared in achieving this vision. Spanning over 100-minutes of music, the albums delve into Therion's familiar territory of heavy metal and classical music while also displaying a more progressive side. These two albums are part of a trilogy according to Johansson. He has also said that the next album will feature longer, more progressive tracks in a similar vein to songs such as, "The Wondrous World of Punt" from "Sirius B."

The timing could not be any better as Therion launches their first ever, U.S. tour this fall. While financial restrictions have not allowed the band to bring the entire orchestra along, a five piece choir will be present as well as singer Mats Leven who appears on the new album during the live performance. Treat yourself to an immersive musical experience this Tuesday night at the Worcester Palladium. There, Therion will conjure up their masterful compositions of ancient worldly myths and wonders spanning from the secrets of Atlantis to ancient Scandinavian folklore, the fish-god Dagon and many other ancient mythologies.

Therion will also be joined by Massachusetts' own, Beyond the Embrace who were recently nominated as the best new hard rock band of 2005 by the annual Boston Music Awards. Hailing from New Bedford, this young band has already released two full-length albums and offers a promising brand of melodic death-metal.

'Unfinished Life' delivers outstanding theater experience

By Robert W. Butler
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Lasse Hallstrom's "An Unfinished Life" has it all: A compelling story, great characters, dialogue so good you want to commit it to memory and a genuine appreciation for life's sadness and saving epiphanies.

Adapted by Mark Spragg and wife Virgina Korus Spragg from his excellent novel, "Life" is a homecoming movie.

Jean Gilkyson (Jennifer Lopez, and don't laugh because she's really good) and her 11-year-old daughter Griff (the winning Becca Gardner) flee Jean's abusive boyfriend and make their way from Iowa to Jean's hometown in Wyoming. Bruised, broke and desperate, Jean throws herself on the mercy of a man who hates her: her rancher father-in-law, Einar Gilkyson (Robert Redford).

Einar blames Jean for the death of his only child, Griffin, who died in a car wreck while Jean was driving. He's spent most of the last decade staring at life through the bottom of a whiskey bottle, in the process pushing his wife into the arms of another man. He only cleaned up his act when his best friend and long-time hired hand Mitch (Morgan Freeman) was crippled in a grizzly attack. Now he devotes himself to nursing his hideously-scarred pal.

'Unfinished Life'
Directed by Lasse Hallström
Starring Robert Redford, Morgan Freeman
Miramax

Jean's arrival is an unwelcome shock for both Einer and young Griff. Neither has known of the other's existence. And while the ailing Mitch is thrilled to have young folks around the gone-to-seed spread, Einer is still stalked by rage and bitterness. He's curt, sarcastic and hostile at being reminded yet again of how much he's lost.

It goes without saying that young Griff and the curmudgeonly Einar will, little by little, work their way into each other's hearts. And ours. The magic of "An Unfinished Life" lies in the delicate insights with which permeate every aspect of the production.

Among the subplots are Jean's flirtation with the local lawman (Josh Lucas), the quest of her clueless ex (Damien Lewis) to get her back, and especially the fate of the grizzly that mauled Mitch. It's been captured and now is on display in a tacky tourist trap — a fate that Mitch views as unworthy of the magnificent creature. He's decided to forgive and forget and he expects Einar to mastermind the prison break.

The movie is so rich you can hardly take it all in with one viewing. Of special interest is the relationship between Einar and Mitch, two crusty cowboys who bicker like old married folks (at one point Griff honestly wonders if they're gay) and who share a disarmingly tender physical relationship, since Einer gives Mitch his daily injection of morphine and massages his friend's scarred back.

Spragg wisely retains most of his novel's dialogue, and he has such a flair for the language of the West that you could close your eyes and "An Unfinished Life" would still be a hugely entertaining and moving experience. There's a sort of low-keyed poetry in the way people talk —nothing overtly literary, but an inescapable rhythm to their words. And this film isn't afraid of silence, either. These characters say volumes when they keep their mouths shut and just go about their business.

The casting couldn't be better. Redford should have hung up his pretty-boy leading man jacket years ago and turned to meaty character work. Here he's grizzled and blotchy, angry and ironic in a performance that should finally win him the Oscar.

COURTESY ROTTENTOMATOES.COM
Comrades Robert Redford and Morgan Freeman sit on the porch and discuss "life" in their new drama.

Mitch could have been written with Freeman in mind. The character doesn't move much, but Freeman's voice is such a supple dramatic instrument that he can express an active inner world while remaining essentially still. He might just win the best supporting actor Oscar two years in a row.

The much-maligned Lopez gives her best work to date. If she's not quite in the same league as her leading men, she certainly does no harm.

And young Miss Gardner is a real find, a child actor who can express both solemnity and youthful enthusiasm without ever slipping into cuteness.

But then under the unforced direction of Hallstrom (he's got such an affinity for this material you forget that he's Swedish) nearly everything in "An Unfinished Life" feels right, from the lived-in wardrobe to the weathered wood of Einar' about-to-collapse barn to his vintage pickup, which has spent so much time baking in the sun that its plastic dashboard looks like a relief map of the Canyonlands.

This is why we go to movies — to laugh, cry and become part of the lives of the characters up there on the screen. "An Unfinished Life" is so good that it makes you believe in Hollywood again.

Scorsese film puts Bob Dylan in musical and historical context

By Dan DeLuca
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The most remarkable thing about "Bob Dylan: No Direction Home" — Martin Scorsese's electric new documentary, which brings with it a whirlwind of Dylan activia including previously unreleased music, a tribute CD and coffee-table book — is that it exists with the full cooperation of its subject.

Dylan, after all, is not only the greatest and most profoundly influential songwriter in rock history; he's also pop music's original shape-shifter, a now-you-see-him, now-you-don't mystery man who has mastered the art of hiding in plain sight.

Early on, he learned "not to give away too easily anything that was dear to me," Dylan says in "No Direction Home." The three-and-a-half hour epic comes out on DVD on Sept. 20 and will be shown here in two parts on Sept. 26 and 27 on PBS (check local listings).

The double-disc musical complement to the film, "No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, The Bootleg Series, Vol. 7" (Columbia, three stars), is a collection of outtakes, live cuts and rarities that come out Aug. 30. So did "Live at the Gaslight 1962" (Columbia, three stars), a solo acoustic recording thought to have been made at a Greenwich Village coffeehouse, which went on sale only at Starbucks coffee shops before its general release.

Despite the 64-year-old bard's famed caginess, there he is, craggy but cogent for the camera of the director of "Raging Bull" and "The Last Waltz." Along with such yarn-spinners as Joan Baez, Allen Ginsberg, Al Kooper and the wonderfully loquacious Liam Clancy (of the Clancy Brothers), Dylan comments on the improbable trajectory that led him from humble beginnings as baby-faced Robert Zimmerman in Hibbing, Minn. — a place in which "you couldn't be a rebel — it was too cold" — to the center of a mid-1960s society in upheaval, where he had become Bob Dylan, shaggy-haired troubadour and media-appointed counterculture answer man.

Not that "No Direction Home" is a tell-all confessional, by any means. At one point, Dylan bristles at one of Scorsese's interviewers, telling him with a malicious smile that the thing he was most "sick of" at the peak of his mid-'60s celebrity was "people like you."

And even more so than last year's sharp-witted, tough-minded, elliptical Dylan memoir, "Chronicles, Vol. 1," Scorsese focuses not on the artist of today, but on the familiar origin story, doing a better job of putting his subject's into musical and historical context than anyone else ever has.

The documentary begins and ends with brilliantly visceral footage of the 1966 British tour in which the performances by Dylan and the musicians who would become The Band were greeted with derision by English fans who felt he had betrayed the legacy of folk pioneer Woody Guthrie by going electric.

But "Direction" allows Dylan to get his version of the story on the record — with the assistance of a master filmmaker — and to bring his illustrious past more completely alive in the present.

That's something that Dylan has proven to be very good at in the latter stages of his career. Dating to 1989's "Oh Mercy," in the last 16 years Dylan has released only three albums of new songs, including 1997's "Time Out of Mind" and 2001's "Love and Theft." All three were excellent, but you wouldn't think they would provide enough fresh material to sustain the rigorous tour schedule that Dylan maintains.

These days, Dylan is a pencil-mustached piano player whose Never Ending Tour attracts '60s survivors and jam-band converts. He starts a European jaunt in Stockholm, Sweden in October.

But in the postmodern, digital media age, he's hardly the only Dylan out there.

In "Direction," when hassled by dunderheaded journalists who ask questions like, "Why do you sing?" he fantasizes about escape: "I want to be a new Bob Dylan," he says.

Over the years, he's been plenty of them. Dylan, the Victoria's Secret panties pitchman has vied with Dylan, the poetic genius, ranked with Shakespeare in literary critic Christopher Ricks' "Dylan's Vision of Sin" (2004). And with Dylan, the eternal inspirer of young artists who've discovered the gold standard of embittered romantic songwriters.

They show up in force on "Listen to Bob Dylan" (two stars), the new double-disc tribute album on Drive Thru Records, that shows once again that — with exceptions such as Cerys Matthews' full-blooded reading of "I Believe in You" — Dylan interpreters rarely come close to matching the original, sneering vocals and all.

Those Dylans are joined, on "Live at the Gaslight 1962," by a fiercely determined folkie on the verge of big things. His first album had flopped. The follow-up, "The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan," was yet to be recorded, though two of its powerful songs, "A Hard Rain's A-Gonna Fall," and an as-yet unfinished "Don't Think Twice, It's All Right," are included.

The Bob Dylan who would change the world is only incipient, but it's a fascinating glimpse of a coffeehouse troubadour who was absorbing styles like "a sponge," as his friend Tony Glover puts it, already skilled at putting himself over with dramatic flair.

That Dylan reappears on the "No Direction Home" soundtrack, which opens with a 1959 home recording of a not-so-special original song "When I Got Troubles," in which the mild-voiced artist-in-the-making is feeling his way. The first disc builds to Dylan's acoustic triumph at the Newport Folk Festival in 1964, when songs such as his civil-rights anthem "Blowin' in the Wind" made it seem, in Dave Van Ronk's words, that "if there is an American collective unconscious — Bobby had somehow tapped into that."

The second "Direction" disc kicks into gear with the electric performance of "Maggie's Farm" that famously confused and alienated the faithful at Newport in 1965, and follows that with a selection of studio outtakes and live cuts that are riveting onscreen — and that always live up to Dylan's stated ambition to come across as a performer who "knows something that the audience doesn't." But it's less than essential for anyone who owns the originals.

There's also a companion tome called "The Bob Dylan Scrapbook, 1956-1966," which comes out Sept. 13 and contains rare photos, facsimiles of handwritten lyrics and a CD with excerpts from early interviews.

The Scorsese film, and all the data that swirl around it, paints a more vivid portrait of how Dylan willed himself into being than has previously existed. But be careful not to fall into the trap of thinking that it all represents a complete portrait of the "real" Bob Dylan.

Because as the past mixes with the present, Bob Dylan keeps on changin' all the time. As Dylan himself puts it to anyone fool enough to try to figure him out:

"An artist has to be careful to never think that he's arrived somewhere. He has to be in a constant state of becoming."

Two chances for a first win

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

After a tough 0-4 start, the Massachusetts field hockey team will look to bounce back this weekend in Burlington, Vt. where they will take on the Vermont Catamounts (1-3) tomorrow and Sacred Heart (0-5) on Sunday.

The fairly young Minutewomen have come up short in every game so far as a result of giving up goals in bunches.

"Results haven't gone our way and for some of that you need some luck, you need some balls bouncing the right way," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "They play really hard, they play real spirited, they play with a lot of energy and it's a fun team to watch so the results will come."

COURTESY EDWARD ATKINS
Sophomore midfielder Nicole Phelan and the rest of the Minutewomen will try avoiding an 0-6 start.

This weekend's opponents have struggled in the early goings of the season, as Vermont has dropped its last three games, and Sacred Heart has yet to win after five games.

Despite Vermont's record, it is an experienced team with exceptional goalkeeping and would be 2-2 if not for an overtime loss to Brown University in its last game. To get back on the right track against a tough Vermont team, UMass will have to prevent defensive lapses where multiple goals are scored in a short period of time, something that is almost impossible to overcome.

"It's the opening weekend for Vermont, and their new Astroturf facility, so they're going to come out firing," Shea said. "They're going to come out really aggressive and ready to play.

"They're a good team. They have a lot of experience in the goalkeeping area, so we're going to have to play one of our best games, and part of that is we need to know when to possess the ball and we need to know when to attack. I think if we can do that and pick our times to penetrate and get behind the defense, we'll have our opportunities; we'll just have to finish them.

"Vermont is a tough team. They're aggressive, they're quick and they play a little bit more of a [defensive] zone than anything else."

Another point of emphasis touched on by Shea for the weekend's games and for the season was to capitalize on scoring opportunities, which is something that UMass has struggled with. UMass has scored only four times out of a total 43 shots, a 9.3 percentage compared to its opponents' 20.7 percentage.

Vermont has struggled with scoring just as mightily as the Minutewomen with a 9.5 goal to shot percentage and is also surrendering a 33.4 shooting percentage to its opponents.

Despite their poor record, Sacred Heart actually has the best shooting percentage of the three teams at 14.3 percent. What has lead to the five losses are their goals against an average of nearly five, which is something that UMass will have to take advantage of on Sunday. UMass has given up three goals a game while only averaging one.

UMass will be looking to avoid dropping to 0-6 for the second season in a row and, according to head coach Patty Shea, it's the attention to details and small things that will get the Minutewomen on the right track.

son to go along with a very stellar .857 save percentage. Simmons also has a 1.50 goals against average, a much-welcomed number for a goalkeeper who is competing in his first collegiate matches.

"He has done a good job stepping in for us as Nick makes his recovery," Koch said.

There is no word yet as to when Billman will return to the field for the Maroon and White.

Other freshman contributors to the Minutemen this year have been Michael Donnelly, who has two goals, and Tony Bassett, whose first career goal came against Michigan and proved to be the winning score for UMass.

Just because Maine has begun the season without a win doesn't mean Koch is looking past the Black Bears. His scouting report says that they run a 4-3-3, are big in the backfield and have three good midfielders.

"They've got some guys that, if you're not careful, can beat you," Koch said. "What happened in 2002 [with UMass' last win against Maine] or last year doesn't matter."

After returning from Maine, the Maroon and White will travel to West Hartford, Conn. on Tuesday night to face Hartford under the lights at 7 p.m.

UM to meet Colgate

"We feel like we can run the football, and that is what we are going to try to do," Day said. "We'll go over the top like we do every game. They've got a good defense, but we feel that we can exploit them in a few different ways."

Wide receiver R.J. Cobbs caught two passes last week in his return to the offensive side of the ball, and he sees things the same way.

"They're going to try to stop Baylark, but we're going to do our best job to block and open up some holes for him," Cobbs said. "We're going to try to attack deep on their corners. We've just got to pound the ball with Baylark to open up deep with play action."

One area of concern for the Maroon and White will be its offensive line, which has lost both starting tackles - O.J. McBride and Colin Stoetzel - to injury. Still, the line hasn't allowed a sack in the team's last four games, including last week's victory at Richmond.

Against a blitzing defense like Colgate, the line will need to make adjustments, but Day is confident they will keep him protected.

"I haven't been sacked in awhile," Day said. "[Redshirt freshman Sean] Calicchio played great last week in his first time being a starter - They're led by Alex Miller up front who does a great job commanding everybody. We keep finding guys to step up, and that's what the name of the game is."

JAY KITLE | MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
UMass senior wide receiver R.J. Cobbs caught two passes in last week's 19-6 win over Richmond. Cobbs and the Minutemen will look to improve their record to 2-0 with a win over the Raiders tomorrow.

Minutemen set to renew rivalry

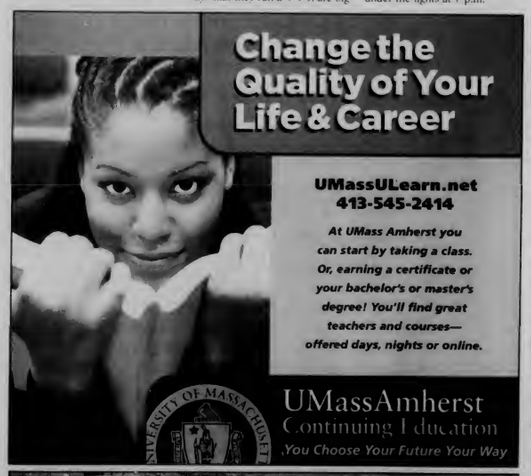
ry for both sides. Although the Minutemen earned some payback last September, beating Colgate 30-20 at McGuirk Stadium, the return to Andy Kerr Stadium carries a lot of baggage with it.

"I wasn't there, but I did feel the pain that they were feeling," UMass wideout R.J. Cobbs said. "I heard all the talk and the hype, and of course it was a playoff game. We knew we had a good team [in 2003], and we could have beat them."



By the numbers, the playoff loss against Colgate was overall statistically balanced in passing yards (UMass 199 yds., Colgate 209 yds.), total yards (UMass 299 yds., Colgate 262 yds.) and time of possession (UMass 29:21, Colgate 30:39).

Despite the general balance in numbers, the Minutemen were unsuccessful on three attempts when entering the red zone and lost three fumbles on the slippery ground, which proved to be fatal.

The offense was unable to put points on the board and the single score for UMass came from linebacker James Ihedigbo, when he returned a block punt for a touchdown.

Ihedigbo is one of ten current starters that played in that snow game, another being tailback Steve Baylark, who rushed for 95 yards on 20 carries. For the ones that did not play in 2003, motivation will differ from that of redemption.

"I am just going out with the mentality I have every week: just go out and play smart and make the right calls," Day said. "It might be motivation for everybody else, but it's not that big of a motivation [factor] for me."

the world would explode before one of those teams came out on top? Would the same thing happen if somehow Peyton Manning and Dan Marino got to play each other in the Super Bowl?

(12) Jacksonville Jaguars (9-7): Byron Leftwich is the real deal, and so is head coach Jack Del Rio, but it will once again be the same song for the Jags. If Fred Taylor doesn't stay healthy, they simply won't have enough talent to compensate for that.

(14) Houston Texans (7-9): Houston only won three games at home last year. Teams like the Texans, who are ready to make that leap from a bottom feeder to the NFL's hierarchy, need to win games at home.

(26) Tennessee Titans (4-12): Didn't someone say that Jeff Fisher was the most underrated coach in the league? It was probably the same person who said Steve McNair is the toughest player in the league.

AFC WEST

(3) Kansas City Chiefs (12-4): They have a pretty tough schedule, and that will hurt them in the playoffs by running into Indianapolis on the road again. The Chiefs may have been one Ty Law away from being serious Super Bowl contenders.

(8) San Diego Chargers* (9-7): The season that Drew Brees has could determine what direction this franchise moves in for the next eight or so years. Even though Marty Schottenheimer couldn't coach his way out of a wet cardboard box, he made the right call by keeping Brees as the starter last year. If the Chargers slip up in their first three games, they will be hard pressed to make another playoff run with the Patriots, Steelers, Raiders, Eagles, Chiefs and Jets waiting in Weeks 4-9.

(16) Denver Broncos (8-8): When they drafted Maurice Clarett, the football world thought Mike Shannahan knew what he was doing. Now, it is absolutely embarrassing to see a team like that waste a third-round draft pick on someone they cut. There is no excuse for a front office gaffe of that degree, and whoever made the final decision to draft the troubled, lazy delinquent with diminishing skills should be held accountable.

(20) Oakland Raiders (6-10): Any professional athlete who has appeared on the same television show as Ashton Kutcher - including, but not limited to Kutcher "punking(that professional athlete - should never be allowed to talk down to their teammates over alleged drug use. It appears after all these years of playing for such high quality, low-troubled organizations (Miami Hurricanes, Tampa Bay Buccaneers, Oakland Raiders) that Warren Sapp still doesn't get it. Well, neither do I.

NFC EAST

(2) Philadelphia Eagles (14-2): Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens, Donovan McNabb. Terrell Owens, Terrell Owens. If you haven't had enough yet, put on a sports network; any single one.

(18) Dallas Cowboys* (9-7): The cBoys have a pretty weak schedule, and Bill Parcells should still be competent enough to coach his team to nine wins. But seriously, Tuna, Drew Bledsoe?

(24) Washington Redskins (6-10): No matter what they do, it's fun to watch. Whether owner Dan Snyder signs another useless, old rag, or even if he hires someone like Joe Gibbs to take over the team, it's fun. It will be even more fun in a couple years to watch them fill out their roster with NFL minimum salaries to stay under the cap. Now that I think about it, is George W. Bush running this team?

(28) New York Giants (4-12): I think they'd be better off with Bobby Thomson calling the shots than Tom Coughlin, but that's neither here nor there.

NFC NORTH

(5) Minnesota Vikings (11-5): This team is exponentially better without the distraction of Randy Moss, but remember this: Mike Tice is still the head coach. Would you even want Tice coaching your Pop Warner team? He couldn't even scalp Super Bowl tickets the right way. So how, in any sense of anyone's imagination, will he even be able to earn them?

(22) Detroit Lions (8-8): It's been said over and over that Joey Harrington has been given all the weapons he needs to be a successful quarterback, and that is definitely true. Still, though, give him this year and next before giving him the boot - or worse - the team to Jeff Garcia.

(23) Green Bay Packers (7-9): It doesn't kill me that Brett Favre is struggling right now because I know he can still play. What bothers me is that the Green Bay Packers, a team he would never in a million years turn his back on, isn't giving him a supporting cast that would help him succeed.

(27) Chicago Bears (3-13): The Bears will win three games for one specific reason: they will play 16 teams that overlook them through the course of the season, so the odds are only in their favor. It says a lot about an organization that was counting on Rex Grossman to bring them back to their glory days of the 1980s, though. Still, his injury opened the door for Kyle Orton, who probably deserved the starting job this year anyway.

NFC SOUTH

(9) Atlanta Falcons (11-5): "If Michael Vick..." OK, you know where this is going. On a side note, the Week 1 Monday night match up with the Eagles in Atlanta is a hundred times more meaningful for the Falcons than the Eagles because a win will greatly affect the morale of this young Atlanta squad.

(13) Carolina Panthers* (10-6): They weren't deep enough to compensate for all of their injuries last year, and they won't be good enough to stop the main man at the Georgia Dome this year.

(17) New Orleans Saints (8-8): Someone before me once said the Saints are the best 8-8 team ever. Absolutely.

(25) Tampa Bay Buccaneers (5-11): Little offense, marginal defense and suspect coaching means five wins. But, hey, the Tampa Bay Lightning is back!

NFC WEST

(15) St. Louis Rams (10-6): They'll show flashes of being the Rams of a few years ago, when they could score 40 points a game, especially in this division. But they're still a poorly coached football team, and Marc Bulger still wakes up every morning thinking of new ways to turn the ball over.

(19) Seattle Seahawks (7-9): Shaun Alexander isn't happy, no one can catch the ball, the defense is talented but lazy and the coaching staff has been consistently losing its edge over the past several years. They're also a horrendous road team.

(30) Arizona Cardinals (4-12): How long has it been since there was this much hype surrounding a team that was quarterbacked by Kurt Warner? Put it this way: Before the Rams' Super Bowl season in 1999, coach Dick Vermeil cried on national television while naming Warner the starter after Trent Green went down with an injury.

(32) San Francisco 49ers (1-15): They are in the same place that the San Diego Chargers were in last year. They have a horrendous front office situation, and they just wasted their first pick of the draft. Things went on to work out well for the Chargers, but the 49ers will only win one game this year. Who knows where it will be or who it will be against, but they'll win a game. Most teams do.

Looking at a few NFL teams

Eric Athas

Take a look at a nearby calendar. It's not late January right now. It's not even early November. It is September, which means there are still 256 regular season games to be played and 20 weeks of NFL football on tap - don't get ahead of yourself. The Patriots have not won Super Bowl number four, LaDanian Tomlinson has not made the Pro Bowl and Ben Roethlisburger hasn't suffered the dreaded sophomore slump. Yet.

With predictions whirling through the air of which team will win and which player is a lantasy steal, it is easy to forget the fact that this season is up for grabs at the moment, which means any team can win. And yes, that does include the San Francisco 49ers, the Chicago Bears and the Cleveland Browns.

There is always that team that does something absurd and preposterous and makes the playoffs, despite what Dr. Z's forecast says. It is that team that people want to pick, but have neither the nerve nor the audacity to do so.

So there is no arguing that those types of teams are out there, lurking in the dark, laughing at preseason power rankings and repetitively watching the clip of Muhammad Ali blaring over Sonny Liston, "I shocked the world, I shocked the world!"

The Cincinnati Bengal's have pretty much been the butt of the NFL's jokes for over a decade. Since making the playoffs in 1991, the team has posted a miserable record of 68-138, sent only 16 players to the Pro Bowl and faltered with first round draft picks. But lately things have looked a little brighter for the team known for its unsightly carroty uniforms.

Since the hiring of new head coach Marvin Lewis, Cincinnati has put forth two 8-8 seasons and sent six players to Hawaii in February. And if there has been any year since 1991 that the Bengals looked like a team that can do something other than nab a top five draft pick, it is this year.

In 2003, the Dallas Cowboys and then new coach Bill Parcells surprised the league by going 10-6 and making the playoffs after a dismal 5-11 season. With the resume that Parcells has, a 6-10 record in 2004 made the Tuna mad. Two first round draft picks later, the Cowboys have a chance to return as contenders in the NFC East, despite being in the same division as the powerhouse Philadelphia Eagles.

If newly acquired quarterback Drew Bledsoe can come even close to what he did under Parcells in 1993-1996 (80 touchdowns 14,642 yards), this could be a match made in heaven. Dallas drafted heavy on defense this offseason, spending its two first round picks on defensive end's Demarcus Ware and Marcus Spears.

The new kids in town are still waiting for their chance to beat up the bully's that live around the corner. By the new kids, I mean the Houston Texans, which have existed for three years now. The bully's that I am referring to are the highly touted Indianapolis Colts, which lead the series 6-0. While this may not be the year that Texas wallops on the Colts, it certainly is time for the latest NFL franchise to begin to make a name for itself.

The Texans made an attempt to improve on the defensive side of the ball, drafting defensive tackle Travis Johnson and acquiring playmaking cornerback Phillip Buchanan from the Oakland Raiders. When everything is said and done, however, all eyes are on fourth year quarterback David Carr, who needs to have a stellar season.

If the Bengals, Cowboys and Texans all miss out on the playoffs in 2005 and end up being the number one, two and three draft picks in 2006 — so be it.

But since the leaves on the trees have not fallen, the temperature is still above 60 degrees and the standings are motionless, there is no telling what will happen and who will rise up.

Because we all know, that bombshell team is out there and will laugh when January rolls around.

UMass looks to floss Colgate

BY JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It doesn't take a long time to build up a college football rivalry. All it takes is for the right ingredients to be added at the right times, and two teams can transform from being polar opposites on different sides of the football spectrum to becoming a pair of programs that want nothing less than each other's blood.

The No. 15 Massachusetts football team (1-0 1-0 Atlantic 10) and Colgate (0-1) will renew their young rivalry tomorrow at noon in New York when they square off for the third time since Nov. 29, 2003, when the Raiders ended UMass' season in a snowstorm at Andy Kerr Stadium in Hamilton, N.Y.

Colgate beat the Minutemen 19-7 in the playoffs and went on to lose to Delaware in the national championship by a score of 40-0.

In the much anticipated rematch last year, then-No. 14 UMass swept aside the then-No. 4 Raiders 30-20 at McGuirk Stadium on Sept. 11.

The Minutemen are coming off a solid 19-6 win in Richmond last Thursday, and Colgate is looking to brush off its 24-22 last-second loss to the hands of Central Connecticut.

CCSU kicker Derek Pearson knocked home a 27-yard field goal as time expired after the Blue Devils began the final drive of the game on their own 20-yard line with just 27 seconds to play.

The loss snapped Colgate's 17-game home winning streak.

Colgate will have to make some serious adjustments against the extremely complicated UMass defense, as the Raiders turned the ball over seven times last week on their home turf.

Junior quarterback Mike Saraceno was making his first collegiate start for Colgate. He was 18-of-31 for 254 yards and a touchdown, but he tied a school record by tossing five interceptions. He also lost a fumble.

The Raiders will have their work cut out for them on the defensive side of the ball, too, after being lit up by UMass quarterback Tim Day, who was 13-of-21 for 258 yards and two scores.

Tailback Steve Baylark ran the ball 18 times for 115 yards, and he scored the first two touchdowns of the game on runs of 32 yards and 13 yards respectively.

The Minutemen are confident that they can utilize the same game plan with the same level of success tomorrow.

Team will use 2003 contest as motivation

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Scars may heal, but they always leave some type of mark. For the Massachusetts football team, the scar left behind on Nov. 29, 2003 was the result of a deep penetrating wound, when the Minutemen were ousted out of the first round of the NCAA playoffs by Colgate. The setting was one that could have been taken from a Hollywood film.

Gusts of wind and falling snow overtook Andy Kerr Stadium as the Minutemen fell to the Red Raiders on an ice-coated field.

Over a year later, UMass will approach that very field, the first time since the playoff decision. The climate will be warmer and it will not be snowing, but with the loss in 2003 in the back of their minds, the team will look to take advantage of the opportunity for redemption.

"It means a lot to the guys who were on that trip. Losing the chance to be in the national championship hurts," quarterback Tim Day said. "They said a few things in the newspapers that really got us angry. A lot of guys are using that as motivation, not myself, but we're fired up and ready to go out there."

As the Maroon and White prepare to take on Colgate for the third time in less than two years, this match up has turned into somewhat of a rival

UM to take on Maine

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team's (1-1) season kicks into full throttle tomorrow as the Minutemen make the trek up to Orono, Maine to face the Black Bears (0-3).

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Oral Bullen has picked up where he left off last year by already scoring twice.

The all-time series between the two schools is in the Minutemen's favor as they lead 25-12-1. However, they have not beaten Maine since 2002.

Last year's match was a 3-1 victory for Maine. The lone goal for UMass was scored by now-junior Michael Donnelly. Sophomore Jimmy Velas scored twice for Maine.

UMass enters the contest fresh off its trip out to East Lansing, Mich., where it participated in the Michigan State Fall Classic. There, the Minutemen fell to Michigan State 2-1 but were able to beat then-undefeated Michigan 3-1.

"We're very pleased to begin the season 1-1," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

On the other side, the Black Bears are coming off three straight losses to very good teams. In those three games, they have been outscored by a total of 9-1.

Maine's first loss was suffered at the hands of Providence, being shut out 4-0 down in Kingston, R.I. on Sept. 2.

It didn't get any easier for the Black Bears after that. They next faced one of the elite soccer programs in the nation in Alabama-Birmingham. Maine fell in that game by a count of 3-1.

Their latest debacle was this past Wednesday when they fell to Northeastern, once again being shut out, 2-0.

"They're off to a tough start," Koch said. "But they have played very difficult opponents, and they aren't as bad as their record shows."

Pacing the Minutemen, as usual, is senior captain Oral Bullen. So far this season in two games, Bullen leads the team with three points with one goal and one assist. However, he isn't the only member of the Maroon and White who has been contributing early.

According to Koch, the newcomers on the team have also played well in the early going.

"All of the freshmen have stepped up," Koch said. "[Freshman] Zach Simmons has been one very positive [addition]."

This season, Simmons has filled in for injured junior Nick Billman, who separated his shoulder over the summer. In the games against Michigan State and Michigan, Simmons has done a good job of holding down the fort for UMass.

Simmons has made 18 saves this season and skill. Penn State is one of the top two teams in the country and they played them to a 2-1 loss."

Minutewomen look to continue winning ways

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Having taken care of business at home early in the season, it's time for the Massachusetts women's soccer team to take its show on the road.

The Minutewomen (2-1), who sport a perfect 2-0 record at Rudd Field, will play their next three games on the road. The three-game road trip kicks off this weekend with a pair of games in Storrs, Conn. The Maroon and White play Connecticut tonight at 7 p.m. and will take on St. John's on Sunday at 11:30 a.m. as part of the Connecticut Tournament.

The 2-1 start for UMass is a marked improvement over last year's 0-5 start, but this weekend will be a solid indicator of how far the team has come. Of the first three games, the game coach Jim Rudy considered the team's biggest test to be at Boston University. That game resulted in the only blemish on the Minutewomen's record, as they fell 2-1.

Rudy is excited that his team will have another opportunity to measure its ability against quality opponents.

"We'll get a lot of info this weekend, be it good, bad or ugly," Rudy said. "We'll find out who we are at this level. The point of these games is to get tested. If we want to get back to the heyday [of this program], we have to strengthen the schedule."

And if Rudy is looking for tough competition from a top team, UConn will certainly provide that tonight.

The Huskies were ranked No. 9 in the Soccer America Preseason Poll, and have played better than their 2-2 record indicates. UConn has played a very difficult early season schedule, participating in tournaments at Penn State and Notre Dame. One of UConn's losses came against the No. 4 team in the country Penn State.

Patriots will reign supreme in 2005

Jeff Howe

Originally, I was planning on holding out, but I got a phone call from the San Francisco 49ers public relations department advising against it.

Apparently, holding out is too cliche these days, and if anyone knows how to protect someone's image, it's definitely the PR guys in San Fran.

So I'll break that mold and stick around, honoring my contract.

It's NFL time again. It's time for predictions, and fantasy teams, and hours upon hours of new shows on NFL Network and everything else that comes along with professional football like the Patriots winning championships, the Seahawks dropping passes, the Saints underachieving and Ricky Williams failing drug tests.

Peyton Manning will continue to throw touchdown passes against horrendous defenses, and Chris Berman will praise him every single Sunday for it.

Everyone talks about his record-breaking season last year, and maybe they should.

But everyone is leaving something out.

Good ol' reliable "Playoff" Peyton played nine of his 16 games last year against teams that were ranked 25th or worse in terms of passing touchdowns allowed.

In case you've forgotten, there are only 32 teams in the league.

In those nine games, he threw 35 touchdowns, an average of 3.9 air strikes per game. In the other seven contests, he only tossed 14 touchdowns, an average of two a game.

So that means his touchdown production is cut in half when his supercharged Colts play a defense that fields players who have some level of defensive competence.

Wait, it gets better.

He played four games against the three worst defenses in the same category (Green Bay, Kansas City and twice against Houston), and he picked apart those porous secondaries for 17 touchdowns, an average of 4.3 per game.

I guess that what I'm getting at is Manning's record should carry an asterisk with it. If he wants, he can borrow one of Rafael Palmeiro's.

Alright, enough banter. The teams are in order of how they will finish in their respective divisions. The number inside the parentheses denotes the team's NFL power ranking, and an asterisk denotes a wild card team.

AFC EAST

(1) New England Patriots (13-3): The three losses happen toward the end of the game because Bill Belichick will muff calling a few plays. Other than that, they look poised for three in a row.

(7) New York Jets (9-7): Last I checked, this team was much more than one Ty Law away from beating the Patriots. And as long as Chad Pennington is under center, this team will continue to fall shy of winning a Super Bowl.

(21) Buffalo Bills (5-11): Willis McGahee is a great talent, and he should have a very solid career in the NFL, but as long as J.P. Losman is the quarterback, opposing defenses will stack the line against the Bills to make the rookie quarterback beat them. He won't, but their defense will win them five games this year.

(29) Miami Dolphins (4-12): They won't do anything this year, and they might not do a whole lot next year. But new coach Nick Saban is going to be a Miami legend in a few years. He could have even coached Dan Marino to a Super Bowl win.

AFC NORTH

(6) Baltimore Ravens (10-6): If you were starting a football team and had to pick one person to be your quarterback, would you rather have Kyle Boller or Ed Reed? I'm joking, but the more I think about it, Ed Reed almost makes sense.

(10) Pittsburgh Steelers* (10-6): Ben Roethlisberger won't have the sophomore slump everyone thinks he will, but losing Plaxico Burress and not having a healthy group of running backs behind him will cause him to struggle.

(11) Cincinnati Bengals (9-7): I almost think this team could win the division, but Carson Palmer will struggle just enough against the complex defenses waiting for him in Pittsburgh and Baltimore. Palmer and Roethlisberger will make this an extremely exciting division for a long, long time.

(31) Cleveland Browns (2-14): Matt Leinart better have some fun at USC this year because he will be in Cleveland or San Francisco next year. Groupies across the country will move straight to Cleveland if he winds up there with LeBron James, though.

AFC SOUTH

(4) Indianapolis Colts (13-3): Remember two years ago when the Red Sox and Cubs looked like they were going to face each other in the World

More than a Ph.D. needed

BY ASHISH K. SAHU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The first "A Ph.D. is Not Enough!" (APINE) event was held last May and received a terrific response from faculty and graduate students alike. As a result of the enthusiasm and the encouragement of the Vice Provost of Research and Graduate Dean, APINE will be held again this coming Sept. 20 at the Campus Center.

The event seeks to allay the notion that a Ph.D. alone is sufficient to an education.

"While research skills are critical to becoming a great scientist, it takes more than that. We are planning 'A Ph.D. Is Not Enough!' to help students transition, both from undergraduate to graduate school and then from graduate school to a career," said Elizabeth Glogowski, a student from Polymer Science and Engineering. Both workshops will include panel discussions, followed by a faculty-student dinner. The event is free, but registration is required online at apine-event.org.

Almaris Alonso, a microbiology graduate student, attended last May's event and says she will attend again this September. "It's a great event to learn tips for succeeding in graduate school and to provide mentoring to students based on my experiences in graduate school, but I also hope to increase my knowledge on how to succeed after completing the Ph.D."

"When I first came to graduate school I felt completely lost. There were so many things I didn't know and I didn't know where to get answers," says Iris Price, a Neuroscience and Behavior graduate student. "I wish I had known about the Graduate Student Organization (GSO) and the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) when I first came to graduate school. I would have been more involved in graduate student activities and would have had a better sense of community."

Crowd remembers victims at Amherst vigil

BY HANNAH DRAKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

60 people assembled last night in Amherst's town center to honor the victims and survivors of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, as well as those affected by Hurricane Katrina.

Young and old lit candles and brought flags. Speakers stood next to two 15 million candlewatt spotlights, and a special display created by Kevin Joy, the chair of the Remember 9/11 Committee.

"I worked in the FBI for ten years in counter-terrorism. As part of the job I was a forensic artist," said Joy.

Joy's replica of the twin towers was cluttered with bronzed shoes of all styles and sizes.

"The shoes are a very powerful symbol-nobody's wearing them. [The mess] represents chaos," said Joy.

Joy, who knew people in the Pentagon and the World Trade Center, made the sculpture from recycled materials.

When the first plane hit, Joy was picking up his daughter from daycare. He said that the daycare workers asked if this was really happening.

"In my own mind, [due to experience] I knew what was going on. Then the second plane hit," Joy said.

Joy talks often with his FBI friends, who are still working diligent long hours.

"For six to eight months [after 9/11], they worked long hours with no days off, and a lot of overtime," he added.

"People remember 9/11 in the same way that people remember John F. Kennedy. Everyone knows where they were when they found out," said Joy.

The candles were lit at about 7:35 pm, to a bagpipe performance by local call force firefighter Ryan Willey.

The first speaker at the event was Hampshire Register of Probate David Sullivan.

"Today we solemnly remember the victims of September 11th, 2001 and Hurricane Katrina," Sullivan said.

"We remember the places where the national tragedy of 9/11 happened: a farm field in Pennsylvania, our military center at the Pentagon in Virginia, our pinnacles of freedom at the twin world trade towers in Manhattan. We remember the place we first heard the fateful news of 9/11. Whether it was in our office, in our car, in our classroom, or in our homes, this moment in time is frozen in our collective conscience," said Sullivan.

"Most importantly, we must remember the lost lives of 9/11. We must never forget the honor, courage, and commitment of all the first responders who laid down their lives to help fellow citizens. The firefighters, the police, the EMTs, the soldiers of the Pentagon," Sullivan added.

"It is important to remember 9/11 as a human tragedy, to honor today a real life lost. Not a government statistic, but a life just like yours and mine. A life with friends and family, loves and hopes, dreams and disappointments. A life that should have been lived to the fullest," Sullivan said.

Next, a hurricane survivor from Mississippi took the podium with her daughter.

"We were told that we were not in a flood zone, but they were wrong," she said.

"It was terrifying to see the Gulf Coast approach my house," she added.

Following her, State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D, Amherst) spoke.

"There will always be people who want to impose their will with different ways of communicating that express their thoughts with violence as opposed to the way civilized human beings would try to resolve their problems," Rosenburg said.

A memorial dedicated to the victims of September 11th is lit up at the joint vigil for victims and survivors of Sept. 11th and Hurricane Katrina.

Alpha Delta Phi housing permit not renewed

BY MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Alpha Delta Phi fraternity at the University of Massachusetts, known to students by the Homer Simpson painting hanging out front, will soon be losing its housing license.

Complaints from neighbors, numerous fire code violations and a number of police visits to the fraternity led the Amherst Zoning Board of Appeals to vote 3-0 on a proposal to revoke the special housing license in a meeting on Wednesday, Sept. 7.

The fraternity house, located at 382 North Pleasant St., has been visited 51 times by the Amherst Fire Department in the last two-and-a-half years. During a fire inspection last year, the department found several fire violations. Later in the year, it was found that a basement fire detector no longer worked after being wet by a leaking washing machine.

Noise complaints, liquor violations, fights and larceny brought the police to the fraternity 19 times during that same amount of time. Neighbors have also complained about the amount of noise, the parking problems and the overflowing garbage that they say the fraternity brothers are responsible for.

The owner of the Alpha Delta Phi property, David Biddle, claims that UMass and the town of Amherst are prejudiced against fraternities. Biddle says that no serious incidents have occurred at the fraternity and that it is not overcrowded like other UMass frats. He also says that he will appeal the zoning board's decision.

Biddle hopes this will allow the 10 brothers who currently live in the house to remain until May before being evicted. Next year, Biddle says he plans to turn the house into a duplex for family housing.

If the appeal to keep the house open until May does not go through, the brothers living in the house will be forced to find alternate housing since the dorms are already filled beyond capacity.

Zoning board member, Ted Rising, disagrees with Biddle's assessment that the town is simply against fraternities, calling Alpha Delta Phi a "drain" on town resources.

"There's no reason to believe it's going to operate successfully, because it hasn't in the past," Rising said.

The fraternity, though set to lose its house at some point, will still remain a Registered Student Organization of UMass unless the University decides to suspend it for a period of time.

This is just the latest in a series of problems for UMass fraternities and sororities over the past year. The Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity house was closed temporarily in April due to fire

New lectures provide forum for graduates

BY PRATFETI BALLAL AND LAN DONG
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

The Organization of Graduate Students in Comparative Literature (OGSCL) at the University of Massachusetts is presenting a new faculty lecture series this fall. There are several new faculty members at the university, and the series provides a forum for graduate students to learn from their current and stimulating research.

Speakers will include practical advice for graduate students in their lectures. Since many new faculty members have recently gone through the process of finishing dissertations and going on the job market, hearing about their experiences should be valuable.

The aims of the series are to foster dialogue across disciplinary boundaries and to enrich graduate interdisciplinary work through exposure to scholarship within and outside of one's field. The organizers also wish to present the academic resources available to graduate students at UMass and to forge new connections between faculty and graduate students.

The lectures will be on alternate Thursdays at 4:15 p.m. in 301 Herter Hall. The schedule is as follows:

New tragedy diverts attention from 9/11

BY KATHERINE BISANZ
THE DAILY IOWAN (U. IOWA)

IOWA CITY, Iowa – As the anniversary of a horrific terrorist attack that killed thousands approaches, much of the nation's attention has now been diverted to the tragedy that shook the Gulf Coast and left a thriving metropolis underwater.

And the focus shift shows — few area officials have organized plans to commemorate 9/11, officials said on Thursday.

For instance, Iowa City Fire Marshal Roger Jensen said he is not aware of any plans on a state or national level to formally recognize the 2001 attacks in Iowa City, Iowa, on Sept. 11.

"Our nation's attention has turned to another tragedy on the Gulf Coast," Jensen said.

Officials from other area organizations, such as four Johnson County branches of the American Legion, the Iowa City police, and University of Iowa Events Services said they have no plans to officially honor the day.

Despite the limited options to commemorate 9/11 this year, a poll released Thursday by Zogby International and the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation shows that a majority of Americans still think about the events of Sept. 11, 2001 on a regular basis.

The poll, which is the first comprehensive national survey to gauge the lasting effect of 9/11, shows that seven out of 10 people still think about the terrorist attacks at least once a week.

Three-quarters of Americans said they are still "emotionally affected" by the trauma induced by the memories of the attacks, according to the poll.

Area news in brief

Alligator found at party

AMHERST — Upon receiving a report of a large party Friday, Amherst police discovered an illegal alligator on the premesis.

Police were called to a Sunset Ave. apartment at 4:05 a.m. The caller stated that people had been throwing glass bottles at each other.

As soon as police arrived, individuals reportedly ran into the apartment. Officers then entered the apartment to find a medium-seized alligator living in a fish tank. The alligator was a few feet long.

The resident allegedly told police he was keeping the alligator for a friend and that it was not his.

Police advised the resident that an animal control officer would speak to him in the near future.

Unlicensed kegs seized by police

AMHERST — Police seized two unlicensed kegs of beer early Friday morning while responding to reports of a loud party.

Shortly after the seven officers arrived at 12:37 a.m. to the Sunset Court residence, it took them 20 minutes to clear the party.

Police estimate 300 to 400 people were inside and outside the residence.

The residents were fined $400 for having two unlicensed kegs.

Route 9 construction is on schedule

HADLEY — Construction just before the Coolidge Bridge on Route 9 could be finished later, rather than sooner.

However, the District 2 Chief of the Highway Department, Albert Stegemann told the town Select Board Wednesday that the $4 million project is going along as scheduled.

The plan is to widen the stretch of Route 9, from the Coolidge Bridge to West St., from two lanes to four.

Stegemann says the majority of the water line and drainage work on the road has been done. But with several utility crews working to help residents on the Gulf Coast recover from Hurricane Katrina, work at home could be slowed down.

As part of the construction, cable, power and phone lines need to be relocated.

Support for gay marriage amendment crumbles

By Steve LeBlanc and Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON — A fragile coalition of lawmakers cobbled together to support an anti-gay marriage amendment last year has collapsed, virtually guaranteeing same-sex marriage will remain legal in Massachusetts, at least for now.

A poll of lawmakers conducted by The Associated Press has found at least 104 who planned to vote against the amendment when it comes up for a second vote on Wednesday. That's enough to defeat the measure, which would also create civil unions.

Last year, months after the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that same-sex marriage was legal under the state constitution, the measure passed by a 105-92 margin. To get on next year's state ballot, the amendment needs the support of a majority _ at least 101 _ of the state's 200 lawmakers in the second round of voting.

Opposition to the measure is likely even deeper than the survey indicates.

Several lawmakers who voted against the proposal last year could not be reached for comment. Others who have voiced strong opposition to the amendment in the past declined to respond to the survey.

The AP attempted to reach all 200 lawmakers with at least two phone calls between Sept. 6-9. Of those reached, 104 said they would vote against the proposal, 19 said they would support it, and 3 said they were undecided.

The reasons for the collapse are many, rooted in the language of the amendment, which seeks to broker a compromise between foes of same sex marriage and supporters of gay rights by outlawing gay marriage but enshrining civil unions.

The compromise ultimately had an opposite effect, alienating foes of gay marriage by creating civil unions and offending gay rights supporters by banning gay marriage.

Perhaps the best indication that support for the amendment _which was already eroding_ is in free fall are the number of lawmakers abandoning their support of the measure.

More than a dozen lawmakers who voted for it the first time around said they will switch their votes this week, either because they fully support gay marriage or oppose civil unions.

Others simply said that after more than a year of watching gay couples marry with no ill effect on society, they see no need to rescind the right.

Rep. Anne M. Gobi, D-Spencer, had a change of heart after seeing how the opportunity to marry has changed the lives of so many couples. She said she could not support the compromise amendment, as she did last year.

"I haven't talked to any married heterosexual couples that have felt threatened by same-sex marriages," she said. "When you look at the world situation and all the terrible things that are happening, there's a lot worse things .. than allowing two people who love each other to be together."

Rep. James Brendan Leary, D-Worcester, said he didn't want to use the state constitution to take away rights rather than create new ones.

"It's a dangerous precedent to take away rights that have been granted by the court for an identifiable group of people," he said. "It's not simply a policy issue. It's a question of how we use our constitution."

Many foes of gay marriage, who supported the amendment in the hopes of preventing gay marriages from happening, are drawn to a second, much stricter alternative amendment that would ban gay marriage without granting civil unions.

The earliest that proposal, which cleared a key hurdle last week when it was certified by Attorney General Thomas Reilly, could go before voters is 2008.

"We are going back to the beginning and defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman," said Rep. Philip Travis, D-Rehoboth, who voted for the compromise amendment last year, but now plans to vote against it.

Supporters of that amendment must still collect the signatures of 65,825 registered voters, and win approval for it in two sittings of the Legislature. But because the amendment begins with citizens, only a quarter of lawmakers a much lower threshold must vote for it.

Gay marriage opponents said they reluctantly voted for last year's compromise and welcome the chance to vote for a simple ban.

"I was not a supporter of gay marriage. The (compromise) amendment was the only amendment at that time, because all the other amendments were defeated," said Rep. Paul J. Donato of Medford, who said he would support the new proposal.

Former Boston Mayor Ray Flynn, a gay marriage opponent, said the new proposal is superior because it enshrines marriage between a man and a woman, which he said is best for children. But he added the measure would ensure rights for non-married couples, such as inheritance or hospital visitation rights. It's worth the wait to vote on it, he said.

"I'd rather get it right than discriminate or hurt anybody," he said. "I think that it strikes that fair balance."

Some lawmakers who have supported gay marriage in the past declined to respond to the survey, saying they believed the vote was still too narrow.

Rep. Byron Rushing, D-Boston, a vocal backer of same-sex marriage whose district includes Boston's heavily gay South End, declined to say if he would again vote against the gay marriage ban.

"Not on this issue," he said, when asked how he would vote. "It's too close."

John Lewis and his partner Stuart Gaffney hug inside a San Francisco superior court after a ruling the ban on gay marriage to be unconstitutional. Support for the ban on gay marriage in Massachusetts is also dwindling.

Body art may jeopardize future career

By Joshua Haun
Iowa State Daily

AMES, Iowa — Piercing and tattooing, once viewed as the rebellious territory of rock bands and bikers, has become increasingly mainstream as of late. It takes only one visit to Petersen Pits on a sunny afternoon to see many students have embraced the trend of body modification.

After students pierce eyebrows and fill ink in the lower back space, however, they may be in for a surprise when they apply for jobs sporting faces full of metal or skin covered in ink, says Steven Kravinsky, director of career placement for the Iowa State's College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

"I think people with visible tattoos and piercing will have a harder time," Kravinsky says.

Although there may be consequences down the road, body art remains popular among college students, particularly freshmen who are experiencing freedom for the first time, says Miranda Myhre, receptionist at The Asylum tattoo and body piercing shop, 111 Welch Ave.

"It's mostly girls, lots of freshmen," says Myhre, sophomore in graphic design. "For the most part it's when school starts, everyone's away from home and everyone has to put a hole in themselves."

Kravinsky says even though piercing and tattoos have become commonplace, many companies that deal with the public still have a very conservative view of how their employees should look.

"The organization is sensitive to how they are perceived and impact the community," Kravinsky says. "You represent that organization every hour of your life, even if you don't want to."

Pointing to fields such as art and fashion, Kravinsky says extensive tattoos and piercing might not always be a disadvantage to college students, but they should consider what field they are interested in before making a decision to have anything done.

"There are some professions where it might be an advantage to look edgy, but if you're working for a major retail agency, it's probably not the best thing to do."

Iowa State alumnus Ken Slaba had extensive tattooing and piercing when he began looking for a post-college career, but says he made a conscious decision to get the work done in places that are easy to conceal.

"I kind of specifically made a point of not getting anything you can't hide with jeans and a T-shirt," Slaba says.

Slaba, who now works full time at Seven Oaks Recreation in Boone, says he hasn't had any problems finding work despite his body modifications.

"I've applied for jobs and not gotten them before, but I don't think it had anything to do with that."

Kravinsky says he agrees that getting tattoo and piercing work done in places that are easily covered is a good strategy for people who enjoy body modification but still want to be accepted in the professional world.

"Understand the common sense of private versus public body art," Kravinsky says. "Your body can be your canvas as long as it's on parts of your body that no one can see."

Another suggestion Kravinsky makes is to wait until after you are employed and see what the company's policies and attitudes toward body art are before getting any extensive work done.

"Once you start a job, you can look around and see what the standards and values of the organization are."

Kravinsky says college students would be wise to remove or cover any visible body art before taking an interview with companies whose policies toward body art might be of a conservative nature.

"If you feel comfortable taking your piercings out, I suggest you do it," he says.

Slaba, who has both ears pierced, says he stopped wearing his jewelry of his own accord after gaining employment with Seven Oaks, not to meet any expectations or policies of his employers.

Stephen Mackay who had his tounge split about five years ago could be jeopardizing his future career goals with his body modifications. Studies say those with body art are less likely to be hired.

Rebuilding New Orleans is vital to the U.S. economy

By Matt Cresson
Daily Collegian Editor

NEW ORLEANS – New Orleans will be rebuilt. Period.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert may insist that it makes no sense to spend billions of dollars to rebuild a city sixty feet under sea level. Fifty-four percent of Americans may say that the flooded parts of the city should be moved to safety, according to an AP-Ipsos poll. Forget about it.

History, geography and especially economics make it inevitable that New Orleans will be rebuilt - almost certainly with more substantial flood protection, of course. The Big Easy is, always has been and probably always will be a vital port.

"We cannot live without it," said Ari Kelman, a historian at the University of California, Davis, and the author of "A River and its City: The Nature of Landscape in New Orleans."

The Port of South Louisiana is what makes it possible for farmers in Iowa to sell corn to customers in China. It gets steel to Midwestern automakers and coffee to wholesalers all over the country. And thanks to the unique history and culture that 300 years of maritime trade have spawned, the city of New Orleans now has a singular place in the American tourism business as well.

New Orleans lies at the outlet of a 15,000-mile river transportation net work that stretches from the Rockies to the Alleghenies. That's why French settlers located it there in the first place - enduring floods, disease and sweltering heat in exchange for economic and military control over the interior of North America.

"New Orleans is a surprising evidence of what men will endure, when cheered by the hopes of an ever-flowing tide of all-mights dollars and cents," an English visitor declared in 1857.

A little more than a century later, geographer Pierce Lewis summed up New Orleans as "an inevitable city on an impossible site."

Every year, about 50 percent of the corn and one-third of the soybeans exported by the United States float down the Mississippi River and its tributaries on barges.

They move far more cheaply that way than they would by road or rail, said commodities trader J. Stephen Lucas, president of Jayhawker Consulting Co.

"You can ship corn out of Iowa on rail cars," Lucas said. "That costs more money for transportation, and that means a lower price for the farmer."

You can't sail a barge to China, so those river vessels have to stop at docks in and around New Orleans to have their cargo transferred to ocean-going ships.

Similarly, ships coming from all over the world have to stop in the New Orleans area to offload their products - some onto barges, others onto rail cars or trucks. Altogether, the docks in and around New Orleans handle more than 100 million tons of cargo annually, making it the world's third-busiest port by volume.

The New Orleans area also plays a role in the energy industry, thanks to its proximity to offshore oil and natural gas fields in the Gulf of Mexico. Although most corporations use nearby Houston as a headquarters rather than New Orleans, they still rely on Port Fourchon, about 60 miles south of the city, to ferry equipment and workers out to the rigs. A significant fraction of the nation's oil imports come in through the region. And Louisiana refineries account for about 15 percent of the nation's gasoline refining capacity.

It would not be possible to operate all this industrial infrastructure without a lot of people nearby. According to the Port of New Orleans, there are 60,000 people directly employed in maritime shipping in Louisiana, and 107,000 people whose jobs depend on the industry.

Those people, in turn, need groceries and clothing. They need banks and gas stations and appliance stores.

Andrew and Matt Barrett try and dig out their car from the dried mud and wreckage left by Hurricane Katrina.

Their children need schools to attend.

They need New Orleans.

Some economists have predicted that many of the lawyers, accountants and other professionals who have been forced to retreat to Baton Rouge, 50 miles upriver, will stay there even after New Orleans is rebuilt.

But the French Quarter isn't going anywhere. Tourism is a major business in New Orleans, thanks to the city's rich history, unique culture and reputation for naughty good times. With the Quarter and other popular destinations relatively undamaged by the flooding of lower-lying parts of New Orleans, the city still has plenty of appeal.

"I guarantee you that it would cost many times more to abandon the city than to rebuild it," said Laurence Geller, president and CEO of Strategic Hotel Capital.

The company owns the Hyatt Regency New Orleans. The building suffered major damage during the hurricane, but it is well worth repairing, Geller said – as is the rest of New Orleans.

"I really am an optimist for the future of this city," Geller said.

Tourism brings $10 billion to New Orleans annually and accounts for about 15 percent of the city's jobs. Because those jobs tend to be relatively low-paying, they are held mostly by the poor minority residents of New Orleans who were disproportionately harmed by Hurricane Katrina.

Some commentators have suggested that some of the poorest residents of the Big Easy will never come back. With no homes or other possessions to connect them to New Orleans, the theory goes, they will simply stay wherever Katrina and the Red Cross blew them.

But for better or worse, the tourism industry in New Orleans needs the poor and will probably draw some of them back. That means the city's low-income housing, largely destroyed by the post-Katrina flood, is likely to be rebuilt.

"The obvious question to ask is, who is going to rebuild it?" Kelman said.

With so many opportunities to redevelop wealthier areas, developers will probably have very little interest in building low-income housing in places like the Ninth Ward, which is one of the nation's poorest urban neighborhoods. The federal government has been trying for decades to get out of the landlord business.

Bundling leads to higher textbook prices

By Joseph Serna
Daily Bruin Senior Staff Writer (UC Santa Cruz)

LONG BEACH, Calif. – College textbooks prices have increased at twice the rate of inflation over the last two decades according to the United States Government Accountability Office.

The report, which comes on the heels of a widely publicized report by the State Public Interest Research Groups, focuses on possible reasons for the rapid increase in the cost of textbooks.

"[Publishers] are fleecing students that just want to learn," said Sarah Stein, a field organizer for California Student Public Interest Group (calPIRG).

According to the GAO report, the increase in textbook costs can best be explained by publishers' recent trend towards "bundling," or combining other course materials such as CDs and workbooks related to the same topic as the textbook.

The Association of American Publishers asserts they bundle only to meet the needs of professors and a diverse student population.

"The publishers response has been to work with educators to produce new tools that faculty use to tailor their materials for their students," said Patricia Schroeder, AAP's president and CEO.

Although publishers may offer many textbooks unbundled, Stein said some publishers withhold that fact from professors when they give out catalogs offering course materials for the coming semesters.

In other instances, publishers do not offer textbooks unbundled, forcing professors to buy possibly unnecessary materials, which end up costing the students more money.

"It's not nice, but it is legal," Stein said.

Another issue costing students more in the long run is publishers' habit of printing a new edition of a textbook every two or three years, which limits books the school can buy back.

"It's the fact that they give you nothing when you spend so much," Sal Torres, a financing student said. "Calculus hasn't changed in how long?" Stein joked.

PIRG recently compared the 4th and 5th editions of "Calculus: Early Trans-cendentals," an introductory textbook for calculus students, and found only minimal changes, nothing that could not be added as a supplement instead of a new edition, according to PIRG.

Coffee may have health benefits

By Christina Tkacik
Contributing Daily (U. Virginia)

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. – Is a cup of coffee the nation's No. 1 source of cancer prevention?

According to a study by University of Scranton Chemistry Prof. Joe Vinson, coffee is the No. 1 source of antioxidants – cancer-fighting enzymes – in American diets. Vinson and his research team, who have previously done studies on chocolate's benefits, analyzed the antioxidant content of various foods commonly consumed in the average American diet based on data from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Dates, red grapes, pomegranates and other fruits are richer than coffee in antioxidants, in addition to providing fiber and other nutrients, but Americans do not eat much fruit in comparison, according to Vinson.

"We drink more coffee by weight than we do fruit and a little less than vegetables – a staggering indictment of our diet in my opinion – although I do drink one cup of coffee for its caffeine effect," Vinson wrote in an e-mail.

Vinson's findings came as no surprise to first-year College student Allison Harbin, who, sitting outside Newcomb Hall with an empty Greenberry's cup yesterday, said, "I couldn't wake up this morning. I felt incomplete until I had my first cup."

She added, "I'm definitely addicted to coffee, but there are worse things to be addicted to."

University Cancer Center dietician Carole Havrila, a self-described regular coffee drinker, said studies on coffee's benefits have come out in the past.

"A lot of people think that coffee should be eliminated [from one's diet] because caffeine has a diuretic effect," she said. "People are always trying to prove that coffee causes cancer, but most studies show that moderate consumption – one or two cups a day – can actually be beneficial."

Vinson advised that other sources of antioxidants may be better for one's health than coffee.

"Get a lot of plant foods in your diet: veggies and fruits, grains, nuts, spices," Vinson said. "Non-fruit beverages have their pluses and minuses for health, except for tea."

How good coffee is for the body depends on how the body absorbs its nutrients, a process that remains to be studied.

9/11 victims remembered

Rosenburg also spoke about the Hurricane survivors, and the frustration they expressed to him that a world superpower was unable to be prepared and mitigate the pain and tragedy more quickly.

"There is still a lot of work to be done. Each of us has to do what we can, in our community, in our country, and in the world," Rosenburg concluded.

State Representative Ellen Story (D, Amherst) reminded listeners that although there is an obvious need created in the aftermath of a tragedy such as 9/11 or Hurricane Katrina, there are needy people in other parts of the country, in Massachusetts, and in Amherst.

"While the Governor was welcoming evacuees to Otis Air Force Base, police were sweeping away the homeless who lived under a bridge of Charles River. We express welcome to some, but not others," Story said.

Co-chairman of the event Larry Kelley concluded the vigil before opening it up to participants who wished to come to the microphone and publicly remember their loved ones.

"The critics say that a bunch of candles doesn't do much, but symbols are important. It sends a message that we're all in this together," Kelley said.

"Thirty years from now, I hope to take this podium and say that 9/11 was still the worst attack we've had."

Parallels recognized between national tragedies

held on Sept. 11 is the PeaceFest at Hubbard Park all day. The festival will consist of several speakers, including three Iraq War veterans, as well as live music, antiwar film screenings, and information about local activist groups.

The event, which is sponsored by the War Resisters League of Iowa City, the UI Antiwar Committee, and the UI College Greens, is being held on Sept. 11 to "reclaim the day that has been used by the government over the past four years to promote war and fear," organizers said.

"It's not so much an antiwar festival as a pro-people festival," said Kathy Mitchell, a spokeswoman for the War Resisters League. "We want people to be mindful but to still enjoy the day, to take with them that there is hope and that they can do something, even if only on a local level."

Recognizing the parallel disasters of the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina, Mitchell said a local organization, most likely the Iowa City Pastors for Peace, will request donations and goods during the PeaceFest and will then drive the goods down to hurricane victims.

Graduate students gain skills for future

dent. "Since that time I've learned so much from the experiences of other graduate students. This event will provide an opportunity for graduate students to get their questions answered whether they are incoming or advanced students."

Caryl Becerra, another microbiology graduate student, believes that "when graduate students are well informed about what is expected in graduate school, it reduces frustration and confusion about the process. Also, when students have an idea about the next step in their career, they can make more informed decisions about, not only their future occupation, but also the steps needed to make themselves stronger candidates. The format for this year's event is different. We are bringing more advanced students to address the expectations and realities of life in graduate school as well as professionals from a variety of scientific disciplines to provide insights on the aspects of their profession."

Frat house to be closed

code violations. This summer, the fraternity was suspended for three years for failing to bring their house up to code. Alpha Tau Gamma was also suspended for three years after being closed in May. These two fraternities are now banned from campus activities, but are expected to reapply for recognition before their three year ban is over.

In February, the Delta Zeta sorority was closed by its national chapter due to "unspecific drug violations." However, the sorority members vehemently denied any illegal drug use in the house.

In May, the planning board of Amherst eliminated any undeveloped land for fraternities and sororities, rezoning it to neighborhood residential land and stopping a possibility of more construction for Greek houses.

The increased strictness over Greek houses being up to code is not unique to UMass. Across the country fraternities have been coming under fire for code violations and hazing issues. Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs at UMass, said in August that the reason for the stricter penalties on code violations was because of the deaths in Greek houses in other parts of the country.

Surveys reveal female college students are more studious than males

By Diya Chacko
Daily Trojan (USC)

LOS ANGELES – Recent studies of American college students have shown that the girls are beating the boys in terms of time studying, grades and time taken to graduate.

A Student Monitor survey of 1,800 students revealed that female students study more often, more efficiently and for longer periods of time than male students. Male students, on the other hand, are more likely to study later at night, skim their textbooks and party more often.

As a result, female students are achieving higher grades and graduating in less time than male students, the study found.

"This research confirms that hard work matters and quantifies the difference between those students with a set of solid study habits and those without," said Eric Weil, managing partner of Student Monitor, in a press release.

Student Monitor publishes nationally syndicated market research studies targeting the U.S. college student body as a consumer group.

The study found that women are 55 percent more likely to study everyday, 21 percent more likely to study 15 or more hours weekly and 23 percent more likely to thoroughly read their textbooks.

By studying more and harder, these students receive higher grades and graduate in four years or less.

Results from the study showed that nearly half of female students study daily compared to a third of the male students.

More than one in four men found themselves studying late at night compared to less than one in five women. Lastly, the study found that men party 20 percent more than women.

According to the University of Southern California Fall 2004 Scholarship Report, the average GPA of female students is 3.05, while the average GPA of male students is 2.878.

"Those numbers are the average GPAs of the entire USC student body," said Nisha Alle, a sophomore in the USC Baccalaureate/MD program. "When you think about it like that, the gap is actually pretty wide. Maybe girls are just more focused at this time."

At least some of the females at USC seemed to agree and individually reflect the study's findings.

"I study highly efficiently and have a lot more focus," said Nicole Williams, a junior majoring in political science. "To a degree, girls have a better sense of things. We clue in more to the professor and care more about our work."

Williams said that she studies around 30 hours per week.

Chien-Te Lee and Matt Byrne see it differently.

"Men are meant to be more physically active," said Lee, a junior transfer student majoring in business administration. "My personal understanding is that men can't focus because they're meant to be active; they can't focus for really long periods of time."

But at the same time, he said that he studies around 7.2 hours a week.

"Transfer students have to study hard," he said.

Byrne a graduate student studying motion picture production, said that he thinks the sex of a professor could be important, among other factors overlooked in the study.

"Women are simply better students in some circumstances," he said.

Weil said that around 1,800 students were picked from random undisclosed universities and community colleges to take a 15-minute survey by telephone. Students were asked questions such as their year, whether they were enrolled full or part-time, whether they lived on or off campus, if they had taken basic courses such as Calculus I, Introduction to Psychology or Introductory Chemistry and their grades in those classes and how much time they spent studying or partying, as well as their usual study habits. One question asked students to say whether they had been studying for a certain purpose.

Actually, it was found that some women study just so that they don't embarrass themselves in class, Weil said.

The Association of American Publishers commissioned the study to find ways to educate students in a more sophisticated manner so they are able to graduate in less time.

These days, the growing number of college students is straining campus resources, causing the cost of education to go up and forcing students into higher debt. American college students are under pressure to achieve higher grades and graduate in four years or less.

Childbirth: not a spectator sport

Allison Edles

I'm sure many students across this campus remember seeing "The Miracle of Life" video in their high school health class. The general thoughts running through the minds of all those "young adults" were usually disgust and shock. After all, who knew the female body could do that? Well now, rather than watching it on TV, we can all be there for the real thing. That's right, all of us.

In a New York Times article on Sunday entitled "Move Over, Doc, the Guests Can't See the Baby," the new wave of baby-spectators was revealed. Now, more and more hospitals are allowing mothers-to-be to have numerous (and by numerous, I mean was more than daddy and the grandparents) guests in the room to be present for the childbirth. And why not? As it is commonly known, childbirth is a joyous occasion and should be witnessed by everyone, because it never ever goes wrong. Ever.

Many hospitals, such as the Prentice Women's Hospital in Chicago, welcome many visitors during the delivery. In fact, this hospital is so welcoming that they are in the process of building on a special "spectator" section; an area near the head of the mother's bed, called the "Family Zone," equipped with seating for four," set to be completed in 2007, according to the article.

Childbirth is not a baseball game with fans and spectators, although granted, there are certain aspects that remain the same; obstetricians and catchers both get yelled at if they drop anything.

Childbirth is not a baseball game with fans and spectators, although granted, there are certain aspects that remain the same; obstetricians and catchers both get yelled at if they drop anything. Childbirth is also not always a glamorous event. There is screaming, cursing, extreme pain and more blood leaking out of you than was previously expected. While the husband (or someone to support the mother) should most definitely be there, it is not necessary or appropriate to have baby shower in the delivery room.

Following the expression that too many cooks spoil the brew, imagine the following scenario: your knee-your scared-beyond-belief husband, the in-laws who hold higher regard for the progressive child and your parents, who never wanted to see their daughter naked again, ever. All five of them see the amount of pain you are in and scream at the doctor to give you something for the pain. Keep in mind, they are all allowed to put their two cents in because, by letting them be there in the first place, they feel like you "need" them there. Just to clear things up, screaming at doctors is never a good thing to do, especially when they're a little too focused on catching/not dropping a baby.

All of this aside, there are aspects of childbirth that are not seen on "E.R." Oftentimes, the mother will lose control of her bowels and defecate during the process. This is such something that the mother-to-be was not considering before letting her in-laws in the room to experience every little wonderful detail. Additionally, the mother's perineum often splits, requiring stitching immediately after the birth, another thing which was most likely not considered before consenting to visitors. Oh, for those who don't know, the perineum is the section of skin that extends from the vagina to the anus.

The delivery process can be wonderful, if everything goes according to plan. If the baby is premature, there may be complications due to the infant's organs not developing completely. Also, if the birth is breeched (when another part of the baby presents first instead of the head) there is an increased risk of danger to both the infant and the mother. If none of this is enough, there may be a prolapsed cord (when the umbilical cord presents during crowning instead of or in addition to the actual baby); another life-threatening condition for both mother and child.

Everyone wants to be there when a healthy, beautiful baby is born. No one wants to be there when that isn't the case. What is the baby procession going to say when they see the new-born bundle of joy with a tube down its throat and hooked up to a respirator that is breathing for it because it ain't breathe on its own?

Also, once a baby is born, whether it's healthy or not, all eyes and attention go to that infant. Consequently, the mother tends to be overlooked slightly, at least by her loved ones. The mother's health becomes less of an importance as the spectators as she continues to bleed. Additionally, there is more to childbirth than just the baby. The delivery of the placenta (after-birth) will still leave the mother in that extremely vulnerable position for all her friends and family to see.

Childbirth can truly be a wonderful thing. However, it is our responsibility as willing and anxious individuals to know when it's right to step back and let the doctors do their jobs. Moral support and celebration is the order of the day, after, once we can all be sure there is truly something to celebrate.

Backpacking across Europe

Chris Eckel

So after reading this article, you might grow to hate me. Not because I suck, so much, but because I spent 40 days backpacking in Europe this summer, while you were mowing lawns or scooping ice cream, or, for the really ambitious, filing papers and sharpening pencils at some pretentious law firm.

I flew to Europe in the same plane as Russell Simmons. I watched Shakespeare in the exact replica of the Old Globe Theater in London. I traveled to Brussels and had a disappointing Belgian waffle. I went to Normandy and satisfied my life-long desire to see the setting for the most important day of the last 100 years. I went to a coffee shop or two in Amsterdam. I gazed in awe at the Holocaust Memorial and stared at the crumbled remains of the Berlin Wall. I had a tour of Prague given by one of the most strangely wonderful men I've ever met; he told us that Radio Free Europe isn't really free, apparently. I had a beer in an ancient Austrian fortress with my non-drinking hand dangling 2,000 feet above the streets of Salzburg. I took an overnight train to Venice and slept on a 5-foot long bed. I had some of the best pasta I've ever come across in Florence, and I got it from a cafeteria.

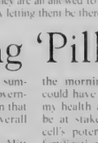
The Pope blessed me during my time in Rome. My camera was broken in a freak accident traveling from Italy to Spain; apparently the Pope doesn't do electronics. I was surrounded by 'tripps' architecture and angry pickpockets in Barcelona, and almost saw a fight break out on a beach between a topless woman and a clueless tourist. I watched the bulls run by and experienced the longest party I've ever stumbled in and out of in Pamplona. I went to two exotic beach towns in Spain and France, and the weather was 'le crap' the entire time I was there. I drank plenty of Bordeaux wine and brought a bottle of it home. I sang "Wonderwall" (remember Oasis?) with complete strangers as a guy played acoustic guitar on the steps of the most famous church in Paris while we watched the Eiffel Tower sparkle at midnight. I watched Lance Armstrong win the Tour de France from 20 feet away.

So take it from me: blow off some silly job next summer and backpack Europe. Spend the best three months of the year filing away moments worth remembering, not some jerk's legal briefs.

And yet, none of these moments stand out the most as I look back on Europe. Instead, it's the moments that came in between that really counted, the moments that I'll never forget.

The grins of amazement exchanged between friends as we reminded ourselves we were eating pizza in a Roman piazza, not an American Pizza Hut. The sound of silence as we all stood in awe of a beautiful painting or a ghastly concentration camp. Nightly conversations between the group over a pint of pivo, biere, cerveza, beer, or whatever you like to call it. Having the entire group endlessly rocking out to "Sugar, We're Going Down" by Fall Out Boy. Everyone rushing to get off the train like a kid running to his Christmas presents each time we got to a new city. Each embarrassing incident where one of us attempted to speak a language we had never tackled before. Those are the memories I'll savor as long as I live.

Europe wasn't a perfect trip. I lost some things, and I broke some things. Some of them may be found; some of them may be fixed. Only time, some effort, and the good people at Nikon will tell. But don't let those imperfections frighten you off. Europe is like no other place on earth. Each day is a new adventure.



So take it from me: blow off some silly job next summer and backpack Europe. Spend the best three months of the year filing away moments worth remembering, not some jerk's legal briefs. You've only got a few summers left, so use them for now, not the future. The rest of your life will come before you know it, and it doesn't easily allow you to jet off to Europe for a month or so. Get there as soon as possible. When you meet Stephen in Prague, tell him I sent you.

Vetoing 'Pill' poor decision

Up on Beacon Hill this summer, the Massachusetts government made another decision that affects my body and overall health as a woman.

On July 25, 2005, Gov. Mitt Romney vetoed a bill that would have made the "Morning After Pill" available to all rape victims in hospitals, as well as those seeking it without a prescription. By doing so, he was faced with mixed reviews. Many pro-lifers viewed the veto as a major victory in the fight to protect unborn life. Pro-choice supporters, however, felt deceived by their governor, who had once promised Massachusetts citizens wider accessibility to emergency contraception.

Becky Martins

The subject of abortion is an ethical and controversial one. I continue speaking only of my own opinion, regardless of its popularity, or lack thereof. Thus, if asked to place myself somewhere in the abortion argument, I would find myself leaning more pro-choice. I do not believe in aborting a fetus after the first trimester, unless under extreme circumstances, but essentially, the right to choose should be my own, not my local or national governments'.

This particular bill focused on the morning after pill, which many specialists have listed not to be an abortifacient. Why then, is it being looked at as an equivalent to the abortion pill RU 486, which is administered during the first nine weeks of pregnancy? Sure, some may argue that a life exists at the moment of conception and anything done after this point is murder, but in my opinion, the morning after pill is nothing more than a contraceptive, since it contains the same hormones, only in higher levels. When taken, it is literally the morning after conception could have occurred. And when my health and well-being could be at stake a few hours of a cell's potential implantation or fertilization should not take precedence. Call me selfish, but in a situation of rape, incest, etc. why should I be denied access to such a drug, when in essence, the life inside me could never survive outside of my uterus.

Another issue at hand here is the idea of the seperation of church and state. Romney's veto is just another example of the lack-thereof that exists in modern day politics.

Another issue at hand here is the idea of the separation of church and state. Romney's veto is just another example of the lack-thereof that exists in modern day politics. A few years ago, President George W. Bush proved himself incapable of disconnecting faith from law when he tried to outlaw partial-birth abortions due to his religious views and while I may have agreed with his interest in banning the inhumane practice I do not believe one person's beliefs should affect the lives of all others. President Bush was elected into office with the intent of running our country in a politically and economically sound way. His morals and faith should not come into play such that my life is forced to resemble them.

But there are other distractions present in politician's offices around the nation aside from matters of faith. In this case, I believe the governor had the larger picture in mind when he vetoed the "Morning After Pill" bill. By failing to pass it into law, Romney earned brownie points with many influential Republicans, and hopefully for him future bids for the 2008 presidential election. Suddenly, though he stated his decision was based on morals and spirituality, his motives become ambiguous. Is Romney really a true supporter of protecting human life, regardless of its form? Or was he influenced by outside sources that promised greater things in the long run?

Essentially, there are a lot of things wrong with the Romney "Morning After Pill" veto. The decision to disallow its dispersement without a prescription, as well as in hospitals, shows a general disconcern for my well-being. Other states in this nation do not follow similar suit, yet manage to appease both pro-lifers and women, in general. Also, while the veto will probably be overridden due to its original popularity in legislature, it goes to show how much a politician may or may not have the public's best interest in mind while decision-making. I just hope in later years, my body does not go unprotected and my peace of mind shattered due to someone's selfish intentions. We elect officials in hope they take care of our needs with impartiality. But when many receive such as blow as this, it makes one reconsider how much is actually being done for the benefit of the greater good.

Giving up Gaza

Jessica Zolotorofe

Imagine being told that everything you have known for the last 40 years is gone. Waking up every morning looking out the same window at the same neighbor's house, and suddenly you receive your eviction notice, but it wasn't late rent, and it wasn't poor tenancy that cost these people their homes and lives. It was an age old battle between two neighboring nations.

A few weeks ago, Jewish settlers formed human chains, burned tires and pleaded with the government, but it was no use. After 38 years of residency, Israeli troops delivered eviction notices to about 50 Jewish settlements along Gaza and the West Bank to begin the country's pullout from the strip. Over 20,000 people will be moved out of the area with only 48 hours notice. Government officials promise that this will increase the safety of the Israelis and benefit the country, but it's not so easy for the people who are losing their homes and the lives they have known for decades to understand. Plus, I haven't seen the benefit in the past few weeks.

Situations like these make me angry at mankind. The world has so much to offer, but instead of celebrating together, we fly planes into buildings and blow up buses.

It's really mind-boggling to me that Palestinians, mostly Islamic militants, were marching around the territory hanging derogatory banners and burning cardboard models of Israeli homes that would soon be in Palestinian possession. It just makes me think that the Israelis and Palestinians have not really come very far despite all of these years of trying. Instead of being grateful for their land, and humane about it, human beings are rejoicing in others' sorrows.

I have been working for a travel magazine all summer, and there are so many places I have learned about that I would love to visit. While I continually tell myself that terrorists and militants are getting the best of us if we live in fear, I'm certainly not jumping on a plane to Israel any time soon. I read an article about visas, and learned that many Arab countries check passports and do not allow people into their country who indicate that they intend to visit, or who have visited Israel.

Situations like these make me angry at mankind. The world has so much to offer, but instead of celebrating together, we fly planes into buildings and blow up buses.

I'd also love for someone to explain the concept of suicide bombing. OK, so I understand that people think they're doing good and will be rewarded, but at the expense of innocent people? Another disturbing part is that these are often not kids who are poor, uneducated lost souls, but extremely intelligent teachers and doctors with wives and children who somehow believe that exploding themselves and 25 others is a good idea. It's really just beyond me.

The worst part about this whole giving up Gaza thing is that I really don't think it will solve the problem. For starters, the Palestinians want the entire West Bank, and are not satisfied with the area Israel has given up. In addition, Israelis removed from their homes are going to be more hostile towards Palestinians, not improving their current relationship by any means.

A home is so much more than just a structure to eat and sleep in. It symbolizes family, strength, a sense of self, freedom and love. Taking these things away from innocent people, regardless of their religion, nationality or faith seems so cruel to me.

I just hope for the best for all of the Israeli and Palestinian civilians and I hope that one day I'll be able to travel and not worry about terrorism and hate. Unfortunately, that day seems so far away right now...

'The Man' is bringing us down

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

If you're a Samuel L. Jackson fan and feel compelled to see "The Man" for this reason, I convey to you my most heartfelt sympathies. Fortunately, not all is lost. You can leave the theater anytime you want. If you're kidnapped and forced to sit through the film, ask your captor to be humane. Tell him you want to be shot in the head.

Yes, "The Man" is that bad.

"The Man" is the story of a dental supply salesman, played by Eugene Levy, who in the first scene says goodbye to his wife to go to a convention and tells her he'll be back before she knows it. Enter Jackson, the bad-ass, totally unlikable Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms agent who sets up a deal with some arms dealers so he can bust them. When the deal is supposed to go down, Levy is mistaken for Jackson. Levy has to be the man to negotiate with the arms dealers and this puts Levy and Jackson in the same car together for the cheapest imitation buddy comedy ever made.

Jackson is the competent tough guy and Levy is the spineless wimp. This gives way to all sorts of screenwriting "don'ts," like Jackson repeatedly telling Levy to shut up and Levy not listening. Or Levy having a flatulence problem and Jackson getting hot under the collar. It gets even worse. As in every buddy comedy (and this is an imitation buddy comedy, so the same rules apply) the two characters have to learn something from each other, but in a film with next to no characterization this poses a problem.

So what happens? Their characters abruptly and inexplicably change. Jackson's softens. We realize this because he appears to be playing an entirely different character altogether just a few scenes before the film ends. Levy gives a speech at a dental convention which has his fellow dentists speechless. Picture a terribly boring and "nothing to write home about" speech punctuated by shots of dentists in the audience shaking their heads in awe.

This film is such a group effort colossal blunder it's difficult to single out one area as the chief problem. The writing is as unnatural and contrived as any movie writing could possibly be. The screenwriter had a very low I.Q. That may sound brutal, but if you see this film you'll feel the same way. Nothing is said that's even remotely funny, and when a film begins to resort to flatulence jokes you know the writer is desperate and stupid. Everything about the movement of the story line feels too easy. When Jackson interrogates a snitch it takes a few "all right, all rights" from the snitch before Jackson gets the information he wants.

And Jackson, who is usually up to par, (what happened to the "Jungle Fever" and "Pulp Fiction" Jackson that blew everyone away?), is unmistakably bad in this film. His character is totally inhuman and that's how Jackson plays him. Even though the hit man from "Pulp Fiction" has already been done, Jackson likes to give an encore from time to time. He gets those intense eyes and falls back on his favorite thing to do: yell. Levy's basic idiosyncrasy is that he likes to open his eyes wide from time to time like the frightened dental supply salesman that he is. It's all even worse than it sounds.

A few people might see this film before word of mouth spreads. One hopes that as many people as possible understand that "The Man" is not the least bit funny, but instead just annoying and mind-boggling. You'll find yourself wondering: how did this film ever get made? And the answer, as you'll quickly surmise, is that the people who made this film think we're stupid - stupid enough to find this entertaining. Save yourself the time, prove them wrong, and skip the film.

Umphrey's McGee is the jamband of the future

By Nick Brown
Collegian Correspondent

In the 60s and 70s, there were Deadheads. In the nineties, there were Phish heads. Their time came and went and many were left wondering who would lead the way down the murky path that is the improvisational music scene. Who would step up, grab the torch and run like madmen straight into the dark?

Umphrey's McGee
Tues. Sept. 13
Pearl Street
Northampton
$18 at the door

For the new millennium we have "Umphreaks," and justifiably so. Such diehard fans are rarely found outside of the jamband community, but to call Umphrey's McGee simply a jamband would be doing them a great disservice.

Rising out of the Chicago club scene, Umphrey's McGee's relentless touring schedule has left little time for anything other than exploration and improvement. They've played festivals big and small, shows near and far. They've rocked out the Jam Cruise, a four-day festival on a cruise ship, they've headlined a three-day festival in Amsterdam, otherwise known as "Amsterjam," and this Tuesday they will be gracing the Pearl Street Ballroom with their infectious brand of rock and roll.

Umphrey's doesn't just jam. They rock, they roll, they have some of the tightest vocal harmonies in music today, and they're only getting better. They paint vivid soundscapes. They write meaningful lyrics. They can turn on a dime. One minute you might be hearing metal-esque prog-rock, then they immediately switch gears and drop into a mellow reggae tune and this is all done seamlessly throughout a single show. These guys never miss a beat. They transcend genre. They are no jamband. They are the band.

They also know cover tunes like no other. You would never expect an up and coming band to try and take on "I Ran" by Flock of Seagulls, but Umphrey's McGee did with flare, and it doesn't stop there. They've covered The Police's "Walking on the Moon," the Who's "Baba O'Reilly," several Paul Simon tunes and countless others. This is all done with disturbing precision similar to that of an internationally acclaimed orchestra.

What is very clear is that these guys mean business. They're not about over indulgent, 20-minute guitar solos or spacey nonsense that jam bands are often known for. Sometimes there is the negative connotation surrounding jambands for unstructured "jams." While such improvisation can often lead to new and unexpected territory, many find such exploration hard to digest.

What Umphrey's McGee does that sets them apart from the flock is their ability to change immediately, precisely and without flinching. They do plan without stopping, sometimes for twenty minutes, but you might find what sounds like five or so songs inside the greater, more massive song, and inside all of that you'll find musical influences from all over the world.

What popular music lacks today is ingenuity. The ability to change and progress without losing people's interest is a tough battle that many bands have fought. Now with the over-commercialization of the music industry, what

Cake hits the spot at Calvin

NORTHAMPTON – Everybody loves Cake. No kidding, and this weekend it was proved at the Calvin Theater as a capacity crowd as diverse as can be filled the hall to experience Cake - the band, not the baked good.

Doors opened at 7 p.m. and with an hour to go until show time most people hit the bar area in the Calvin. U.S. prevails in Solheim Cup

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

CARMEL, Ind. — Juli Inkster saw flags waving, heard chants of "U-S-A!" and felt a lump in her throat on the practice range, the intensity building before the first match Sunday in the Solheim Cup.

She gathered all the American players she could find. With their hands together in a collective fist, they broke huddle with a shout that carried them to victory and kept their record perfect on home soil.

"FINISH!"

"That was our key phrase," Paula Creamer said. "They don't remember how you start, but how you finish."

Creamer made sure the start sent a message just as powerful.

The United States won back the Solheim Cup and picked up a new star along the way — Creamer, the 19-year-old rookie who all but guaranteed victory and then backed it up with a crushing win over Laura Davies that set the tone for an American rout in singles.

The finish turned out to be anticlimactic. The only match that reached the 18th hole was the last one, when Rosie Jones earned a halve with Suzann Pettersen. All that did was provide a final score for posterity.

United States 15 1/2, Europe 12 1/2.

"It's like a dream," U.S. captain Nancy Lopez said. "These players played their hearts out."

The matches were tied going into the last day for the first time in 11 years, but not for long. The scoreboard was awash in so much American red that when Jones teed off in the final twosome, Europe did not lead in any match.

Creamer, who went through her high school commencement just four months ago, shot 30 on the front nine and buried Davies, 7 and 5, as the Americans won six of the first seven matches.

"I saw after nine holes she was 6 up," said Pat Hurst, who rallied in the match behind Creamer. "She's our rookie, and she was unbelievable."

The Europeans were in a state of shock.

"You're thinking about your own match, but it's hard not to look at the board," Carin Koch said. "With all the matches going the wrong way for us, it was tough. We've done everything we can."

Meg Mallon clinched the cup for the United States with a par putt on the 16th hole for a 2-up lead, assuring the Americans at least the 14 1/2 points they needed to win it back from Europe.

Mallon won the next hole with a par for a 3-and-1 victory over Karen Stupples, and the celebration was on. Players joined arms in a chorus line dance, rambled down fairways with an American flag and sang to the record gallery. Inkster took a camera from her bag before her caddie took it away.

The only downer was after the closing ceremonies.

Lopez said Mallon became light-headed because of the heat, and was taken to the hospital as a precaution. It left a U.S. team that was slightly more somber, but still all smiles about the trophy before them.

Europe was subdued for obvious reasons.

"I'm not one to grieve too hard or too long over golf," European captain Catrin Nilsmark said. "I'm disappointed, mostly for the girls. They tried their best and they did their best. ... But we got down by so much. There were some big numbers up there."

The youngest player in Solheim Cup history led the way, with help from a few others from the hip-hop generation.

Creamer, the first LPGA Tour rookie to earn a spot in the Solheim Cup, surprised even her teammates two weeks ago when the U.S. team was named with a sassy message to the Europeans.

"All I can say is they had better get ready, because they're going to beat," Creamer said.

Then she backed it up in a big way.

"You should never say anything you don't believe," Creamer said. "This is a week I'll never forget."

Over three days, she was in the toughest matches and came through with clutch shots and fearless putting. She played all five matches and went 3-1-1, the biggest of all her rout against Davies. Starting with her opening birdie, Creamer was 7 under par through 13 holes.

For the first time all week, the United States had the lead.

"This is a huge feat for me," Creamer said. "It was one of my goals to get here, and when I got here, I wanted to win. This is an unbelievable experience."

Her match over, Creamer found a small American flag on the edge of a stream and asked someone in the gallery, "Is this yours?" Then she tucked it into her ponytail and turned into a cheerleader.

In the groups ahead and behind her, Inkster and Hurst rallied on the back nine and won their matches on the 17th hole as the points began to pile up.

In the maternity match, Laura Diaz and Iben Tinning of Denmark are both pregnant. Diaz won the first three holes and won 6 and 5, stopping on the 13th tee to give Creamer a bear hug.

Two other rookies also shined.

Natalie Gulbis, 22, went 3-1-0 and beat long-hitting Maria Hjorth in singles. Christina Kim, 21, pounded Ludivine Kreutz of France, 5 and 4, and was 2-1-1 for the week. The three American rookies were 8-3-2, and a major reason the Solheim Cup will stay at LPGA Tour headquarters the next two years.

"They're not rookies to me," Lopez said. "They were the best players coming in here. I had to trust them, and I knew they could do it."

The winning captain in Sweden, Nilsmark again played her rookies only one time before the mandatory singles, and this time it might have cost her. Stupples and Kreutz never led in their matches, while Gwladys Nocera won in a sloppy match against Cristie Kerr. Europe's rookies were 1-5-0.

Annika Sorenstam secured the first point for Europe in the sixth of 12 matches, outlasting 48-year-old Beth Daniel and winning on the 15th hole. Koch, Catriona Matthew and Nocera never trailed in winning their matches.

But Europe needed a lot more help, and it soon became hopeless.

Sorenstam now is 20-9-3, giving her the most points of any player in Solheim Cup history. But at the end of the day, her team had to listen to the Americans singing, dancing and kissing the crystal cup.

"I'm just looking forward to two years," Sorenstam said. "We're going to get that cup back."

Minutewomen get shutout by Huskies tough to get shots."

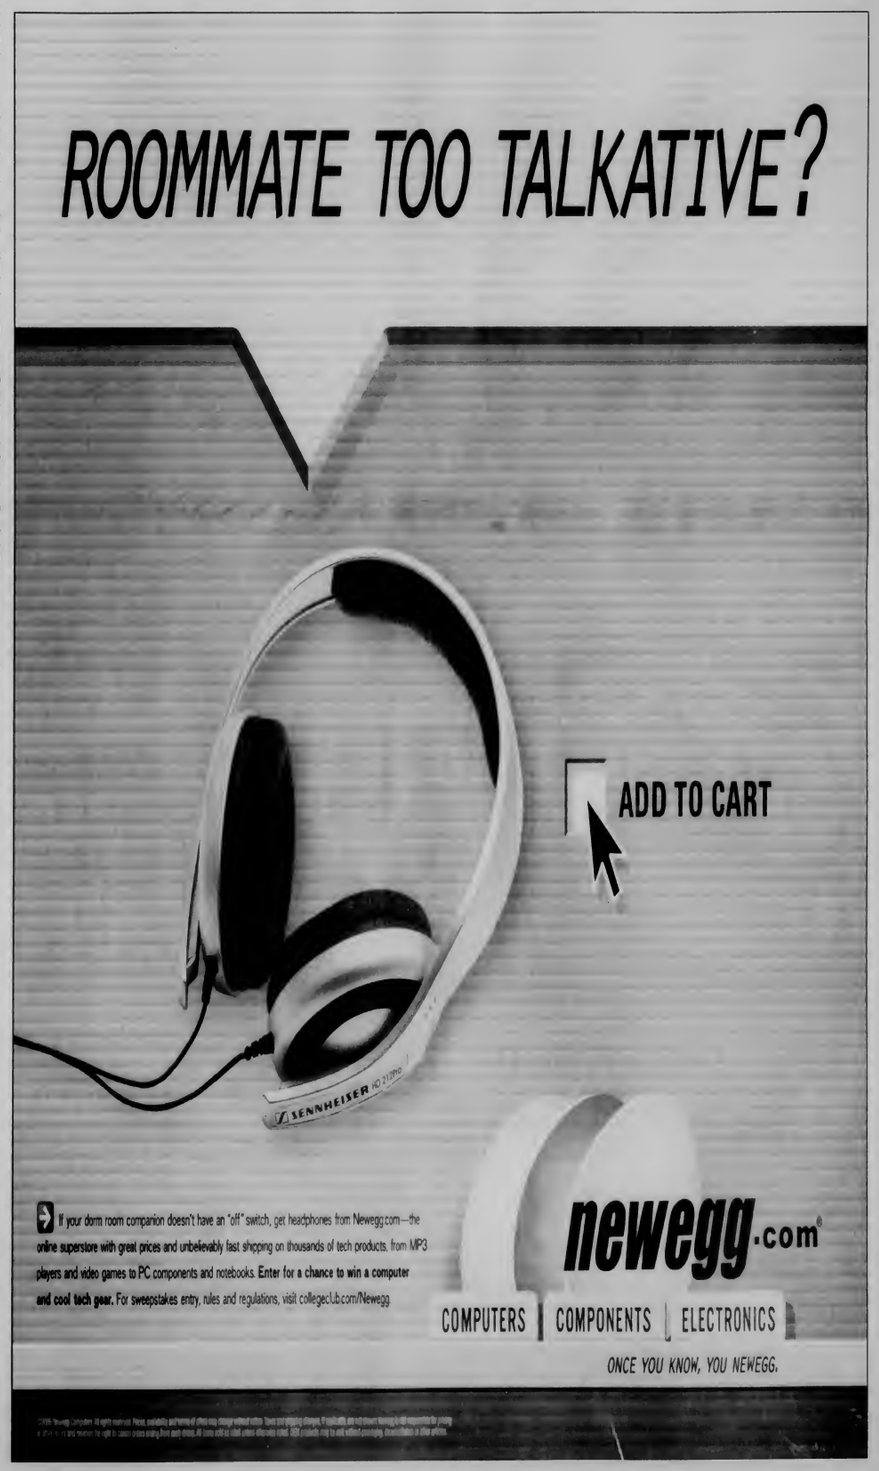
St. John's made some occasional breaks, but got their biggest came with 28 minutes to go in the game. After a missed punt, Natasha Lee found herself in a one-on-one situation and after the initial save was made by Walker, Lee found the net on the rebound to give the Storm a 1-0 lead.



The Minutewomen then switched from a zone to a man-to-man in the back, removing a defender from the back to enable deeper play. Melissa Toulouse was the odd one out in the back, moving to the midfield, but it wasn't necessarily a bad thing. Toulouse is a natural sweeper, having played the position all throughout high school and various club teams.

The move opened up the scoring opportunities for the Minutewomen, and in the 73rd minute they finally got in motion. Vanessa Patry headed a pass to Vanessa Lima, who responded by heading in a shot over goalie Jaime Beran for her first goal of the season, evening the game again at 1-1.

Both teams then played two ten-minute periods of scoreless overtime soccer to end the game in a tie.

While both teams had six shots on goal in the contest, the Minutewomen were in favor on corners, taking seven to the Red Storm's three.

"I really admire the effort by St. John's," Rudy said. "They were really beat up and didn't make a lot of substitutions, but they kept it together."

Losing effort for UMass defense

turned out to be the deciding factor in the game.

The first came following a Colgate field goal when Colgate strong safety Geoff Bean snagged a pass that was intended for Moore, 51 yards Later, Bean was in the endzone of the Minutemen and the score was 10-0 in favor of the Raiders.

The second turnover that made things difficult for UMass occurred after the first half when Moore caught the ball on the Minuteman 42-yard line and the ball was jarred loose by the Colgate defender. The second defensive score of the game came when free safety Andrew Moore scooped up the loose ball and carried it 42-yds for six more points.

"I made some mistakes earlier, it's the way you bounce back," Moore said. "I just come out and try to do my best and as a team we try to stay together, hopefully we can come together and pull out the win next time."

Despite the falters made by the offense, the UMass defense kept yards at a minimum the entire contest, letting up only 195 total yards and surrendering just a field goal.

"[Colgate] didn't do anything the whole game, offensively, they didn't do anything, we just made to many turnovers." free safety Shannon James said. "It's tough, but we're a team. We could have easily scored on defense just like they did."

James chipped in three tackles, while cornerback Steve Costello added a tackle and the team's only interception. Linebacker Charles Walker led the team, however, registering 9 tackles, two of them for a loss, and a sack, while James Ihedigbo added two sacks, increasing his season total to four.

The big guys up front for the UMass defense also contained the run, with defensive tackle John Hatchell, and defensive end's Keron Williams and Patrick Powell recording six tackles each.

The interception by Costello came on the Minuteman five-yard line and proved to serve as a momentum change halfway through the fourth quarter. With zero points on the board, Coen managed to complete 7-of-9 passes for 60 yards and a touchdown on a 95-yard drive, with six of those completions going to Moore.

Redshirt senior R.J. Cobbs recorded four receptions for 29 yards in the Minutemen's 17-14 loss last Saturday. Cobbs played both tailback and receiver against Colgate.

The drive ended with a strike from Coen to Moore from 17-yards out.

"I thought we moved the ball for the most part through the air fairly effectively when we weren't throwing it to the other guy," Brown said. "It's difficult to win games when you have a lot of turnovers."

Coen settled down as the game went on, and was able to run the two minute offense throughout the fourth quarter. Beginning at the UMass 41-yard line, Coen completed a pass to Steve Baylark on third down, which was good for 11-yards.

He then connected with senior receiver R.J. Cobbs for 19-yards, bringing the ball down to the Colgate redzone. The final play, which cut the Colgate lead down to three points, was a short pass to sophomore receiver Rasheed Rancher for the touchdown.

Although the negatives about the loss are high in count, the Minutemen felt that their ability to light back and threaten a fourth quarter win displays that they kept the game tight until the end.

"Out of eight turnovers and a missed field goal, we still had a chance to come back and win the game," James said. "I'm proud of the guys, we hung in there."

The offense racked up a total of 451-yards, although Baylark, who is a Walter Payton Award Nominee, was below his normal game average, picking up 60-yards on 19 carries.

UM loses to Maine

defenders and lace a shot from 15 yards out into the top corner of the net, barely out of the reach of redshirt freshman keeper Zach Simmons.

That goal proved to be the game winner as Lemire's goal was all the Minutemen could muster in response to Maine's onslaught.

It was the Black Bears' first win of the season and their home opener at Alumni Field. Maine was saddled with some early suspensions that resulted in the absence of its goalie and one of its star forwards, both of whom conveniently returned for the Black Bears' match with the Minutemen.

UMass coach Sam Koch was less than pleased with the outcome of Saturday's match, and cited intensity as the culprit for the loss.

"We missed a couple of opportunities and so did they," he said. "It was a pretty even game as far as opportunities go but [the Black Bears] put theirs away. They're a team playing their first home game. They needed to win a little bit more than we did."

There was no scoring from either side in the first half, and to begin the second the Minutemen were buried under a two-goal deficit, a tough obstacle for any team to overcome.

"They beat us to the ball in the first half every time," Koch said. "It's kind of hard to turn it on in the last thirty minutes and we ran out of time. Overall, it was not a good team performance."

The Black Bears outshot the Minutemen 10-8 and committed 13 fouls to UMass' ten. The statistics prove Koch right about equal opportunities in the match, but the X-factor appeared to be intensity - it was Maine's home opener as well as the return of two of the Black Bears' more talented skill players.

For UMass, after a significant win over Michigan on the road, it could have been a letdown.

"Hopefully we'll come out better because of [this loss]," Koch said. "I think after the big win against Michigan the guys forgot what got us there."

The Minutemen will be back in action when they travel to Hartford (1-1-1) on Tuesday for their fourth straight road match to open the season.

The Minutemen will have had two practices (Sunday and this afternoon) before Tuesday's 7 o'clock match, which comes on the heels of the disappointing loss to Maine.

Hartford took UMass to two overtimes in last year's match before falling 3-2, and UMass coach Sam Koch will not take anything for granted.

"It is another home opener," Koch said, referring to playing Maine for its home opener on Saturday. "We have to be ready to play for 90 minutes, not thirty. We have to play within our roles which a couple of our guys got of [against Maine]."

"[Hartford] has a brand new spirit and a new energy; we're playing a tough opponent," he added. "They are going to be ready to play."

The Minutemen will be looking to get back to the .500 mark on Tuesday before returning for their home opener on Friday at 3 against Cornell.

Minutemen shared the old record with 11 catches.

Moore also had a career-high 128 receiving yards, and he found the endzone with 7:50 remaining in the game to cut the lead to 17-7.

"[J.J. is definitely a top player," Coen said. "In our pass schemes, we try to attack one-on-one situations, and [J.J. is our one-on-one guy. [Junior wideout Brandon] London also went down, and [J.J. stepped up and made some great plays. We had good chemistry on the field."

Though Coen found some success in completing his first two passes -nine yards to Dominique Stewart and four yards to Brandon London - he had a tough time getting the offense into enough rhythm to get points on the board until his fourth series.

Taking possession on their own 26-yard line, Coen came out of the huddle minus the butterflies he said haunted him during his first couple series on the field.

The rookie quarterback completed four-of-five passes for 49 yards and even caught a pass from running back Steve Baylark that was good for an 18-yard gain.

But after Coen missed a tightly covered Baylark in the endzone from the 4-yard line, freshman kicker Armando Cuko missed the 21-yard field goal attempt, and the Minutemen came away from what was then their longest drive of the game without any points.

In the attempt to erase the whole deficit during the next three drives, Coen remained very composed, having the ability to hit his receivers down field and dump the ball off to check-down backs if the Colgate blitz made its way into the backfield.

After the missed field goal, Coen rallied the offense on the next two drives by completing 11-of-16 passes for 101 yards and two touchdowns. He also scrambled once for 15 yards.

"[Offensive Coordinator Kevin] Morris prepared me well enough to be in that situation. I didn't think I was going to be in this situation this early in the season, but my time came. Once I got those first two drives out of my system, I settled down a little bit."

After the defense, which didn't allow a single offensive touchdown, forced the Raiders to punt with 1:41 remaining, Coen went to work from his own 44-yard line.

The drive started on a promising note with a 17-yard completion to the Colgate 39-yard line, but the Raiders' secondary stepped up and broke up Coen's next four passes to stall UMass' comeback bid.

"I thought when he first got in there, he showed a little bit of rust and a lack of preparation and playing time," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I thought he settled in pretty good and competed really well. [The Raiders' defensive backs] got their hands on a few balls, which made me concerned a little bit, but, overall, you've got to like the way he competed and the lift the he gave us."

Comeback cut short

Turnovers hurt UM

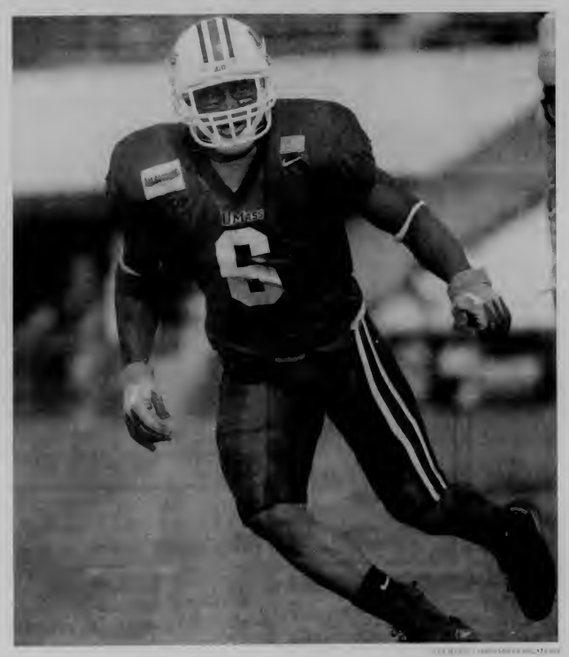
By Eric Attias
Collegian Staff

Plagued by an unheard of eight turnovers, the Massachusetts football team was unable to reply, dropping its first contest of the season to non-conference opponent Colgate 17-14 at Andy Kerr Stadium.

The Maroon and White (1-1 1-0 Atlantic 10) make their debut at home on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium against Albany at 6 p.m. After starting the season with two road games.

Against Colgate, the Minutemen defense kept control of the Raider offense, and then gave UMass an opportunity to rally back and win.

With 1:41 to play and 56 yards of ground in front of them, the Minutemen had one final drive to stay alive in the defensive battle. Catching his 13th pass of the contest for 17 yards, receiver J.J. Moore stepped out of bounds in Raider's territory.



After three straight incompletions, however, quarterback Liam Coen and the UMass offense was faced with a fourth down. Looking to hook up with Moore again, Coen fired a pass to the left side of the field, but did not manage to prolong UMass' chances of a comeback, as the throw was incomplete.

Coen had come into the game early in the third quarter after senior Tim Day was shaken up during a play and exited off of the field. Despite a lack of experience and playing time, Coen put forth a valiant effort, completing 20-of-35 passes for a total of 193 yards, two touchdowns and an interception.

"When you have eight turnovers and you have the ball at mid-field with a minute and forty to go and you have a chance to win the game, that's interesting in itself," UMass coach Don Brown said. "It shows the type of effort we got from all the guys and we never gave up, we kept competing."

Of the eight turnovers, four were interceptions and three were fumbles. Two of those turnovers

Coen shows poise in his debut game

HAMILTON, N.Y. — If nothing else on Saturday, the Massachusetts football team (1-1 1-0 Atlantic 10) may have at least found its one-two passing combination for the next few years.

After senior Minuteman quarterback Tim Day went down with a rib injury during the first series of the second half, redshirt freshman Liam Coen replaced him, entering a game in which his team was trailing 17-0 and his offense had turned the ball over seven times, including four interceptions tossed by Day.

Coen finished the game completing 20-of-35 passes for 193 yards, two touchdowns and only one interception.

He rallied the Minutemen back, leading the offense into the red zone three times in their four fourth quarter drives and almost capped his afternoon off with a miraculous comeback before faltering 17-14.

"He really impressed me," senior free safety Shannon James said of his impressions from the sideline. "He came out there with poise. He ran the offense to score 14 points. He did alright for his first game ever playing."

During Coen's third series of the third quarter, he attempted his first pass to redshirt sophomore wide receiver J.J. Moore and hooked up for a gain of 12 yards.

It would be the first of nine connections the young pair made over the game's final 20 minutes, and they helped Moore break a school record with 13 receptions in the game. Four former

UMass falls to Maine

Men's soccer remains under the .500 mark

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Coming off of a triumphant 2-1 victory over a strong Big 10 opponent in Michigan and facing the 0-3 Maine Black Bears on Saturday, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-2-0) appeared to be in ideal position to capitalize on a struggling opponent.

However, the Black Bears dealt the Minutemen a 2-1 loss on their home field and left UMass staring up at the .500 mark for the second time this season.

All the goals on Saturday were scored in the second half, as physical play dictated the momentum for most of the first.

Sophomore Matt Lemire scored the only goal for the Minutemen in the 77th minute with UMass already down 2-0, after Maine's Adam Chenault and Kyle Pacheco both scored to give the Black Bears the two goal lead.

Chenault scored in the 63rd minute to tally the first goal of the game for either side, as a teammate found him streaking down the field, creating a breakaway opportunity.

Pacheco used some individual moves to dribble past UMass

No victory for Minutewomen

By Brendan Hall

STORRS, Ct. — The Massachusetts women's soccer team entered the Connecticut Classic this weekend looking to get a leg up on experience.

Oh, they got experience alright.

The Minutewomen went 0-1-1 this weekend against two Big East teams, scoring just one goal, as they fell on Friday to the No. 19 Connecticut Huskies 4-0 and tied the St. John's Red Storm yesterday 1-1.

UMass remains a .500 team at 2-2-1, while UConn moves to 4-2 and St. John's 2-3-1.

Arguably one of the toughest teams on their schedule, the Huskies danced around the Minutewomen all night with blazing speed, dominance in the air and the middle of the field, resulting in four goals by four different Huskies in the shutout.

UConn's speed on the left and right flanks, coupled with coach Len Ibantin's's unorthodox 4-2-2-2 formation, ultimately lasted out over UMass' revamped defense.

"Looking back at it, they executed with skill at such a fast speed, and that was the difference," coach Jim Rudy said. "They're fast on foot. I can't think of maybe two or three footraces we won. That's why they've been a final four, top 20 team."

UConn's formation allowed the midfielders to maintain control in the middle, and with the height advantage of midfielders Niki Cross and Kathleen Frank, they were dominant in the air. Although the Minutewomen held their own in the early going, they were on their heels for most of the first half. The only shot for UMass in the first came in the 29th minute from Britt Canfield, compared to UConn's ten shots.

With just under three minutes to go in the first, Brittany Taylor flew down the left side of the field, cut across the middle of the 18-yard box and slipped one from four yards out past goalie Kristin Walker's left for the first goal of the game.

After halftime, UConn came out even stronger, and in the 48th minute Alexandra Zedros crossed up one defender, and then hit a shot that just barely touched another defender for an own goal. The goal was officially credited to Zedros, however, and the Huskies went up 2-0.

"Those two goals really were the straw that broke the camel's back," Rudy said.

"I think they had more confidence as they started putting the goals in," senior captain Lindsey Bellini said.

Indeed, UConn added to its lead in the 59th minute when Cross broke free and in a one-on-one encounter with a defender, faked left, beat her on the right and whipped it past Walker for a 3-0 advantage.

Brittany Tegeler rounded out the scoring for the night in the 74th minute when she took a throw-in from Stephanie Labbe and bounced one over the head of Walker to make it 4-0.

The Minutewomen had a little more success yesterday afternoon, playing to a 1-1 tie against the Red Storm after 110 minutes of soccer.

This time, UMass and St. John's played to a scoreless first half, but after adjustments on both sides, there were some breakthroughs as the second half winded down.

"They were really organized in the back with their double zone in the back," Rudy said. "It was really

Federer captures U.S. Open

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Roger Federer, a man of panache and unparalleled perfection in finals, withstood Andre Agassi's spirited upset bid to capture a second straight U.S. Open and sixth Grand Slam title.

Federer responded to his few moments of pressure by reeling off seven straight points in the tiebreak that turned the match around, then blew Agassi away in the fourth set to win 6-3, 2-6, 7-6 (1), 6-1 Sunday and run his stunning record in finals to 23-0.

Federer moved into a tie with Stefan Edberg and Boris Becker for Grand Slam titles among Open era players, and one behind John McEnroe and Mats Wilander. Pete Sampras holds the record with 14 Grand Slam titles, but at 24 years old Federer could well have a shot at that.

Federer shrieked and leapt in the air when Agassi's back hand return looped long on the championship point. The two men who have the highest of respect for each other shook hands warmly at the net.

Though the 35-year-old Agassi was the oldest U.S. Open men's finalist in 71 years, age had less to do with the difference in this match than Federer's sheer strength, variety of serves, and superior balance of attacks from the baseline and the net that wore down Agassi.

The Swiss forced the action, going for winners more aggressively, dancing around the court with poise unrattled even when Agassi had him down a break at 4-2 in the third set. For a while there Agassi seemed to be on the verge of pulling one of the great upsets in sports history — on the order of Muhammad Ali's shockers over Sonny Liston and George Foreman

Club to hold fundraiser for Katrina victims

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Correspondent

The Art of Living Club at the University of Massachusetts is holding a fundraising dinner featuring Indian food for the Hurricane Katrina trauma relief. All proceeds will go to the International Association for Human Values (IAHV) and the Art of Living Foundation's (AOLF) disaster and trauma relief work in the hurricane affected areas. This event will be held on September 18, 2005 at 6 p.m. in Campus Center Room 168C.

"Last year, the club raised 5,000 USD for the tsunami victims by collecting donations and having a fundraising dinner here at UMass," says Kishore, a graduate student from the Polymer Science department and a volunteer for the Art of Living club. They anticipate raising even more funds for the hurricane victims.

Tickets for the event are reasonably priced ($12 for students, $15 for non-students) and food is being donated by faculty and students. "Indian food will be prepared by students and faculty who are volunteering for this event, and I am excited to be a volunteer," says Denitza Stantcheva, a junior English and Spanish major. Tickets will be available at the Art of Living club table in the campus center starting September 12, 2005 or by calling (413) 687-8336.

The AOL club will also host an Art of Living Course for UMass students affected by the hurricane. This course features the medically proven stress-relieving techniques being taught by AOLF volunteers in the hurricane affected areas. "The most urgent need after food, water and medical care is trauma relief, which is most neglected," says Akshaye Sikand, a graduate student and teacher for the AOL course here at UMass. The course will take place at the end of September.

AOLF and IAHV are non-profit, non-governmental organizations founded by Sri Sri Ravi Shankar.

IAHV implements programs of sustainable development through human values, service, and empowerment. These organizations have provided disaster and trauma relief for thousands affected by natural disasters and terrorist attacks including 9/11, the war in Iraq, floods in Germany, and the South East Asia Tsunami. They have sent teams of trauma relief experts to the affected areas in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

The AOL Club will also organize a 5K Walk for Youth - to promote a Stress Free, Violence Free Society on Oct. 16. This event will be held in 25 cities across the United States and proceeds will go to the Hurricane Katrina trauma relief.

UMass Child Care program is set to grow

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Correspondent

University Child Care added a third toddler classroom to its facility off this fall.

This increases the capacity of the program, located off University Drive, from 78 full-time equivalent spaces, to 87 in its six classrooms. Overall, the program hopes to enroll about 98 children during this academic year, up from 88 in 2004-2005. The program includes both toddler and preschool services for members of the university community.

"While our numbers may be small compared to the thousands of students and employees of the total university; UCC makes a tremendous impact on the lives of the students and employees who use our services. The undergraduate and graduate student parents and employee parents that use UCC tell us that they would not be at UMass and able to do what they do without the service that UCC provides," said Maryanne Gallagher, the director of the program. Additionally, the program provides a learning experience for up to 40 undergraduates each semester as assistant teachers. The students gain experience working with the children along with "course related practicum and student teaching assignments."

Last year, 101 parents affiliated with the university, or one of the other five colleges, had children enrolled in UCC. Graduate students made up the bulk of those, 40%, who used the service. Staff and faculty provided another 25% of the utilization. Undergraduate stu-

State is set to revise disaster response plan

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts officials say they are revising their disaster response plans after watching the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina and the problems with relief efforts.

Boston is redrawing its plan to evacuate and relocate residents, and the state is creating a task force to prepare for a Katrina-strength hurricane. More state-level training also appears likely.

"You're crazy if you don't go back and revisit your assumptions," state Public Safety Secretary Ed Flynn told The Boston Globe on Monday.

Officials have improved terrorist-prevention efforts since the Sept. 11 attacks and during the Democratic National Convention in Boston last summer. But they acknowledge that they need to bolster plans to respond to a large-scale disaster.

Existing evacuation plans rely on people getting themselves out of Boston, but the experience in New Orleans showed that thousands of poor people have no means to leave.

"Let's say there was an incident today and we couldn't get out of the city, and we had to get people out of different neighborhoods. What would we do right now? It would be problematic," Carlo A. Boccia, Boston's director of homeland security, told the Globe.

Boston Mayor Tom Menino has asked Boccia to overhaul the city's plans. The city hasn't identified facilities to temporarily house thousands of evacuees, for example. New Orleans faced the same problem.

Boccia said he hopes to have these places identified within two months. They are considering stocking the sites with medical supplies, food and water.

"It would be wonderful if we could take 10,000 people to a place and have prepositioned medical care," he said.

Christine McCombs, director of the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency, has convened a task force to improve hurricane relief plans.

"I always say to the team here that plans are living documents," she said. "They are not meant to be created and put on the shelf."

Hurricane sparks racial debate

By Doan Phlong Nguyen
Vanderbilt Hustler (Vanderbilt U.)

(U-WIRE) NASHVILLE, Tenn. - In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Democrats and people in the African-American communities are charging that race was one of the reasons for the federal government's delayed response to the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Republicans have denounced these allegations.

"I don't think it's racism. I think it's economic," former Secretary of State Colin Powell said recently on 20/20. "But poverty disproportionately affects African-Americans in this country. And it happened because they were poor."

The national poverty rate is 12.7 percent, an increase from last year. The New Orleans poverty rate is almost double this percentage. Two-thirds of the residents are African-American.

Dr. Frank Dobson, Jr., director of the Bishop Johnson Black Cultural Center, said poor people have never been a priority in terms of our nation's policies.

"They weren't a priority in terms of race (in the policy of the nation)," Dobson said. "So why do we think that they would been a priority in face of the storm?"

"Because they are poor and inany of them are also poor and black, saying that, clearly those images force them to the front," Dobson said.

"They've become the topic of discussion. And so the question is now: does this change policy? Does this change how we do things? How we look at people?"

Students also have strong opinions on this issue.

Senior Latisha Bryant said she thinks sometimes "we feel that we've come so far and race isn't an issue anymore but it's still a big issue."

Bryant said she would like everyone to do their part.

"I think that would go a long way to healing some of the divisions in the country, to really fix the problems within the system that have been ignored," she said.

Junior Evan Schlank said he does not feel race

KRT

National Black Environmental Justice Network and Black Voices for Peace, the NAACP and other groups sponsor a national protest against racism near the White House.

should be an issue in the hurricane tragedy.

"There will be plenty of time for finger-pointing, but to do so on the basis on race is both irresponsible and un-American."

Schlank said that this is a time when our nation should be coming together to help those Americans suffering the most.

Dobson said he hopes this catastrophe forces students to talk about race.

"From the government on down, we need to talk about it because you can't have healing if you patch something over. You can only have healing if you deal with the wound," he said.

Dobson said those who gathered at the Convention Center in New Orleans were the poor who lacked cars and money and had nowhere else to go. As they waited in desperation for help, their faces on the television screens forced Americans to see their poverty-stricken counterparts.

"Much of the time the poor and disenfranchised are invisible, and Katrina has taken the cover off," Dobson said. "All of a sudden they are coming where we live ... and that forces us to see them."

Many of the Katrina victims are now in Nashville and need help.

Hispanic financial aid too low

By Matthew Watkins
The Battalion (Texas A&M)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE STATION, Texas — When Dora Frias was ready to attend college, she had difficulty finding a way to pay for it.

"Both of my parents were born outside of the United States," said Frias, a senior kinesiology major at Texas A&M University. "Nobody in my family knew how to find ways to get help."

A recent study indicates she is not alone. The study, commissioned by two nonprofit organizations, Excelencia in Education and the Institute for Higher Education Policy, indicates that Latinos receive the least average amount of financial aid for college among all ethnic groups.

Deborah Santiago, author of the report and vice president of research for Excelencia in Education, said the source of the discrepancy is most likely because of the schools Hispanics are choosing to attend, as opposed to racial prejudice.

"A large number of Latino students go to community colleges, which are usually less expensive," Santiago said. "Because of that, they receive less money."

More than a third of Latinos who go to college live with their parents, which also reduces the costs, she said, and a majority of Latino students go to school part time and consequently do not get subsidized loans.

Santiago said it was unclear whether Latino students were going to less expensive schools because they were receiving less financial aid or if they were receiving less financial aid because they were attending less expensive schools.

In consistence with the rest of the country, Latinos in Texas receive more grants from the government but less total money in aid, she said.

Joseph Pettibon, director of student financial aid at Texas A&M, said his office does not consider race when administering financial aid.

"[A&M's financial aid] is based on financial need," he said. "It is race-blind. What is looked at is the financial circumstance of the individual student."

Pettibon also said the discrepancy in financial aid may be due to differences in culture.

9/11 makes language evolve

By Tessa French
Kansas State Collegian (Kansas State U.)

(U-WIRE) MANHATTAN, Kan. — Language is an evolution. Some meanings change with time, but others are reshaped or created by extraordinary events. "Languages always change," Carol Russell, linguistics instructor, said. "New words are added and some words are changed or even forgotten. Sometimes the new words become so commonplace we forget the original reason they were added to our lexicon in the first place."

Since Sept. 11, the English language has received small alterations. Words like "al-Qaeda," "Osama bin Laden" and "Patriot Act" are now included in dictionaries.

The definition of the noun "9/11" at www.dictionary.com is "the day in 2001 when Arab suicide bombers hijacked United States airliners and used them as bombs."

"Never has a simple mention of a date, other than the Fourth of July, brought the same response and memories to Americans as 9/11," Russell said.

Words added to dictionaries reflect society and its attitudes. Certain events make people use language in different ways, and once the language looks permanent, it is entered into dictionaries.

"I'm interested in not only the words that are entered, but the attitudes that are associated with them," Naomi Wood, associate professor of English, said. "Like 'ground zero' - we use the word now, and the way we use it shows our thoughts toward political issues. People's reactions are different."

In the New Encarta Webster Dictionary, the word "September 10th" has been added. This adjective is defined as "so petty, shallow or outmoded as to be irrelevant."

"The words being entered into the dictionary since 9/11 is an example of how we can't have a fixed language," Wood said. "It is always evolving, and it's a challenge to keep up with word meanings.

"9/11 used to mean an emergency indicator, and now, depending on who is providing the definition or using the word, it can be patriotic."

Freshmen are failing to make the grade

By Katherine Friedman
Daily Orange (Syracuse)

(U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. — As first-year students at colleges across the nation get their first taste of residence hall life, quad activities and college parties, the approaching first batch of midterms are sure to cause them to rethink their study habits.

According to a study conducted by the ACT, 21 percent of all college-bound students have all the skills they need to succeed academically in college.

The ACT is one of the nation's leading academic achievement tests, measuring students' performances in four main subjects: English, reading, mathematics and science. It is not a requirement for admission to Syracuse University.

"Since 75 to 80 percent of our students come from the East, only 807, 24 percent of the entering class, submitted ACT scores," said Assistant Dean of Admissions Nancy Machles Rothschild in an e-mail. "The mean composite ACT score for first-year students at SU was 26 out of 36."

The ACT study also found 26 percent of all college-bound students have the ability to earn a C or higher in a college-level biology course. SU biology professor Marvin Druger said he felt this was not true among first-year students at SU.

"If you're a first-year student at SU, you are a pretty smart kid," he said. "We set the stage so help is always available, and there are multiple ways you can get it."

Druger said he encourages first-year students to "keep (their) mind focused on academics; it's very easy to slip off the end."

English professor Nicole Moss, who teaches "Studio 1: Academic Writing" to first-year students, said students should practice writing and reading as much as possible to broaden their knowledge.

Roberts faces confirmation hearing

By Jesse J. Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats and Republicans sparred over the legitimacy of questioning John Roberts about divisive issues as the Senate opened confirmation hearings Monday on President Bush's choice to be the nation's chief justice.

Roberts, who was to address the Judiciary Committee later in the day, sat stoically as Democrats noted that the 50-year-old nominee could shape the Supreme Court for a generation if confirmed to replace the late William H. Rehnquist. All questions, they said, were fair game.

Republicans advised Roberts to follow the example set by recent nominees to the high court and avoid responding to probing questions on controversial topics.

"Some have said that nominees who do not spill their guts about whatever a senator wants to know are hiding something from the American people," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. "Some compare a nominee's refusal to violate his judicial oath or abandon judicial ethics to taking the Fifth Amendment. These might be catchy sound bites, but they are patently false."

"Don't take the bait," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, in his prepared statement.

Democratic Sen. Russell Feingold of Wisconsin dismissed the notion that Republican calls for a dignified confirmation process barred senators from pursuing a line of questions of a lifetime appointee. That last part drew a smile from Roberts.

"If by dignified they mean that tough questions are out of bounds, I must strongly disagree," Feingold said.

Added Democratic Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois: "Only your responses to our questions can convince us that the John Roberts of 2005 will be a truly impartial, open-minded chief justice."

Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that conducted Monday's hearing, underscored the stakes for the Senate's vote on Roberts, an honors graduate from Harvard, a political appointee in two Republican administrations and a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for two years.

U.S. Supreme Court nominee, John Roberts, on his first day of confirmation haerings yesterday at the historic Russell Senate Office Building Caucus Room in Washington, D.C.

Roberts originally was chosen to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Rehnquist's death prompted the president to re-nominate him for chief justice, replacing the man he clerked for in 1980.

"Your prospective stewardship of the court, which could last until 2040 or longer ... would present a very unique opportunity for a new chief justice to rebuild the image of the court away from what many believe it has become as a super-legislature and bring consensus to the court," Specter said.

The journey began for Roberts in the ornate Russell Senate Caucus Room, where he quietly sat and watched as Specter gaveled the hearing to order. The day was devoted solely to opening statements.

Roberts introduced members of his family: parents, siblings, his wife, Jane Sullivan Roberts, and his young children, Jack and Josie.

"You see she has a very tight grasp," Roberts said of his wife, who held the two children. An ebullient Jack Roberts had nearly upstaged his father when the president announced his nomination on July 19.

Democrats promised to use the days of hearings to question Roberts on abortion, civil rights, privacy, election rights, capital punishment, judicial activism and the powers of the presidency and Congress.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said the Senate must determine whether Roberts "has demonstrated a commitment to the constitutional principles that have been so vital in advancing fairness, decency and equal opportunity in our society."

He added that the Senate was not a rubber stamp for the president's judicial choices and the hearings amounted to a job interview for the American people.

Republicans warned Roberts against responding to "litmus-test questions."

"Do exactly the same thing every nominee, Republican and Democrat alike, has done. Decline to answer any question you feel would compromise your ability to do your job. The vast majority of the Senate, I am convinced, will not punish you for doing so," Cornyn said.

Abortion and the 1973 Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade that legalized the procedure loomed large.

"Perhaps the Supreme Court's most notorious exercise of raw political power came in Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton, two 1973 cases which invented a constitutional right to abortion," Brownback said.

Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the only woman on the committee, said in her prepared statement that she planned to ask Roberts about "the constitutional right to privacy" as it deals with abortion rights.

"I am concerned by a trend on the court to limit this right and curtail women's autonomy," Feinstein said. "It would be very difficult for me to vote to confirm someone to the Supreme Court whom I knew would overturn Roe v. Wade."

Democrats and Republicans saw few obstacles to Roberts' confirmation. In a Pew Research Center poll released Monday, 46 percent of those surveyed expressed support for Roberts' confirmation, up from 35 percent a week earlier.

Los Angeles suffers from area blackouts

By Laura Wides
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A blackout hit a large portion of the Los Angeles area Monday afternoon, snarling traffic at intersections and trapping people in elevators.

The city was investigating the cause of the outage. But Sgt. Catherine Plows, a police spokeswoman, said terrorism was not suspected.

The electricity was knocked out shortly before 1 p.m. after two power surges, and outages were reported from downtown to the coast and north into the San Fernando Valley, an area encompassing hundreds of thousands of residents and thousands of businesses.

Los Angeles International Airport lost power, but its emergency generator kicked in promptly, and no flights were affected, said Harold Johnson, an airport spokesman.

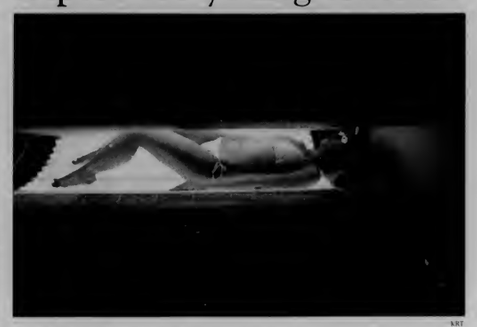
Skin cancer rate triples for young females

By Sumayya Ahmad
Daily Trojan (USC)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES — The incidence of skin cancer among females under 40 has tripled, according to a study published in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

The rate of basal cell and squamous cell cancers rose to 32 cases per 100,000 women under the age of 40 in 2003, up from 13 cases per 100,000 in the late 1970s, according to the study.

Dr. David Peng, visiting associate professor of clinical dermatology at the USC Keck School of Medicine, said that he has also seen an increase in patients with these kinds of cancers.



"What is fairly frightening is that I'm finding an increasing number of patients who are in their late teens and early 20s who are developing melanomas and other kinds of skin cancers. The patients that I have seen have without exception reported use of tanning beds or regular sun bathing," he said.

These kinds of cancers are associated with excessive exposure to sunlight and are often found in people who sunbathe, Peng said.

He said that there are other alternatives to sunbathing, such as sunless tanning products.

He said that there have been problems with these products in the past, such as streaking. The newer preparations have dealt with these issues, such as a product called Mystic Tan, a self-spray solution that allows an evenly distributed tan to develop over the process of a few Tanning has become more popular and fashionable among teens, especially females, such as Loren Porter, 16, of Lynwood, Washington.

Quality In Everything We Do

Students will steal, say new findings

By Dara Kahn
Daily Orange (Syracuse)

(U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. - As new students continue to acclimate themselves to life in residence halls, keeping personal belongings safe becomes a concern of both residents and the Department of Public Safety as well.

According to a back-to-school survey conducted in late August 2005 by the Web site drugstore.com, 11 percent of more than 1,000 nationwide college students ages 18-24 admit to having stolen something from a roommate, but the Syracuse University statistics indicate that larceny on campus is much lower.

The online survey asked students what they would be most likely to steal and 21 percent of students claimed "school supplies like paper, pens and pencils," while 34 percent of students claimed "late-night snacks such as chips and cookies."

"For the most part it seems safe as long as you keep your rooms locked," said Brittany Orpin, a sophomore psychology major. "Everyone's a student. I don't think we'd steal from one another."

In 2004, with a total fall enrollment of 18,247 students at SU, 264 cases of larceny occurred, 48 of which were in an on-campus residential facility, according to Public Safety crime statistics.

Many of these cases included stolen books, backpacks, wallets, clothing or anything left out in the room, said Captain Grant Williams of Public Safety.

"Students tend to leave their valuables in similar spots in their rooms, so it's not too hard to figure out how to find them," Williams said. "It only takes eight seconds for something to be stolen out of an unattended room."

Williams said wire bike and computer locks are not necessarily safe, because they can easily be opened with wire cutters. Instead, he suggests students use U-bolts to secure bicycles around campus.

"Among the Shaw residents, taking little things has been a problem," said Sarah Faisal, a junior residential adviser at Shaw Hall. "Even though students think taking little things like snacks isn't a big deal, it upsets people."

A new initiative on campus, the Security Tracking of Office Products program, attempts to hinder laptop theft.

"It's not near what we consider an epidemic, but it does happen ... each laptop that is stolen bothers me," Williams said.

The program involves acquiring plates that are attached to the backs of laptops that are registered with the company. If the computer gets lost, the system can then track the computer to determine its location.

Bill Longcore, associate director of the Office of Residence Life, said the number of laptops stolen each year is a minimal two to three. However, having items stolen out of the residence halls is "not unheard of," he said.

"It happens when students place too much faith in people. Most of the residence halls are pretty large; you can't possibly know and trust everyone," Longcore said.

Parents utilize Child Care

dents totaled 20% of the parents taking advantage of UCC. The remainder was university alumni and members of the five college community and the community at large.

The program is funded partly by tuition paid by parents and a variety of tuition assistance programs, including the state's Office of Child Care Services. It is also funded in part by university funding to operate the two flexible-schedule classrooms as per the University/GEO contract.

University Child Care, which had been going from one fiscal year to the next since 2003, was on uncertain ground thanks to three years of state budget cuts to some of the programs that helped to fund the program and the university itself. Operating costs at the program consistently exceeded revenues so the first priority was to create an operating plan that would lead to some degree of self-sufficiency over the next three to five years.

"There was a turnover in administration, so we decided to wait for a new vice-chancellor before reworking anything," said Gallagher.

That incoming vice-chancellor was Michael Gargano, who said of the program in a March 7 news release: "We value the high-quality services offered by University Child Care, and under the plan developed by Director Maryanne Gallagher, families can depend on those services in the years ahead." The plan in question was one that called for many changes, including tuition increases over the next few years and a gradual elimination of the two-tiered tuition system now in use for the program.

"Interest in these services is already strong, and we anticipate the need will grow as the size of our faculty increases in the coming years," stated Gargano in a July 29 release. Gallagher was happy to see that the university was really committing to the program, though she wasn't entirely sure how any further expansion would proceed because that was the province of the vice chancellor and chancellor.

Although the facility on Clubhouse Drive houses space for an additional preschool classroom as well, it was determined that providing toddler care was a greater priority because of the higher demand. There is a waiting list for all of the toddler classrooms, though Gallagher was quick to point out that there was still enrollment space in the preschool. Those interested in UCC and its services should contact the UCC office at (413) 545-1566.

Sunblock use is recommended days.

"Of course our main goal is to help patients understand that looking dark and crisp is not, in fact, very attractive. But that of course involves a broader public campaign," he said.

"Dermatologists are not saying to avoid the sun altogether. We do want people to lead active lifestyles," he added.

Peng said that he recommends reading the active ingredients in sunscreens and sunblocks, along with using sunscreen of at least SPF 30.

He said that the ingredients titanium dioxide and zinc oxide, which are found in sunscreens, tend to be better tolerated and act as physical barriers against UV rays.

"Often times, people just look at the SPF rating. What people don't realize is that the active ingredients are also important in determining if the product protects you from the sun," he said.

Peng said that he believes a reason there is a higher incidence of skin cancer is that dermatologists are failing in their efforts to educate the public regarding the dangers of sun exposure. He said that particularly in Los Angeles, where there are people of a variety of racial and ethnic backgrounds, there is a need for more public awareness about this issue.

"Rates of skin cancer are increasing in the population as a whole – not only in people with fair skin," he said.

Alexandra Gazzaniga, a graduate student in professional writing, said that although she loves being in the sun and going outside, she tries to be cautious about sun exposure.

"I do go to the beach but don't actively get a sun tan. I try to avoid the 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. hours," she said.

Gazzaniga said that she has been to the dermatologist before about skin problems and she is especially cautious now that she is older.

"I just try to be careful. It was my experience when I was 18 or 19 when I had a scare. I think I had some damage when I was younger," she said.

Gazzaniga said that she believes people know about the dangers of tanning salons, but that they get mixed messages.

"There are so many images of the young, tan, and beautiful. It's just like smoking. People think they are invincible when they are young," she said.

First generation students are challenged

By Rachel Abbey
Daily Kent Stater (Kent State U.)

(U-WIRE) KENT, Ohio — Raven Montanez's mother always encouraged her to go to college.

Her mom never attended and always tells Montanez how hard it is without a degree.

As the oldest of five children, Montanez said her mother has a lot of expectations for her to be successful. Montanez has cousins who have gone to college, but she is the only person in her immediate family to go.

"I have to explain everything, detail for detail, to my mother about the college process because she never went through it. Everything that's new to me is new to her," said Montanez, a nursing major at Kent State University and first-generation student.

A first-generation student is one whose parents or guardians did not receive a bachelor's degree, said Gary Padak, dean of Undergraduate Studies.

Some people think the number of first-generation students should have dramatically decreased since the academic revolution of the 1960s and '70s, but Padak said the federal government strictly defines them. Even if parents had attended some college or received an associate's degree, a student is still considered first generation.

The university takes more time and effort with first-generation students, Padak said. Financial and social issues, such as lack of support at home, can cause problems.

Parents who did not complete college may not be able to earn the higher income of their peers with degrees, making it harder for their children to go to college.

"You may be able to get into college, but you may not be able to attend," he said.

Kent State offers programs to first-generation students to help them overcome such challenges. The Upward Bound program prepares high school students for college, said Geraldine Hayes Nelson, associate dean of undergraduate studies.

Many first-generation students do not realize college is an option, and the program helps prepare them for the possibility, with prep classes and scholarship searches.

Upward Bound is a TRIO program funded by the U.S. Department of Education, according to the undergraduate studies Web site. First-generation students and students with financial needs can be assisted by TRIO.

Another TRIO grant sponsors tutoring at the Academic Success Center. Aside from first-generation students, the grant can be used to help students with low incomes or those with disabilities, said Christopher Tokpah, student success specialist.

The grant funds services for about 300 students, Tokpah said, and the university provides additional money for all-access tutoring. Students sign up at the beginning of each semester. If there are more than 300 students, the Academic Success Center will try to accommodate them by giving them other options, such as open tutoring provided by the university.

From information students provide, the department can seek out students who may be in need of its services. Tokpah said the center will begin sending out information to the three target groups of students before classes start, so they can know what programs are available to them.

"We're trying to be a little more pro-active," he said.

Montanez said she had never heard of the programs, but she also said she does not feel she needs them. Academically, she said she has support from her teachers and her mother backs her decision to attend school.

Not all first-generation students have this kind of support, Padak said. Some parents dismiss college as an option, telling their children that it is an unnecessary step in the working world. Most fall between these two extremes, he said.

The main problem is that no one at home has the experience to guide them through common college problems, Tokpah said.

"They're trying to blend into an environment where they have no support from home," he said.

This gap can dissolve when students have siblings who attended college, Padak said. They are still considered first-generation, but have someone to show them the ropes.

Peer groups pose another social challenge, Padak said. If a student is from a lower-income area and classmates are not attending college, it is likely that the student will also not attend.

However, the opposite also applies. If everyone in a student's peer group is attending school, the student may find a way so he or she can also attend.

Marriage debate here to stay

David Lawrence

Like it or not, the virulent gay marriage debate has a healthy future in Massachusetts. With one proposal banning the divisive practice set to mark ballots in 2006 and an amendment that likely won't be voted on until 2008 currently in the works, the polarizing question is going to have plenty of political wind in its sails for the foreseeable future.

Last Wednesday, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom "democratic candidate for governor in 2006" Reilly ruled that the state constitution permits a new ballot initiative to go forward that would ban gay marriage and make no room for civil unions. The decision comes as a civil unions-friendly initiative makes headway through the legislature as two to three gay couples tie the knot here in Massachusetts each day. Here's an interesting question: What happens to the gay and married if the state bans future marriages?

This victimizing characteristics of the gay marriage debate sets it apart from nearly every other politicai issue because it attacks so strongly the core beliefs of people.

The problem with the gay marriage debate from a social standpoint is that it is so divisive. People on both sides of the issue feel like they are being attacked, and amendments passed in 19 states so far have brought about anger and frustration in a broad way unseen since 1973 when the Roe vs. Wade decision banned anti-abortion laws and gave birth to the religious right. In 2005, the grown-up religious right is locked in another social struggle that could grow far uglier than even the pro-choice/pro-life debate.

The gay marriage debate is particularly poisonous because it is a victimizing debate. People on either side of the issue feel that they're being attacked. Those who align themselves against gay marriage feel that their ideas and sensibilities are threatened by the concept of a redefined marriage that defies their social codes. Those who align themselves in favor of gay marriage feel that the rights and worth of homosexuals as people are called into question by attempts to limit their ability to marry. A homosexual individual can't help but see the gay marriage debate as an attack on his or her way of life; individuals with certain religious backgrounds see the gay marriage debate as an attack on their faith.

This victimizing characteristic of the gay marriage debate sets it apart from nearly every other political issue because it attacks so strongly the core beliefs of people. It is easy to get upset about taxes, blaming the rich or getting fired up about spending your own money, but in any case taxes are a burden that people don't like to pay, and they aren't going to feel that their way of life is called into question by the tax code. Even conflicts in foreign affairs realistically only victimize unwilling soldiers and their families here at home. Yes, those in other countries that we attack are victimized, but they don't qualify in terms of domestic strife in the political arena. Only one other issue, abortion, parallels gay marriage in victimizing both its opponents and proponents.

Despite its similar victimizing quality, the abortion issue does not hit as hard as gay marriage because the people involved in the abortion debate aren't personally affected by the decision: in the course of the average person's life they are probably not going to have an abortion, but they will almost definitely marry. Whether you are gay or straight, the definition of "marriage" matters when you marry. The debate over the definition of marriage will eventually trump abortion as the most nocuous "dodge that question" issue in the political arena because it legitimately affects the lives of so many people.

It is hard to see the light at the end of the tunnel on this issue. The conflict between ideologies it represents doesn't have any apparent resolution except further strife and more hurt feelings. However this debate is framed and carried out; it's going to be ugly. My suggestion: keep the other guys in mind and find the compromise. Good luck Massachusetts.

Poverty, CEO pay rise with the flood

Mike Sances

On Aug. 30, as the chaos of Katrina was reaching its worst point and the floodwaters rose, the United States Census Bureau announced that the national poverty rate had risen to 37 million people in 2004, an increase of 1.1 million from the previous year. At 12 percent of the population, it was the fourth such increase in as many years.

The following day, The Wall Street Journal reported the results of a study by the Institute for Policy Studies, which found that the average CEO saw his or her pay increase 7 percent between 2001 and 2004, or from 301 to 431 times the pay of the average American worker. For defense CEOs, the study found, the increase was 200 percent.

Any shock felt at reading these figures is likely to be proportionate to that felt toward our country's collective failure to protect the weakest in New Orleans, both before and after the hurricane struck the other week. In light of the shameful income inequality in the richest country in the world - in which, perhaps due to American exceptionalism, we rank far beyond all the other industrialized nations — the hurricane disaster makes perfect sense.

"George Bush doesn't care about black people!" Rapper Kanye West caused quite a fuss when he offered this explanation for the federal government's slow response, live on national television. A more qualified, if no less simplistic, explanation would replace "black" with "poor."

To be fair, however, we should consider replacing "George Bush" with "We the people." "We the people" do not care about poor people. After all, how much time did you spend thinking about the plight of the estimated 30 percent of New Orleans residents who lived below the poverty line before the levees broke? I never did, not for one second.

If "We the people" had given a damn about the victims of the hurricane (or the Asian tsunami, for that matter), we wouldn't have let them live in such misery in the first place. This is not to say that the country isn't showing considerable compassion now that the storm has passed, or that donating to relief agencies isn't worth it. But if we want to pass around blame, to assign responsibility and therefore ensure that something like this doesn't happen again, we can start right here, by looking in the mirror.

If "We the people" had given a damn about the victims of the hurricane (or the Asian tsunami, for that matter), we wouldn't have let them live in such misery in the first place.

In this sense, the president as an individual actually is a lot like you and I, and "doesn't care" in much the same way as we don't. Unfortunately, we do not vote for individuals, but policies, and it can be said with some confidence that the Bush White House's economic and foreign policies have contributed in no small part to the increase in income equality, the lack of available federal funds for the levees in New Orleans, the war profiteering of defense industry CEOs, a third of the Louisiana National Guard and all of its equipment being deployed in Iraq, etc.

And, save for the occasional callous slip, like when he lamented the destruction of one of Trent Lott's extra homes during his first visit to the affected area after the hurricane hit, Bush himself is probably quite caring and compassionate. Even the worst monsters in human history were the same way. Go read what Thomas Merton or Hannah Arendt had to say about Adolf Eichmann. Like the bureaucrat, the president in his bubble is entirely removed from all aspects of his administration's policies, save the rhetoric. Arendt called this "the banality of evil;" Merton paradoxically called it "sanity." In the real world, as the victims can attest, the results are anything but. Compassionate leaders may calmly execute policies of mass murder.

To prevent another disaster from happening will require all of us to start thinking critically, which men like Eichmann never could do, and to educate ourselves and engage with one another on crucial social topics like poverty. It will require a fundamental (re)examination of the kind of society we live in. In part, this has already been initiated by the underlying and obvious injustices of Katrina, and there has been some talk of poverty being placed on the national political agenda.

But if this is to happen, it can only be as the result of the efforts of everyday citizens. To believe otherwise, to fancy that this or any other positive change will be executed by benevolent politicians acting out of the simple goodness of their own hearts, is indeed far more naïve, and more utopian, than is even the notion of eliminating poverty forever, or ensuring free health care for all.

Fixing our Latin American ties

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

Developments in Latin America over the past three months indicate that U.S. foreign policy in the hemisphere is obsolete and demanding of reevaluation. Chilean Jose Miguel Insulza was elected secretary-general of the Organization of American States (OAS) in a landslide over the two U.S.-backed candidates. President Carlos Mesa fell in Bolivia to massive street protests, though the manifestations were far less violent than the ones that toppled his predecessor, Gonzalo Sanchez de Lozada. Nicaraguan President Enrique Bolaños has been stripped of much of his presidential authority by an unlikely parliamentary alliance of Sandinistas and Liberals, and for a time did not appear likely to finish his term.

Alfredo Palacio, the Ecuadorian Vice President who assumed power after Congress relieved President Lucio Gutierrez of duty in April, has not managed to assuage the concerns of much of the population, and currently strikes have paralyzed portions of the country's petroleum production and led Venezuela to provide Petroecuador with 88,300 barrels per day to help it maintain its trade agreements. Finally, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez has used skyrocketing oil prices to consolidate a 71 percent domestic approval rating through social programs benefiting the poor and to initiate strategic energy agreements in the Caribbean as well as the Andean and Southern Cone regions of South America. Citing national security concerns, Venezuela has also terminated military training and anti-narcotics collaboration with the United States.

The continued eminence of the Left in many Latin American countries is as much an expression of the people's desire for socially-responsible policy as it is a rejection of U.S. influence and Washington Consensus economics in the region. As a result, Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) is completely off the table, indigenous rights champion and cocalero Evo Morales is in a strong position for the Bolivian elections in December, and U.S.-loathed Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega is the frontrunner for next year's Nicaraguan elections ("next year" assumes that President Bolaños remains in power through the end of his term).

While the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) is to some extent an exception to the trend, it accomplishes almost nothing as far as bolstering the United States' status or presence in the region. Its narrow passage in the House of Representatives surprised many and was the result of strategically located agricultural lobbies and pressure on Republican representatives by the president.

The passage of CAFTA infers four significant conclusions. First, the United States was unable to even maintain dialogue on the FTAA and instead vested all of its efforts into a largely symbolic economic pact with the region. Second, the new U.S. policy toward the Central American-Dominican Republic Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA-DR) bloc ignores that those countries are of far greater geo-strategic than economic value to the United States and therefore risks politically alienating the respective populations by destroying key sectors of their economies.

Third, the demand that Central America and the Dominican Republic bear the same trade responsibility as the United States demonstrates our inability to continue shouldering the miniscule weight of the economic regime. When the dominant state in an alliance - whether it is economic, military or otherwise - demands that other members reciprocate measures and take equal responsibility in the agreement, it is a sure sign of its decline. Finally, implementation of the agreement could prove problematic with so much resistance in Congress and in the CAFTA countries, particularly if Ortega is elected in Nicaragua and Venezuela continues to consolidate its petroleum alliances.

Even the Dominican Republic, which is by far the largest economy of the six Latin American states, is not orienting its economy exclusively toward CAFTA: just weeks before hooking up with the Central American trade pact, President Leonel Fernandez signed on to President Chavez's Petrocaribe deal through which most of the island's petroleum will be Venezuelan and construction is already underway for a heavy crude refinery on the Caribbean island. Many in the Dominican Republic are also suspicious that subsidized U.S. sugarcane will displace the country's principal cash crop.

The best way for the U.S. to save face in Latin America is to place greater emphasis on encouraging dialogue and strategic economic development. It is entirely counterproductive to antagonize the Chavezes, the Moraleses, and the Ortegas of the region at a time when they are increasingly popular. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Roger Noriega learned that lesson the hard way and now the State Department has nominated Tom Shannon to replace him. If democracy is the key concern, then the United States must go through the OAS and support the spirit of the Inter-American Democratic Charter, channels that have been utilized in Ecuador, Nicaragua and Venezuela. Unilateral criticisms and uneven trade policies will merely lead to undesired results for the United States and, more importantly, the region.

There must also be a newfound focus on addressing social and economic issues in Latin America and the Caribbean rather than simply treating democracy as a purely civic-political concept. The inability of the U.S. government to recognize the disconnect between their strategic goals in the region and the social goals of most of the region's leaders will isolate it from Latin American capitals and make positive relations increasingly difficult with our neighbors.

The value of an image

Jessica Zolotorofe

As a nation, we are plagued with frequent tragedies and it is the responsibility of the media to report on the events as honestly as possible — minus the sugarcoating. But where do we draw the line?

We have young kids peering in dismay at the morning paper on their stoops, or watching the news and seeing images of bloated corpses, or lines of body bags after the Tsunami or Katrina. There were the pictures of people jumping from the 50th floor of the World Trade Center a few years ago, and what about the close-ups of Vanessa Snelgrove bleeding to death after she was shot by a police officer during a Red Sox riot in Boston last season. I initially thought that it was necessary to use pictures to show us what's really going on in the world, but now I feel like there have been too many issues where the press has gone too far.

The media constantly faces the battle between accuracy and sensitivity and which overrides the other in their duty to the people. The front page pictures of Snelgrove lying helpless on a sidewalk raised a ton of controversy as to whether the image was appropriate.

We discussed the matter in one of my journalism classes and as my professor passed around the paper, we heard a sob come from the back of the room. A student who had been avoiding the pictures all day had just seen them for the first time. Vanessa Snelgrove was her cousin and childhood friend. She was extremely disturbed by the graphic images. While I had originally condoned the images being in the paper, I began to change my mind as I saw the effect it had on people who knew the victims. Looking back, I am sympathetic to the people who know and love the victims and have to see their dying bodies on the front of every paper in the country, and every news station around. It's just not fair.

I understand that the nation would have been censored and deprived of knowing the true severity of the situation had the media decided against using them; I just can't seem to get the idea out of my head that these are real people, with real families and loved ones.

I also recall watching a program on TV about a woman who saw her son jumping from the World Trade Center before he was even confirmed missing. It brought tears to my eyes and I once again was disgusted by the decision the press had made in that circumstance. I understand that the nation would have been censored and deprived of knowing the true severity of the situation had the media decided against using them; I just can't seem to get the idea out of my head that these are real people, with real families and loved ones.

And here's another issue ... we are constantly stormed by graphic images, and as the shock factor diminishes, we are becoming desensitized to the horror of such events. Americans have always loved horror movies and the bloody gore of action films like the "Kill Bill" series, but the line between reality and Hollywood is quickly becoming blurry. We are gaining the ability to pretend that these events are just another scary movie. That in itself is frightening. There has to be a more tasteful, yet equally powerful, way to get these messages through to the public.

News organizations claim that the images they use are carefully chosen and that they do decide against using thousands of graphic pictures every month. For example, when American Nick Berg was beheaded in Iraq, the videos and images were all over the Internet. However, many major news outlets decided against publishing these images in papers and on TV, and of those that did, they usually used a front page warning and placed the pictures on inner pages - protecting children and adults who did not want to see them. Perhaps if more events were handled with this level of sensitivity, we would be facing less of a problem.

In a recent Associated Press Managing Editor's survey, five pictures were shown to journalists and readers. They were each asked whether, if it was their choice, if they would run the picture or not. The pictures included a mother surrounding her children who had been killed by the Tsunami, the executions of two Iraqi election workers by terrorists in Baghdad, a seriously wounded American soldier in Iraq, flag-draped coffins of American soldiers being shipped back to the United States, and an American awaiting his destiny as terrorists stand behind, about to behead him. In every case the journalists responded in a significantly higher percentage in favor of using the images than the readers did.

Our country needs to be reminded that our soldiers and fellow Americans, as well as people all over the world, are experiencing these things. Instead of barbecuing and playing beach volleyball on our days off for Memorial Day and Veteran's Day, we should be taking the time to realize that the images and stories we encounter in the news are real people who have been injured or lost their lives.

I feel that there is something ethically and morally wrong about publishing a picture of a wounded or deceased soldier on the front page of a newspaper before his parents even find out he has passed away.

It is a pretty tough call and it is never easy to please everyone. Still, I find that all we can do as a society is offer a helping hand any time we can, and think of the families and friends of each victim and take a moment to really let it sink in that these people are real. If we must see such horrific images in the news, the least we can do is feel true compassion towards their loved ones and understand their pain and suffering.

"Howl" is ambitious and interesting but perhaps not coincidentally it fails in exactly the same ways previous BRMC releases did. It is not particularly original, it drags, and there are simply too many bands out there doing the same thing, but better. It sounds like the band is trying, but between its stale music, stale lyrics, and stale ideas BRMC takes what could have been an amazing makeover and lets it slip away.

Boston Pops and Josh Groban bring the music to Tanglewood

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

Thousands of music-goers settled on the spacious grounds of Tanglewood, Aug. 27 to attend Film Night with the Boston Pops. Amidst the backdrop of the beautiful Berkshires, conductor John Williams returned along with famed Hollywood producer Stanley Donen and special guest vocalist Josh Groban.

Due to film scoring commitments, it was John Williams's only formal Tanglewood appearance this summer and an appreciative crowd welcomed him warmly.

Williams began the film concert with a lively rendition of Erich Korngold's "Robin Hood March" originating in the 1938 movie, "The Adventures of Robin Hood." Williams next paid tribute to three film music composers who died last year: Jerry Goldsmith with the theme song of the movie, "Star Trek: The Motion Picture;" Elmer Bernstein, his music, "The Magnificent Seven," which was also from a movie of the same name; and a beautiful haunting rendition of David Raskin's "Laura" from that movie with an exquisite solo from guest violinist Tamira Smirnova.

Eighty-one-year-old Stanley Donen exchanged anecdotes with Williams. Having worked together several years earlier, Donen remarked, "It's a most wonderful night for me to see John doing this." Classic dance routines archived from Donen's famous movie musicals decades ago were flashed across widescreen TVs to those inside the Shed and to thousands who brought everything from chairs and tables laden with food and potables, candles and candelabras to the colorful yet simple blankets spread along the grassy slopes. Performances included those by Gene Kelly, "Singing in the Rain" and with Kelly and Jerry Mouse in "Anchors Away." Also shown was Fred Astaire in "Royal Wedding" and "Seven Brides for Seven Brothers." While playing on the screens, scenes of elegance in dance to a series of rousing dance steps, John Williams and his Boston Pops adeptly synchronized their music with the various film clips, the result a perfect mesh of past and present. Donen related how several techniques were utilized when Fred Astaire seemingly and effortlessly danced up the walls and across the ceiling. The audience laughed as Donen recalled going to see Walt Disney at Disney studios to recruit Mickey Mouse for Anchors away only to be chastised by Mr. Disney with the words, "Mickey Mouse does not work for MGM."

Perhaps the largest crowd of the summer, over 19,000, chose this event in part because of special guest Josh Groban. It was a night, said Josh Groban, for the "Grobanites" to meet the "Tangleheads." While admitting his nervousness at performing

Sunset Sernade welcomes the eclectic voices of three women

By Jana Katz
Collegian Staff

If a woman sings without baring an almost-naked chest and no tabloids know her name, let alone write about her sexual exploits and fluctuating weight gain, will she make a noise? Three unique and bold artists are laying this question to rest on Friday evening, Sept. 16, at Mount Holyoke's Gettel Amphitheater from 6:30 to 9:00 p.m. In coordination with the Something Every Friday performance series, the Mount Holyoke College Office of Student Programs is hosting this year's Sunset Serenade. As an autumn sun sinks into the horizon and the moon comes out to play, German-born international charmer, Antje Duvekot, New York's youthful storyteller, Jaymay, and the provocatively soulful singer-songwriter, Nedra Johnson will astonish listeners with their wisdom, humor, and sound.

Bring blankets and bug spray but leave wallets at home. This free event will take place rain or shine. In-climate weather will move the show to the Blanchard Campus Center and push back the starting time to seven thirty.

Duvekot has been compared to Joni Mitchell and Paul Simon. Originally from Heidelberg, Germany, she gained notability after a 2002 tour with the Irish super-group SOLAS, who also released two of Duvekot's songs on their album "The Edge of Silence." Duvekot's lyrics need no melodic accompaniment; her songs are full of thoughtful one-liners that are complete by themselves. Duvekot calls "Merrygoround" her bluegrass tune on which she plays a mandolin while singing. "If the devil don't dance, heaven won't shine." Songs off her new album, "Boys, Flowers, Miles[I]" include some clips from live shows. Duvekot introduces "Hammster", one of her slower and graver tunes, to the audience: "I write songs about people that I meet when I don't know them very well yet and then I fantasize about them and then I meet them for real. So this is the song right when I just didn't meet him very much," she said and then laughed with the audience.

Jaymay has visited the Amherst area before, having made many stops here with Valley favorite Stephen Kellogg. Fusing ragtime piano, confessional poetry, and vocal improvisation, Jaymay "has a talent for taking girl-with-a-guitar conventions and nudging them just enough left of center that your aesthetic sense becomes conscious of experiencing something new," according to WOMANROCK magazine. At times thin and airy, and then suddenly deep and somber, Jaymay blurs the lines between folk and jazz. She sings unforgettable lyrics with the rhythm of an entertaining conversation. "What happened?" tells an old love story like it has never been heard before. "One day you spoke to me/you whispered so eloquently/I'm eggshell walkin'/on the postcard I'll send/what happened."

The Village Voice calls Johnson "irrepressibly sexy." "She is unapologetically queer and graciously thankful to the women's music scene," according to Kris Scott Marti at AfterEllen.com. Like an acoustic incarnation of Big Mama Thorton and Ani DiFranco, in "Mitchfest Blues," Johnson sounds like a smiling maverick ready to push the envelope at any cost. Other songs combine funky baselines (think Stevie Wonder's "Higher Ground") and a harmonizing synthesizer in the background leaving behind an early-'90s smooth jazz feel. Johnson has been known to perform the occasional Kurt Cobain cover. She bridges the feel of listening to old blues greats with cutting edge lyrics addressing social issues and what it's like to love the modern woman.

These three vocalists should provide an eclectic mix of entertainment on Friday evening. Miriam Janove, a senior at Mount Holyoke who works in the Office of Student Programs, said, "we'd be glad to have Five College students and community members" attend these lively performances. Previous artists that have performed at the Sunset Serenade include Eddie Carey, Katie Curtis, and Doria Roberts.

Musicians poured out their hearts for a weekend of charity

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

The strangest but greatest thing happened over the weekend: Roughly 10 hours of unfiltered, heartfelt live music was aired on a variety of cooperating television outlets.

The majority of it was commercial-free and left to speak for itself. Half could be seen on MTV, which scarcely shows 10 hours of uninterrupted live music in a month these days.

Of course we know why this occurred: to raise money for the victims of Hurricane Katrina displaced throughout the Gulf Coast. This being both music- and disaster-related, there was a clear emphasis on the demolition of New Orleans, one of the key birthplaces of American music.

But if you only caught Friday's "Shelter From the Storm" - televised on all major networks and, at press time, still streaming online at Yahoo! Music - well, you merely saw the introduction.

A superb, quietly wrenching one, that is, staged by the people responsible for the 9/11 telethon "America: A Tribute to Heroes." Riveting appearances from two legendary piano men born in New Orleans - Randy Newman, his eerie tale of another flood, "Louisiana 1927," now some kind of anthem for this tragedy, and Dr. John, who revived the Fats Domino tune "Walkin' to New Orleans" - bookended the hour-long special. It was a telecast teeming with memorable turns introduced by moving pleas from, among others, Jack Nicholson, Julia Roberts, Ellen DeGeneres and Jennifer Aniston.

The selections were fitting, and unlike four years ago, not everyone felt the need to stay somber; Foo Fighters, led by Dave Grohl in CCR wear, delivered a roaring version of "Born on the Bayou," while Garth Brooks came out of retirement to sing with Trisha Yearwood on a more literal "Who'll Stop the Rain?"

In some instances solemnity mingled with teary-eyed jubilation, as when Paul Simon dusted off a spookier "Take Me to the Mardi Gras," then capped it by falling into darkness while a N'awlins band let loose. Alicia Keys brought gospel with Shirley Caesar and other stars of the genre. The Dixie Chicks offered a song of hope backed by Tom Petty's Heartbreakers and Robert Randolph on slide guitar.

U2 enlisted Mary J. Blige to enliven "One" at a stop in Toronto. Neil Young brought in a new piece, "When God Made Me," from his coming "Prairie Wind" album - which would have been a crass move were the song not so profound.

Kanye West, despite fears that he'd erupt once more after his comments about President Bush were censored during the previous week's NBC fundraiser, confined his remarks to a few altered lines of "Jesus Walks." This time, it was Chris Rock who got off an inscrutable, unscripted barb: "George Bush hates midgets."

But there was much more. Partly overlapping with "Shelter" was BET's "SOS: Saving OurSelves," which featured Keys performing "If I Ain't Got You," Patti LaBelle covering the Pretenders' "I'll Stand by You" and Jay-Z and Diddy presenting a $1 million check on behalf of the New York hip-hop community.

And Saturday night's "ReAct Now: Music + Relief" concert, aired simultaneously on MTV, VH1 and CMT, was the most heartrending of all. It was so stirring (much of it done "Unplugged"-style and without commercials or much between-song chatter), it was as if MTV Networks was trying to make up for its completely incompetent handling of Live 8 two months ago.

The compelling turns are too many to name, but while looking on in amazement that Buckwheat Zydeco and the Neville Brothers were actually on MTV, I jotted down some favorites I won't soon forget: Trent Reznor reclaiming his "Hurt" from the late Johnny Cash; Beck looking like a bearded Dylan singing "Everybody's Got to Learn Sometimes"; Melissa Etheridge premiering an a cappella blues she had just written, "Four Days"; segments from Coldplay and Pearl Jam, the latter preceded by an indictment of the government's response from Eddie Vedder; and a harrowing "Under the Bridge" from Red Hot Chili Peppers.

"Sometimes out of really horrible things come really beautiful things," Anthony Keidis pointed out. "I think that's happening right now."

Indeed. Not only was it an exceptional weekend of ego-free charity, it was the perfect way to memorialize the passing of another 9/11. Might I suggest we do this every year?

When We Break
Saddle Creek Records

When Saddle Creek Records releases an album, a listener should expect a couple things: one being that the band is from Omaha, NE and the other being that they know how to rock. With their latest release, Criteria's "When We Break," both expectations are quickly met.

Back in 1998, former Cursive guitarist Stephen Pedersen left Omaha for what everyone felt was for good when he packed up and left for law school in NC and started a new band called The White Octave, but they were wrong.

With the life of a corporate lawyer not living up to his expectations, Pedersen left the law community and went back to Omaha.

Once back in Omaha, Pederson wrote some songs and recorded most of them all by himself under the band name Criteria. Those songs became 2003's "En Garde," which was initially released by initial Records, soon to be re-released by Saddle Creek Records later this fall.

Shortly after completing the album, Pederson got some friends together to tour for the new project. Those new friends were drummer Mike Sweeney, who has played with Bright Eyes, bassist A.J. Mogis from We'd Rather Be Flying, and guitarist Aaron Druery joined Pedersen.

Entering Initial Records, the bands old label was Saddle Creek Records, signs Criteria to their roster, where Cursive, Bright Eyes, among other bands still call home even after the major labels come calling.

Criteria is more rock and roll then the other bands on Saddle Creek's roster, which contains bands and songwriters that are usually less intense, however, Criteria is just not one of those bands, this shows quickly on "When We Break." When the lyrics do turn captive, the songs manage to stay upbeat, most likely because Pederson has gone from one dream job to another in the last five years.

The sound of the album is similar to the sound of Pederson's work with early Cursive. At other times the riffs sound like Ted Leo and the Pharmacists, a comparison in a positive sense.

Since rocking comes first and lyrics come second to Pederson, the band is a pleasant surprise to the roster, offering eastily one of their best albums of the year.

The Kills

7.5/10

No Wow
RCA

Rock and Roll has a long history of couples breaking up bands when they break up, but that doesn't mean every band with a couple is bound to break up. An example of this is the duo The Kills.

The Kills have been together since 2000 after they met in London, a year before when singer VV, also known as Alison Mosshart, spat in the face of guitarist Hotel, also known as Jamie Hince, when VV's former band Discount was on tour.

The two hit it off before they parted ways, they swapped numbers and addresses. Every chance they got, they would write each other letters and send other items such as mix tapes.

Allison moved in with Jaime back in 2000 and shortly thereafter they formed the duo now known as The Kills and gave each other the very stage names they now use. Fast forward to 2005, the band and the romance is still going strong and they just released their latest album and major label debut this past Spring titled "No Wow." Recorded in Harbor, ME, the band escaped their typical surroundings and recorded the album the way they wanted to.

"No Wow" continues right where 2003's "Keep On Your Mean Side" with a blue's tinged artsy rock vibe throughout the album.

For newcomers concerning The Kills, imagine a Kim Gordon fronted White Stripes with a drum machine - that's the sound of The Kills.

While the album is definitely complete with a similar sound throughout each track, that is the very fault with the album. A mere two members is not enough to keep each song really interesting.

Songs such as "Sweet Cloud" start loud and promising, but by the end the song just fizzles and becomes eerily repetitive as VV yells off into the song's end that makes you wait too long.

Another downer for the album is the ballad track "Rodeo Clown." Here is wise choice to market the band into a wider audience, but other then that the song is better off as a b-side on some import seven inch that vinyl junkies can enjoy.

This is Me Smiling

Self Titled
The Vinyl Summer

There's something about the debut album by Chicago-based band This Is Me Smiling that I can't put my finger on. Indie-pop and indie-rock are two genres full to the brim with bands trying too hard and coming across as phony, but this band does not. Maybe it's because of their story.

So when This Is Me Smiling was formed after the demise of Retro Morning, former members Dan, Matt and Sheldon found themselves still writing songs. They decided to record these songs even though they do not have a permanent drummer or any goals for the project.

Enter Mike Felumlee from a late Chicago rock band, the Smoking Popes, and the band would be complete for the time being. Drumming on one song on the album was done by former Smashing Pumpkins drummer Matt Walker, also from Chicago.

The album was produced by Sean O'Keefe, who has also produced albums by other Chicago bands such as Fall Out Boy.

Since the recording of the album, Felumlee has left the band to pursue the family life. Adam, from the late funk band Bumpus, took over behind the drums.

The time spent in the studio resulted in This Is Me Smiling's debut album, an album full of poppy rock and roll with a hint of '80s synth-pop similar to the late band Ozma, and the use of the jazz piano and organ similar to the style of Something Corporate. This Is Me Smiling shows vast potential with this album.

A high note: a female vocal performance is spread throughout the album.

Another high note for the album is that it contains 13 songs that blend together quite well, but still vary slightly with upbeat music and moderately down lyrics. When the lyrics are in fact down, the music stays upbeat to keep the band from being labeled as an emo band.

Team Sleep

9/10

Team Sleep
Maverick

The Deftones have always been a contentious, controversial band amongst their fans and critics. They are purveyors of hard, crunchy riffs but frontman Chino Moreno is just as famous for his dreamlike singing and cryptic lyrics as his blood-curdling scream. Moreno has been the public advocate of more mellow, spacey tracks while some of his bandmates have openly remarked that they prefer to stick to the harder stuff. While Moreno is no doubt going to continue to push his influences on his main band, his more-than-a-side-project, Team Sleep, has released the album that he has always hinted at having in him.

Team Sleep is heavy on tape loops, drum machines, and electronic manipulations and sounds but they aren't an electro band. Team Sleep is dreamy futuristic shoegazing, mixing in equal elements of My Bloody Valentine, Catherine Wheel, and The Cure. People that are looking for heavy guitars won't find much to like in Team Sleep, but people that may have written off the Deftones long ago may find themselves finally seeing Moreno's artistry. However he is not the only star of the show: Pinback's Rob Crow sings a handful of songs, and singer/songwriter Mary Timony makes a few vocal appearances as well. Musically, Moreno contributes but it's his teammates Todd Wilkinson, DJ Crook, Zach Hill, and Rick Verrett that paint the full picture with huge lush sounds.

Team Sleep doesn't rest on their laurels, either: the band takes the extra step of experimenting and pushing their own limits. "Tomb of Liegia" is lead by a haunting guitar line and melody but begins with an excellent tape-loop manipulation that stutters and subtly obliterates the quiet guitar drops. "King Diamond" is in some ways the most aggressive song on the album despite the fact there is no guitar or any particularly loud instrumental parts. It is the hip-hop beat and futuristic sounds that back Moreno up as he shouts exclamations against Timony's plaintive lines in a bizarre pseudo-duet that proves Moreno doesn't need to scream to sound more authentically pissed off then a hoard of metal-heads. Team Sleep is the type of band that doesn't come around very often and their debut album, which was many years in the making, is heads-and-tails above the competition. "Team Sleep" is a great album by any standards; disregard famous band members and prior biases and all that's left is a startlingly realized, bold record that is bound to wake a lot of people up.

John Vanderslice's fifth album isn't drastically different from his previous work but it isn't just another step forward either. "Pixel Revolt" is easily Vanderslice's most ambitious and musically advanced album to date. Sticking with the formula of acoustic and electric guitars, bass, and drums mixed in with different keyboards, strings and horns of all types, tape loops, and countless different tones and moods, Vanderslice and his main accomplice Scott Solter maintain their reputation as sonic adventurers as much as conventional musicians.

Indeed the songs on "Pixel Revolt" do still follow conventional verse/chorus/verse progressions, but, as always, what makes Vanderslice special is what he does within the confines of pop/rock. "Peacocks in the Video Rain" is lead by a bouncy piano line and a backing line of Hammonds and Wurlitzer. In "Dear Sarah Shu," Vanderslice's guitar serves more as an additional instrument then the basis of the song. "Radiant Terror" has a fierce acoustic guitar strum throughout that is echoed in massive bells that ring throughout the song.

Vanderslice's willingness to experiment and ear for both music and sound has always made him stand out far beyond peers like Death Cab For Cutie. And while in many ways Vanderslice continues to improve from album to album, there is a feel of something lacking in "Pixel Revolt." Vanderslice and his cohorts have become better musicians and have truly mastered the subtle sound effects and atmospheres: Vanderslice has even become a better singer. However, most of the songs aren't as instantly memorable as the tracks on 2004's "Cellar Door"; which isn't inherently a bad thing. The more one listens to "Pixel Revolt," the better it becomes, which is always a sign of good art. Its ambitiousness proves a more difficult listen than previous albums; however upon further listens "Pixel Revolt" is an ultimately rewarding listen and should prove to be a landmark in Vanderslice's career.

with John Williams, the tousled hair 24-year-old appeared comfortable soon after he began his too-brief stint. Songs selected from movies included Charlie Chaplin's "Smile" from "Modern Times" and "Remember" from the movie flop "Troy," to which Groban quipped, "I sang in the movie but I wasn't in it." Grobanites reverently waved their lite sticks to his rendition of "Vincent," (Starry Starry Night) from the less known movie "Starry Night." Groban's strength lies in his delivery, a soft and soothing baritone style.

Williams concluded the concert with his own music, beginning with the march from "Superman", music from "Jurassic Park", "Close Encounters of the Third Kind", "ET, the Extra-Terrestrial" and "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone." Judging from the applause, the collection was well received and John Williams and the Boston Pops will return to this delightful music center in Lenox, Massachusetts.

drive the ball past Vermont goalie Ariel Eber to give UMass a 1-0 advantage.

Freshman Mary Shea was able to tip home her first career goal just 73 seconds later as she redirected Woolfrey's free hit to give the Minutewomen the 2-0 lead they would hold onto until the game's final minutes.

Sunday's contest against Sacred Heart had no shortage of drama either, as a Minutewoman freshman was able to score her first career goal in the final minute to give her team a victory.

With just seven seconds remaining and the score locked at 1-1, Erin Parker delivered the game-winner when she was able to beat Sacred Heart goalie Ashley Del Greco, who made a game-high 12 saves.

"When we were composed, we controlled the play," Patty Shea said. "What hurt us is when we were not composed. We became a victim of the ball and made too many mental mistakes. I am so pleased with our resiliency to come back for the second straight game and win it in regulation."

UMass again scored the game's first goal during the first half. Parker took the ball down the left side of the field and passed it across the circle to Orlando, who picked up where she left off on Saturday by one-timing a shot into the back of the net for her second goal of the weekend.

Nicole Phelan and the UMass field hockey team will play two more games this weekend. Phelan has two points so far this season.

Sacred Heart was able to tie the game with just over 18 minutes remaining in the second half when Becky Ford tipped Colleen Carney's penalty corner past Minutewoman goalie Becky Letourneau.

Sox will need strong pitching

Schilling of old.

The garrulous hurler has not recovered from the infamous ankle injury and — in his first appearance as a reliever against the Yankees with an inherited lead — received an emphatic "Welcome back" from Gary Sheffield and Alex Rodriguez (triple crown, anybody?), who promptly doubled and homered to erase the illusion that Schilling would return to his former self anytime soon.

Bronson Arroyo, along with creating a rocked-out version of the Standells' "Dirty Water" (which is nothing special), has morphed into a batting practice machine on his off-nights and has been saved from a ghastly record this season by the Sox's relentless offense.

Tim Wakefield has been, as always, the consummate teammate and professional. This is a guy who takes pride in putting on his spikes every day, and will do anything asked of him, even if it means saving the team at his expense — a.k.a. taking the ball in Game 3 of the American League Championship Series last year when the Sox were getting shelled and clearly out of the game.

By taking up innings that would have been reserved for Foulke, Timlin and Embree, Wake single-handedly saved the bullpen for the rest of the series. He is part of a dying breed of athletes who will sacrifice themselves and their statistics for the greater good of the ball club.

The bullpen is as shaky as ever. Keith "Payday is My Favorite Day" Foulke made his season debut recently and has looked mediocre at best. No one feels comfortable with Mike Timlin in the closer's role; his earned run average isn't bad, but whenever he inherits runners he is disturbingly inadequate in tight situations.

The minor league system has been put to use like never before, as most Sox fans — upon hearing about all of the young promising arms in Pawtucket - respond with an incredulous look and say some — thing like, "I didn't know we had a minor league system."

Jonathan Papelbon and Manny Delcarmen have made solid appearances for the Sox this year and the Sox brass is excited about these kids in the future. But as far as 2005 goes, there are conflicting opinions as to how to handle the young guns.

Papelbon has made the most appearances for Sox, starting three games and appearing in relief in six. Terry Francona has said that the team wants to be careful with Papelbon's psyche.

However, when the kid - who has been compared to a young Roger Clemens - gets into jams, the manager is quick to take him out and let more experienced arms take care of the runners. What kind of message does that send? Don't trust him enough to fight through tough situations?

The Sox have had a tenuous hold on the AL East lead for a while now, and while they have their problems on the rubber, they are fortunate that the Yankees have the same issues.

The difference between the Sox and Yanks - two teams with stellar hitting and sub-par pitching - right now is their home ballparks: while Yankee Stadium doesn't tailor to hitting, the Sox are cozy in the friendly confines of Fenway Park, a hitters' heaven and a pitchers' purgatory.

The AL East rivals have three games left, all at Fenway, and the Sox are in the driver's seat right now. But if the World Series banner hasn't erased your paranoia, the Boston pitching staff will be a little unnerving down the stretch.

lot of the College Football Hall of Famer as my teeth were yanked, although his humor before the process made the experience somewhat less excruciating.

Prior to the procedure, as the IV was about to be put into my arm, MacAfee instructed me to make a fist with my left hand in order to enlarge the vein.

"You can relax your fist now," MacAfee said, after the IV was stuck into my arm. "That is, unless you're going to use that left hook on me."

"I wouldn't dare," I responded instantly.

I was serious.

Two Bruins holdout

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Boston Bruins goalie Andrew Raycroft and defenseman Nick Boynton held out in contract disputes at the opening of training camp Monday, depriving the team of two keys to stopping opposing forwards under the NHL's more wide-open rules.

General manager Mike O'Connell wasn't sure if or when they'd return, although several Bruins players are confident that they'll be back before the regular season begins Oct. 5 at home against the Montreal Canadiens.

"Both these players are very important to us," O'Connell said. "They're terrific individuals and we'd like to get them in camp as soon as possible."

In 2003-04, Raycroft was the NHL rookie of the year and Boynton played in the All-Star game for the first time in his three full seasons. But the Bruins are close to the league's $39 million salary cap and want to leave some space to acquire players during the season if others get injured.

They have 17 players under contract for $33,129,004, according to the NHL Players Association, leaving them with $5,870,996 to spend.

The team hasn't disclosed how much it offered Raycroft and Boynton, but O'Connell said both received more than the minimum qualifying offer for a one-year deal. That offer must be at least a certain percentage of the player's last salary as specified in the collective bargaining agreement that ended the NHL lockout that wiped out the 2004-05 season.

"We're not very close at all right now with Andrew," O'Connell said. "I think Boynton is a little closer. If we can get him done, then maybe we can get Andrew done."

Team owner Jeremy Jacobs said the Bruins "enriched the team substantially in skill" by signing free agents but wondered if it had spent too much.

"I don't think we left ourselves enough room" under the salary cap, Jacobs said. He added that the offers to Raycroft and Boynton are in line with salaries of similar players in the NHL.

O'Connell said that he hasn't had any discussions about trading those players and that the team has some cap room left.

"If we feel we need to do something to get both these players in, we have the ability to do that," he said.

Several Bruins are optimistic both players will be back soon.

"Pretty much every year that I've been involved in the NHL there's been some player that hasn't been in camp or some contract dispute," said defenseman Brian Leetch, who played 15 full seasons with the New York Rangers before being traded to Toronto on March 3, 2004, and then signing with Boston on Aug. 3.

Bonds prepares for his return to MLB

By Janie McCauley
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Barry Bonds casually strolled into the dugout Monday for his pregame preparations with hordes of cameras clicking at his every move - even his brief stop at the water cooler.

The San Francisco Giants activated their star slugger from the 60-day disabled list Monday after months of rehabilitation on his troublesome right knee, which needed three operations since Jan. 31. He was expected to start in left field and batted cleanup in the opener of a three-game series against NL West-leading San Diego.

"Everybody knows what he can do," San Francisco shortstop Omar Vizquel said Monday. "Personally, I'm one of those players who came here to watch him play. Finally, the moment has come. Being on the field with him is going to be exciting."

Bonds has changed his stance about playing this season so many times that nobody could keep track of his true intentions. Now that he's healthy, Bonds will give it a go for the season's final three weeks, determined to gain ground in his quest for Hank Aaron's home run record.

This will be the 41-year-old Bonds' first time facing major league pitching in almost a year. He is third on the career list with 703 home runs, trailing only Babe Ruth (714) and Aaron (755). Bonds' last homer came against the Dodgers on Sept. 26, 2004, a solo shot off Jeff Weaver — one of seven homers Bonds hit in September last year.

"It's going to be hard, because he hasn't played in one year," Giants' Hall of Famer Orlando Cepeda said. "I don't care how good you are, baseball is a game of conditioning and timing. But, knowing him — he's so strong mentally — you never know. We'll see what happens. It's going to be very, very interesting to see."

Shutters were clattering by the dozen with every move made by No. 25, from the time he walked alone into the dugout for batting practice, three bats in his left hand and a glove in the other. Bonds wore black tights under his uniform pants to keep his muscles warm.

Bonds entered the game 6-for-19 with three homers lifetime against Adam Eaton, San Diego's starter in the opener of this three-game series.

UM wins two thrillers

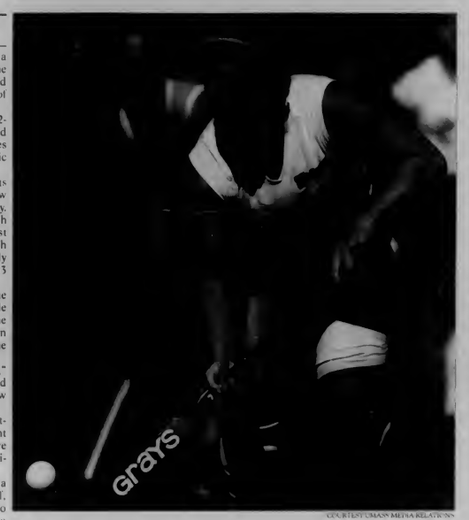
By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

After dropping its first four games of a 2005 season that is full of optimism, the Massachusetts field hockey team (2-4) rallied together over the weekend to pull off a pair of dramatic, last-second road victories.

UMass pulled off a 3-2 win at Vermont (2-4) on Saturday and a 2-1 win over Sacred Heart (0-7) the following day. Both games were played at Vermont's Post Athletic Complex.

The Maroon and White will wrap up its four-game road trip this weekend against New Hampshire on Saturday and Maine on Sunday.

The Minutewomen held a 2-0 lead with under seven minutes remaining against Vermont, but the Catamounts rallied back with goals from Danielle Collins and Kelly McClintock to tie the score with just 1:33 showing on the scoreboard.



Without the experience of winning a game this season, the Minutewomen were still able to show enough composure after losing the lead to get a game-winning goal from freshman Katelyn Orlando with 49 seconds left on the clock. It was Orlando's first career goal.

"We played very well [on Saturday]," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "We controlled the tempo but let our guard down to allow them back into the game.

"The sense of urgency that we demonstrated after Vermont tied the game is how I want us to play all the time. I am so pleased that we were able to come back and take care of business in regulation."

UMass senior Katelyn Woolfrey had a penalty corner 23 minutes into the first half, and she passed the ball across the circle to sophomore Nicole Phelan, who was able to

The UMass field hockey team was able to rebound and win two close contests this past weekend. The team had previously lost its first four games of the season.

NFL star found his way into oral surgery

Eric Athas

I admit it, sports consume my life. I've tried to convince people otherwise, but to be frank, it's an argument I will never win. I cannot remember any particular instance in which sports has not been an integral aspect of my existence. I play sports, I watch sports, I study sports, and I write about sports. Not to mention my preferred television show is Sportscenter and my favored magazine is Sports Illustrated.

This past summer, however, I realized that my life is completely soaked in the concept of sports when, well, even the simple act of having my wisdom teeth extracted was enormously sports-related.

Any average adolescent remembers the day that he had his wisdom teeth taken out. Whether it's the pain or the swelling, most reactions were along the lines of negativity. Conversely, for me, the event will always be outlined by one overriding detail: A former NFL player was the one who took my wisdom teeth out. That's right, my oral surgeon played for the 49ers in the 1970s.

It is only appropriate that a football legend like Ken MacAfee M.D. be the one to extract my four wisdom teeth. I can still remember sitting in the dentist chair three weeks before my scheduled extraction. MacAfee's thunderous thumping footsteps drew closer and closer. It was hard to believe: there I was, sitting in the awkwardly tilted chair, waiting for, not just an oral surgeon, but rather an athletic star.

An athlete that did not only attend Notre Dame during his college years, but caught 128 passes for 1,759 yards and 15 touchdowns as a tight end. An athlete that was a three-time All-American and finished third in the 1977 Heisman Trophy voting, the highest ranking of collegiate football players.

What was unexpected was the amiable personality of this 6-foot-4-inch, 250 lb. colossal figure that, needless to say, roomed with O.J. Simpson at one point during his NFL career. The second striking question that came to mind was how did a former football star end up as an oral surgeon?

I hit the Internet instantaneously following my pre-op to get the scoop on Ken. Following his NFL career with the 49ers and Notre Dame, MacAfee achieved his dental degree at the University of Pennsylvania. His post-football life began at that point and it is only fitting that 22 years later, he was pulling out my four wisdom teeth.

In a sports world that is notorious for countless troublesome athletes, it gives a glimmer of hope to sports fans like me to see someone like MacAfee.

On June 20, 2005, due to the sedation injected into me, I did not interact with or remember a whole

Saints will use two locations for games

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — The New Orleans Saints, left searching for a host site after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Superdome roof, announced plans Monday to split seven home games this season between Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge, La., and the Alamodome in San Antonio.

The Saints will play four games on the LSU campus and three in San Antonio, where they have been holding practice since fleeing New Orleans. They will go ahead with plans to play their first home game, originally scheduled for Sunday night at the Superdome against the Giants, on Monday night in New York.

While specific days and start times for the remaining home games were yet to be determined, the Saints said they will play in Baton Rouge the weekends of Oct. 30-31; Nov. 6-7; Dec. 4-5; and Dec. 17-19. The San Antonio games will be on the weekends of Oct. 2-3; Oct. 16-17; and Dec. 24-26.

"I think the time frame gives our fans time to get tickets or do whatever they have to do to get to the stadium," coach Jim Haslett said.

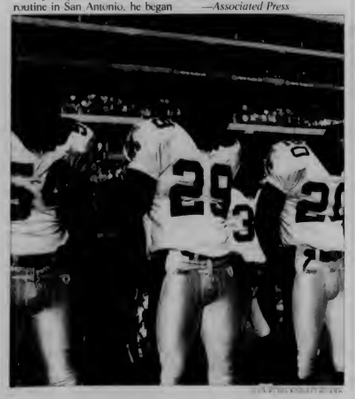
The four home games in Baton Rouge will be against Miami, Chicago, Tampa Bay and Carolina. The San Antonio games will be against Buffalo, Atlanta and Detroit.

Haslett initially said he wanted to play as many games in Louisiana as possible. But after spending last week getting settled into their new routine in San Antonio, he began hoping for more games to be at the Alamodome.

"It would have been nice to play here," he said. "It's more of a travel issue. I know what their agenda was, to play as many games as possible in our home state. Our players like that, too."

No decision was made on the site of potential Saints home playoff games. New Orleans won its season opener 23-20 at Carolina on Sunday.

Agreement on the schedule was reached after a meeting Monday in Baton Rouge involving Saints owner Tom Benson, NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue, LSU chancellor Sean O'Keefe and other school officials.



Tagliabue said those in attendance quickly reached a consensus on two priorities: to serve the needs of the region, and make a schedule that works for the Saints.

"We also appreciate the cooperation of the Alamodome officials and the hospitality of the people of San Antonio for their support of the Saints at this difficult time," Tagliabue said.

Benson scheduled a news conference for later Monday.

Saints season-ticket holders and anyone who had purchased tickets for the Giants-Saints game at the Superdome were given first call for tickets to the relocated game. After that, however, Giants season-ticket holders were given priority, meaning it will be a true road game for the Saints.

Messier retires

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Mark Messier was 30 and already a five-time Stanley Cup champion when it was time to leave the hometown Edmonton Oilers.

That was the summer of 1991, three years after Wayne Gretzky's stunning trade to Los Angeles and a year removed from the Oilers' fifth title in seven years. The dynasty was over and Messier was the latest big star about to be shipped out.

Glen Sather, the man who built the team and ran it from the bench during the glory years, asked Messier where he wanted to go. The answer was the New York Rangers, a team that hadn't won a Stanley Cup since 1940.

On Monday, the stone-jawed captain said goodbye, announcing his retirement after a 25-year career and six championships — including the one in 1994 that ended the Rangers' drought. He is second only to Gretzky on the NHL's career scoring list.

It took only three seasons for Messier to deliver with the Rangers and cement himself as one of the greatest leaders in team sports.

"I knew all the past history of the teams in New York ... but I don't think anything can really prepare you for going to play in New York until you get there," Messier said during a conference call. "I felt that I was fairly confident in what it took to win a Stanley Cup."

Messier embraced the challenge, and when it appeared another chance was going to slip away he pulled a page out of the Joe Namath handbook and guaranteed a victory.

With the Rangers trailing New Jersey 3-2 in the 1994 Eastern Conference finals, Messier promised New York would force a seventh game. He made good on his word by posting his fourth and final playoff hat trick in a 4-2 victory.

New York won Game 7 in double overtime to advance to the finals, which ended with a seventh-game victory over Vancouver.

"He had the biggest influence on my career by far of any player that I played with," said Boston defenseman Brian Leetch, a Rangers' player from 1988-04. "I wish everyone could have had an opportunity to be in the locker room with him and see his dedication to his teammates and to winning."

Messier became a star in Edmonton in the 1980s and a headliner on Broadway in the '90s. But the end of his career couldn't come close to matching the early part. His final seven seasons all finished without a postseason appearance — three in Vancouver after his first departure from New York and four more in his second stint with the Rangers.

"That is something that is always going to be a disappointment for me but I think there are so many good things that happened in the playoffs previous to that that it will diminish those feelings," Messier said.

Sather, now the Rangers' GM, left room for Messier to come back but talks never got that far.

On Jan. 12, exactly 37 years after Namath fulfilled his promise and lifted the Jets in the Super Bowl over the heavily favored Baltimore Colts, the Rangers will retire Messier's No. 11 before a game against the Oilers. It will join Rod Gilbert's No. 7, Ed Giacomin's No. 1 and teammate Mike Richter's No. 35.

COURTESY KNIGHT RIDDER

New York Ranger Mark Messier called it quits after a 25-year career. Messier finishes as the second greatest scorer in NHL history.

That will give him a chance to better show his emotions. Messier said he made the announcement on a conference call because, "no one wants to see a blubbering idiot at the podium."

Messier all but said goodbye on March 31, 2004, following the Rangers' final home game before the lockout that wiped out all of last season. He isn't sure he would've played anyway.

In fact, he said the desire to return was stronger now than this time last year. But he leaves in good health and is looking forward to spending time with his young family. He has an 18-year-old son playing hockey in Texas and a 2-year-old child and a 3-week-old baby at home.

"There was nothing left for me to really achieve," the 44-year-old Messier said. "It was time for me to move aside and go into something else."

He doesn't have anything set up yet, but Messier said he is willing to listen to any offers that will keep him closely tied to the game he loves.

"As tough as it was to make the decision, I think it's the right one and I feel good about it," the two-time MVP said.

Messier teamed with Gretzky to win four championships in Edmonton and won another in 1990 without him. The 16-time All-Star is the only player to captain two franchises to the Stanley Cup.

Red Sox will need to improve pitching

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Columnist

Summer in Massachusetts is synonymous with many things, but two of them are glaring: the stifling humidity and the Boston Red Sox.

This is the golden age of New England sports. The Patriots are the two-time defending champions and the epitome of everything coaches at all levels preach about being a team. And the Red Sox are in first place in the American League East after winning the World Series last year for the first time in four score and .. eighty-six years ago.

The summer at Fenway has been full of the usual quirky moments. There have been the dramatic, game-winning home runs that we have come to expect from number 34, and the heat of a pennant race with (who else?) the Yankees in the dog days of summer.

Mick and Keith visited Fenway for two shows on August 21 and 23. Their new album "A Bigger Bang" came out on Sept. 6 and more than lives up to the hype (impressive for guys who are in the middle of their sixth decade).

The technological terror that was the Rolling Stones' stage tore up most of the outfield grass. The following night's game was delayed an hour because the field needed to be dug up, leaving the grass from the shallow outfield to the warning track an off-color green — from somebody who went to one of the shows, let me tell you it was worth the hassle.

By the way, if the Sox are overtaken by the Yankees, the new Fenway anthem will be the new Stones' tune, "Oh No, Not You Again."

This year's Red Sox squad is an extreme departure from last year's championship nine. the main difference being the depleted, injury-prone, inconsistent pitching staff.

The number two starter David Wells recently apologized to Commissioner Bud Selig after he berated the Commish when the appeal for his six-game suspension — which was well deserved — was denied.

Wells replaces Pedro Martinez this year as the pitcher ancillary to Curt Schilling, and while the Pedro of 2004 wasn't the Pedro of 1999, Wells is still not in the same league.

While Martinez's tumultuous tenure with the Sox was full of bratty moments and endless whining, he had one of the best stretches a pitcher can have while he was donning the Red Sox uniform, and that is something Boomer can't equal.

Anyone who has watched teams tee off on Curt Schilling for the past couple of weeks knows that he is not the

UMass scientist to study Fabry

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Staff

Dr. Scott Garman, a structural biologist in the University of Massachusetts biochemistry and molecular biology department, received a grant for $150,000 from the Charles H. Hood Foundation to research a genetic disease known as the Fabry Disease.

An inherited disease, Fabris, only affects males, but women can be carriers and are able to pass it along to their children. The disease is caused by a faulty copy of a gene named Alpha-GAL. The disease is rare, affecting one in 40,000 male births and is seen in every ethnic group. If the enzyme activity is one percent or less the individual will develop the disease, this lack of enzyme activity results in buildup of toxic substances in the gene that would have otherwise been broken down. This is the mild form of the disease and the only symptoms associated are cardiac problems.

"People with zero percent of the enzyme activity develop the severe form of the disease, which starts out in boys around five with chronic pain and tingling in their extremities. There is also an inability to tolerate hot or cold climates. The severe form of the disease slowly progresses to other tissues, causing deposits that accumulate in the eyes, heart, kidney and skin, and these patients generally die in their 40s," said Garman.

Historically, Fabry disease has been hard to diagnose and often was misdiagnosed. The disease was first reported in 1898 and now there are genetic tests which give definitive results. In the past few years the first treatments have become available. Tay-Sachs disease, which is in the same family of diseases as the Fabry disease, progresses very rapidly due to the toxic material that accumulates, those patients die at a very early age. Other diseases, like Fabry disease progress slower.

These diseases can be cured by replacing the defective enzyme with a functional one. One treatment, called recombinant enzyme replacement therapy, involves injecting the patients with purified enzyme made in a lab. This can cure patients with Gaucher disease and is being used

Comedian and wife fight global warming

Laurie David, wife of 'Curb your Enthusiasm' star Larry David, encourages students to join their and MTV-U virtual march against global warming. David has agreed to give away is Toyota Hybrid in an online sweepsteaks for students.

Reaching out to college students nationwide, Larry David, the star of HBO's "Curb Your Enthusiasm" and his wife Laurie held a press conference by telephone yesterday to encourage students to join a virtual march against global warming.

The Davids, along with MTV-U and organizers of stopglobalwarming.org are planning a march on Washington, D.C. on Earth Day, Apr., 22 2006. The march will end a 365-day long virtual march across the nation by stopglobalwarming.org, which points out some areas affected by global warming and some areas with potential energy-saving solutions.

"College students can help change the world. We need them to start this issue of global warming," said Laurie David, the primary organizer of the march.

Global warming is a problem that climatologists have been worried about for years. Some are questioning whether the devastation on the Gulf Coast brought on by Hurricane Katrina was caused by global warming. Mrs. David would not be surprised if this is true.

"Nobody's going to say Katrina was caused by global warming, but the hurricane was a category one when it hit Florida before it moved over warmer waters, which are abnormally warmer," David said.

Mrs. David's premiere point at the press conference is that the key to preventing catastrophic problems in future years is by taking steps now to stop global warming.

The Davids say one of those steps is to reduce dependency on gasoline, oil and coal for energy. That's why they are giving away Larry David's Toyota Hybrid to students who enter a sweepstakes on mtvu.com in order to promote the march.

Mr. David drives the energy-conscious Hybrid, which uses both gasoline and electricity for fuel, on his TV show and in real life.

When Mrs. David asked her husband how he found out his car was being given away in a sweepstakes, he responded: "You didn't even let me know. You told my assistant. So don't tell people you let me know," he said jokingly. "My assistant said, 'how are you gonna get a new car? You're wife gave your's away."

Mrs. David stressed that giving away the car is a good way to promote fuel efficiency. "We have to raise fuel efficiency standards. We're at a 20-year low. Cars in China have better fuel efficiency than American cars," she said.

Some reporters raised questions about the economic impact a campaign against global warming might bring. One student reporter from Houston, Tex. wondered if changes would hurt the Texas oil industry.

Admitting that she doesn't "have all the answers," Mrs. David said regardless, "we cannot afford not to solve this problem."

New Orleans airport reopens; port opens, too

By Adam Nossiter
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS - The airport reopened to commercial flights Tuesday for the first time since Hurricane Katrina struck more than two weeks ago, and the port was back in operation, too, as a battered New Orleans struggled to get up and running again.

The slow signs of recovery came amid promises from the White House and FEMA to learn from their mistakes and intensify their efforts to help the victims.

Northwest Airlines Flight 947 from Memphis, Tenn., landed around midday with about 30 people aboard, far fewer than the jet could hold.

Those aboard included emergency workers from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Some carried only a few belongings in plastic bags and gym bags.

Among those returning to New Orleans was Steven Kischner, who said the mood aboard the plane was 'eerie.'

"I'm anxious to get home to see what our house is going to look like,' said Sandy Rozales, who lives in the Lakeshore section of New Orleans, close to a levee break, and left on the last flight out of town Aug. 28 just before the hurricane hit. She said those on the flight were 'preoccupied thinking about what they'd see when they get home and hoping that the worst wasn't quite what they got."

Using generator power, New Orleans' airport was back in operation the day after the hurricane hit, but was reserved for emergency use, including evacuation flights. The city's recovery could be seen along the New Orleans waterfront as well. A shipment of steel coils left the port by barge Monday, bound for a Hyundai auto plant in Greenville, Ala., port spokesman Chris Bonura said.

The port expected the arrival late Tuesday of its first cargo ship since the hurricane, and at least three more ships by week's end, said Gary LaGrange, port president and chief executive. The arriving ship was carrying up to 500 containers of coffee and wood products from Argentina, Brazil and Mexico, LaGrange said.

"It's a historical moment. Two weeks ago the prognosis was six months, so to pull it off so our customers have enough faith and confidence in us is very heartwarming," LaGrange said. He added: 'From a commercial and psychological standpoint, this is five stars. This shows the people of New Orleans their city is back in business."

The port of New Orleans is the gateway to a river system serving 33 states along the Mississippi River or its tributaries. The port also connects to six railroads.

During a tour of hurricane-stricken Mississippi, U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta pronounced Katrina the worst disaster for transportation in U.S. history.

Mineta said Katrina affected ports, highways and rivers. 'Add that all up and it's a larger magnitude than anything we've ever experienced,' he said.

The government has estimated the damage to highways and bridges in Mississippi and Louisiana at $3 billion.

In New Orleans, Tuesday brought a sharp influx of people checking on their businesses.

Rusty White received a pass from police to check on the Bulldog, his bar on the edge of the Garden District. He drove in from his temporary lodgings in the town of Rayne and retrieved a data cartridge from the bar's computer. He also planned to swing by his house - if he could get to it - in a still-flooded neighborhood near Lake Pontchartrain.

"I probably lost my house, but I'm still in good spirits, considering," White said. "If you had told me before the storm I would lose everything, I'd probably tell you I'd be devastated. It makes me think all that stuff that I had isn't really as important as I thought it was - at least until I go in and see it, and then I may cry."

White was relieved to find that the bar had sustained little damage from the storm, though looters had smashed open the cash register and video poker machines and apparently took a few bottles of bourbon on their way out. They left behind a flat-screen TV.

White was encouraged by his first visit to the city since Katrina.

"Many of the things that make this place special are still here. Everybody I talk to is coming back. They're not even thinking of going someplace else," White said. "I hope I'm not being naively optimistic, but that's the feeling I have."

In Washington, President Bush said 'I take responsibility' for the government's failures in dealing with the hurricane, and he said the disaster raised questions about the nation's ability to respond to natural disasters as well as terrorist attacks.

"Are we capable of dealing with a severe attack? That's a very important question and it's in the national interest that we find out what went on so we can better respond," the president said.

The new acting director of FEMA pledged to intensify efforts to find more permanent housing for the tens of thousands of Katrina survivors now in shelters.

Katrina survivors begin to move on

By Karl Stampfl
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

HOUSTON - Two weeks after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast, survivors who have made Houston, Texas, evacuee shelters their homes are moving on.

Some have gotten jobs in Houston and plan on staying at least until New Orleans is rebuilt, while others are scattering throughout the country.

Organizers want most of the evacuees out of the shelters by mid September, said Joe Laud, spokesman for the city's Office of Emergency Management.

At their highest capacity, Houston shelters housed about 25,400 evacuees. Less than one-fifth of those still remain. Yesterday, in front of the shelters, evacuees lined up with their suitcases, awaiting taxis to take them to the airport, local housing, bus stations and train stations. Among them was evacuee Deion Armstrong, 44, who was heading to the Amtrak station to catch a train to Philadelphia, Pa.

Armstrong, who lost his Alzheimers-stricken mother to rising waters after the storm, is a doctor. He plans to return to New Jersey, where he spent his childhood. He will seek employment at his alma mater, Rowan University.

Across the street from the convention center Sunday morning, a woman walked around with a sandwich board that read, "Thank you Houston, your love is big. I'm from New Orleans and I need

Bush approval ratings plummet

By Jessica Dech
The Daily Campus (U. Conn.)

STORRS, Conn.- According to an Associated Press poll conducted after Hurricane Katrina, President George W. Bush's job-approval rating was at 39 percent, completely opposite of the more than 80 percent he received right after the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

This is a record-low rating, which has experts analyzing if the cause is dissatisfaction with rescue efforts following the hurricane.

Some blame the president for inadequate government officials that did not know how to handle the disaster.

"In a situation like what just happened down South, you want the very best equipped people for those jobs," said Mansfield Mayor Betsy Paterson, a democrat. "You want the people with the training and the background to respond quickly. I don't think we have that."

Christopher Paulhus, a republican member of Mansfield Town Council, said there are other reasons for the slow emergency response.

Roberts states abortion ruling settled as precedent, Democrats seek clearer answers

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Supreme Court nominee John Roberts jousted with Democratic senators Tuesday at his confirmation hearing to be chief justice, dodging their attempts to pin down his opinions on abortion, voting rights and other legal issues.

Roberts said he felt the landmark 1973 ruling legalizing abortion was "settled as a precedent" and that the Constitution provides a right to privacy.

When senators pressed for details on his opinions Roberts said repeatedly that he shouldn't address some issues that could come before the Supreme Court with him as chief justice.

At one point, Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., who has indicated he may run for president in 2008, accused Roberts of "filibustering."

"Go ahead and continue not to answer," said Biden. Later, he interrupted Roberts and when criticized, insisted, "His answers are misleading, with all due respect."

"Wait a minute! Wait a minute! They may be misleading but they are his answers," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the Judiciary Committee chairman.

Roberts kept his cool.

"With respect, they are my answers and with respect, they are not misleading," he said.

Senators questioned President Bush's choice to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist on abortion, privacy, voting rights and the balance of power between the branches of government. Roberts frequently answered through the prism of legal precedent but declined to address specifics.

The heart of the abortion ruling is "settled as a precedent of the court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis," the concept that long-established rulings should be given extra weight. Roberts said. Reviews and revisions have been the hallmark of the high court on issues from integration to gay rights, and Roberts indicated that groundbreaking cases can draw a second look.

"If particular precedents have proven to be unworkable, they don't lead to predictable results, they're difficult to apply, that's one factor supporting reconsideration," Roberts said.

If confirmed, the 50-year-old Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in 200 years, with the power to shape the high court for decades. Democrats and Republicans see no major obstacles to his winning Senate approval and joining the other justices when the new term begins Oct. 3.

In his answers on abortion, Roberts focused on a 1992 Supreme Court ruling in Casey v. Planned Parenthood, referring to that as a precedent-setting case in addition to the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

In the Pennsylvania case, the Supreme Court voted 5-4 to uphold the core holdings of Roe v. Wade and ban states from outlawing most abortions. The court said states could impose restrictions on the procedure that do not impose an "undue burden" on women.

"It reaffirmed the central holding in Roe v. Wade," Roberts said.

Bush originally nominated Roberts to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court's crucial swing vote who announced her plans to retire in July. Within days of Rehnquist's death on Sept. 3, Bush tapped Roberts to be chief justice.

Democrats pressed the appellate judge about his writings on civil rights while a young lawyer in the Reagan administration two decades ago. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., described some of those writings on voting rights as a "narrow, cramped and mean-spirited view" that failed to show a full appreciation of discrimination.

Under questioning from Kennedy, Roberts said that he had no problem with the 1965 Voting Rights Act. "The constitutionality has been upheld, and I don't have any issue with that."

That failed to assuage Kennedy, who spoke critically and at length about Roberts' writings. Kennedy was interrupted several times by Specter, who told him to let Roberts speak. The nominee dismissed any suggestion that his Catholic faith would influence his decisions if he were confirmed, bringing the number of Catholics on the court to a historic high of four. The Roman Catholic Church strongly opposes abortion.

"There's nothing in my personal views based on faith or other sources that would prevent me from applying the precedent of the court faithfully under the principles of stare decisis," Roberts said.

Stare decisis is Latin for "to stand by a decision" and legally translates into the doctrine that says courts are bound by previous decisions, or precedents, particularly when a case has been decided by a higher court.

Questioned about rights of privacy, the appellate judge cited several amendments in the Bill of Rights and said, "The court has explained that the liberty protected is not limited to freedom from physical restraint."

On other issues:

-Roberts rejected the notion of finding precedent in foreign law. In ruling on the use of the death penalty against minors, the Supreme Court this year noted the standards and rules of other nations. Roberts said that sort of citation expands the discretion of a jurist, and "that's a misuse of precedent, not a correct use of precedent.

-Roberts said the Constitution specifically gives the power to declare war to Congress, and in response to questions about interrogation and torture, said, "No one is above the law and that includes the president."

-The nominee rejected terms such as originalist and constructionist. "When pressed I prefer to be known as a modest judge."

Roberts said he never turned down a request for pro bono work while in private practice, including a case on gay rights. "I think it's right that if there had been something morally objectionable, I suppose I would have."

In 1992, Rehnquist wanted to use the Casey case to overturn Roe, but he was stymied by moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring. Justice Antonin Scalia wrote a bitter dissent then, and is likely to push the court to revisit the issue.

Troy Newman, president of Operation Rescue, said anti-abortion activists weren't surprised by Roberts' comments but would watch him closely.

"We're concerned about these statements, but the proof will come when it's time for him to rule on these cases as a justice," Newman said.

Abortion rights groups found little comfort in Roberts' answers. "John Roberts failed to state whether he believes the right to privacy includes a woman's right to choose as recognized in Roe v. Wade," said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America.

Roberts' opponents complained that he was ducking specific questions as they had expected.

"He's obviously playing a game of dodgeball," said Ralph Neas, head of the liberal People of the American Way.

FDA bars homosexuals from donating their blood

By Caleb Fort
Daily Lobo (U. New Mexico)

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. - Student Marshall Martinez decided to do his part to help victims of Hurricane Katrina by donating blood.

However, a United Blood Services worker told Martinez, who is gay, that he had a permanent deferral on his name, which means he can never donate blood.

The deferral was on his name because during a screening interview to donate blood several years ago, he told the interviewer he had sex with a man.

Martinez, who is also a sex educator in Alamogordo, N.M., said it is wrong not to let gay men donate blood.

"I'm expected to be a good American," he said. "I'm expected to help out, but I can't even give blood. Gay men are one of the few demographics still OK to discriminate against."

According to the Food and Drug Administration's Web site, any man who has had sex with another man since 1977 is not allowed to donate blood, because gay men are at high risk of carrying HIV. The FDA regulates the national blood supply.

Brenda McKee, donor recruitment supervisor at United Blood Services, said the policy is not meant to be discriminatory. She said its sole purpose is to keep the blood supply as clean as possible.

"It's more of a risk in the lifestyle as far as HIV," she said. "It's just to keep the blood supply safe."

Martinez said it is unnecessary to permanently ban gay men from donating blood, because all blood donated is tested for HIV. McKee said not accepting blood from gay men, intravenous drug users or anyone who has had sex for money since 1977 is an additional protection.

"We test every unit of blood, but it keeps it safer in case one slips by," she said.

According to the FDA Web site, the tests are not always accurate. Someone who has HIV can test negative for up to two months after being infected, so blood banks also must use interviews to screen for potentially infected donors, according to the site.

Student Airth Locke said someone's sexual orientation should not determine if they can give blood.

"As long as they test all the blood, it really shouldn't matter," she said. "If they have HIV, that's what the tests are for."

Martinez said the policy - which was instituted in 1983, when gay men represented a large portion of HIV cases - is now outdated. He said it is a good idea to keep the blood supply safe by not letting people who engage in high-risk behavior donate, but it is discriminatory to assume that being gay is risky.

He said he would like the question to be reworded.

"Instead of 'Have you had sex with a man since 1977?' the question should be, 'Have you had unprotected sex with anybody in the last six months?'" he said.

Student Alyson Deakyne agreed.

"It seems like the policy's kind of outdated," she said. "Maybe it made sense in the '80s, but I don't think it matters now whether you're gay or not."

According to the FDA Web site, blood from gay men is still more likely to be infected.

"Although a potential individual donor may practice safe sex, persons who have participated in high-risk behaviors are, as a group, still considered to be at increased risk of transmitting HIV," the Web site states. "Safe sex practices reduce, but do not eliminate, the risk of the transmission of AIDS."

According to 2003 statistics from the Centers for Disease Control, 67 percent of men in the United States with HIV have had sex with another man.

McKee said she appreciates Martinez's efforts to help hurricane victims, and said he should call her if he has any questions about why he cannot give blood.

"We're so grateful for his intent to donate," she said. "If the policy ever changes we will be more than happy to have him donate, but right now that's where we stand."

Larry David and wife look to 'curb' global warming

She cites large corporations such as General Electric and Toyota for making changes to promote energy efficiency, while being able to turn a profit at the same time.

"GE has come out and said 'Look, we're going to come out with clean renewable energy and we're going to make money doing it. This is the way of the future and we have to be energy efficient," said Mrs. David.

Mrs. David added that the Toyota is now making more of a profit than other auto makers that did not switch to fuel efficient cars.

"Good economic policy is identical to good environmental policy," said Mrs. David.

In regards to choosing to do a virtual march as opposed to conducting a physical march, Mrs. David said she chose to make it virtual because a physical march would "only get 30 seconds on the evening news."

So far, her march has gained bi-partisan support. Politicians involved in the march include Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Robert F. Kennedy Jr., former Vice President Al Gore, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R-Calif.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-NY).

Evacuees attempt to start lives over in new settings

a job." The sign also listed her telephone number.

Sitting a few yards away was evacuee Ricky Hampton, who plans to spend about a year in Dallas living with family. Hampton is adamant about not living on the government dole for long.

"It hurts my heart to get food stamps," he said. "I'm hoping on a fellow giving me a grand so I can get started, maybe eventually buy a truck and start my own business."

Next to him was evacuee Zena Smith, who is deaf. She and Hampton had become friends during their stay at the convention center. Smith is still unsure about her fate, but she scribbled on a piece of paper, "Yes I want to [be] back in New Orleans. I not ready to though ... I want fun, clubs, bourbon, work, anything."

A few evacuees said they could never live in New Orleans again. Some are looking for a new start and are using the hurricane as their window of opportunity, while others are wary of revisiting post-storm memories if they return.

"The only way I'd go back is to visit," evacuee James Knight said.

Many, including evacuee Jennie Green and her four children, are planning on staying in Houston, which she says has been good to them so far. She wants to work as a housekeeper or cashier and said she will set out today to apply at local Wal-Marts and a few other places.

Knight said he will stay in Houston as long as he's welcome, but he has already seen signs that the evacuees' welcome is wearing out.

"The attitude in Houston is changing," he said. "You can tell by the police officers. They're getting more strict. When they get like that, you know it's time to get out."

The city of Houston and Harris County have organized a joint housing task force to relocate families from the shelters into local apartments. Each family will receive a housing voucher that will need to be presented to its apartment manager, who will bill the city for the rent. The program is funded through a $10 million relief fund authorized by the Houston City Council.

The city has also set up Housing Choice Centers to assist evacuees with moving into more permanent houses and apartments. A joint-agency taskforce based in the shelters is also helping evacuees obtain necessary items such as furniture and kitchenware for their new apartments and houses.

Most major airlines are now offering free airfare to people who can prove they were hurricane victims, Laud said. Continental Airlines is set up in the George R. Brown Convention Center booking free one-way tickets to anywhere in the country. Free bus passes are available in the shelters. Primary and secondary students displaced by the hurricane have been welcomed in Houston's school system, as have university students at local schools such as the University of Houston and Rice University.

College students from New Orleans are spread out across the country. Many universities, including the University of Michigan, have accepted students and faculty for the fall term. Despite the help, evacuees are still unsure of their long-term arrangements. Their plans are sometimes muddled and often do not reach beyond the next few weeks.

"It's hard to start over," Knight said. "Not many of us really know how."

New Orleans death toll rises

"We're going to get people out of the shelters. We're going to move on and get them the help they need," R. David Paulison said in his first public comments since he was named to replace Michael Brown. Brown resigned under fire over the government's sluggish response to the disaster.

Dr. Frank Minyard, the Orleans Parish coroner, said autopsies will be performed on at least 44 patients found dead at a flooded-out hospital. The discovery at the 317-bed Memorial Medical Center raised Louisiana's official death toll to nearly 280.

It was not immediately clear how the patients died.

Dave Goodson, an assistant administrator, said at least some of the patients died while waiting to be evacuated after Katrina struck, as temperatures inside the hospital reached 106 degrees. He said the heat probably contributed to some of the deaths.

Family members and nurses were 'literally standing over the patients, fanning them," he said.

Steven Campanini, a spokesman for hospital owner Tenet Healthcare Corp., said that some of the patients lay dead in the morgue before Katrina hit, and that none of the deaths resulted from lack of food, water or electricity to power medical equipment.

The coroner suggested that further such discoveries are possible as the floodwaters recede.

"There just may be a lot of people who are still down in those deep waters, and some of waters were 10, 12, 15 feet deep," Minyard said. "My biggest fear is that we will find something down there that is way out of proportion. Hopefully, it doesn't happen, but we worry."

While public health authorities have been warning about the risk of germs from the filthy floodwaters, workers from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are not seeing many cases of disease.

Instead, between 40 percent and 50 percent of patients seeking emergency care have injuries - CDC has counted 148 injuries in just the past two days, Carol Rubin, an agency hurricane-relief specialist. She said they include chainsaw injuries and carbon monoxide poisoning from generators.

Sgt. John Zeller, a California National Guard engineer, said it will be at least three months before the New Orleans' public water system is fully operational. Some homes have running water now, but it is mostly untreated Mississippi River water - for anyone wanting a bath, "It's like jumping in the river right now," he said.

Some of those displaced may end up in temporary housing provided by FEMA, which expects to use trailer homes to create 'temporary cities,' where some 200,000 hurricane victims could live for up to five years.

"This may not be quite on the scale of building the pyramids, but it's close," said Brad Fair, head of the FEMA's housing effort.

New grant aids search for a cure successfully on patients with Fabry disease.

The normal structure of the Alpha-GAL protein has already been researched by Garman and his colleagues. The structural research is done by X-ray crystallography which uses X-rays to view molecular shapes at a magnified level.

"With x-rays, you can't use a lens to collect the scattered light, so we use computers to recombine the information in the scattered x-rays. With this technique, we get magnifications of about a billion times," says Garman.

The grant from the Hood Foundation is spread out over the next two years and will pay for the costs for two graduate students, Abby Guce and Rishi Arora to work with Garman in the lab.

"My group studies how the alpha-GAL protein folds up into the correct shape in healthy people and into the incorrect shape in people with Fabry disease," said Garman. "We want to understand what happens to the protein in these patients who have defective versions. This might eventually lead to improved treatment for the disease."

"The favorite part of my job is the joy of discovery: when you discover something new, it is very powerful. There are moments when you suddenly know something that no one else ever has known. You know that you have contributed something to human knowledge that is unique," said Garman.

Garman received his undergraduate degree in chemistry from Princeton. He received his PhD from Harvard University and his postdoctoral training at Northwestern University. He is an associate professor in the biochemistry and molecular biology department. He has a wife, Karen and a two-year-old daughter named Grace.

Bush ratings hit all-time low

"The governors of those states themselves didn't take the storms seriously and by the time they did, it was too late," Paulhus said.

According to a Newsweek poll, 66 percent said the reason for the slow response to Katrina was a lack of communication between federal, state and local governments. Another 57 percent believed the amount of destruction was unexpected and overwhelmed officials.

"It's not all Bush's fault like people are trying to say," Paulhus said. Paterson disagreed with that point of view.

"Americans like to fight among themselves, but when there's a disaster they come in together like family," Paterson said. "We didn't do that. The government didn't come in as fast as it could have."

Each week, polls asking citizens how they feel about the war in Iraq show ratings for the war declining. Newsweek found 49 percent of people surveyed thought we should have never taken military action against Iraq two years ago.

Bush also has an all-time low rating of 52 percent job approval in his home state of Texas.

According to Democratic State Denise Merrill, Chair of the State House Appropriations Committee, Americans are losing faith in the Bush administration.

"Although the poll numbers took a significant downward turn well before the disaster in New Orleans, I think the public is tiring of this administration's handling of the Iraq War," Merrill said.

Others have argued that bipartisan bickering is more to blame for the divided state of the country, and possibly the reason for Bush's dip in the polls.

"He's constantly criticized for anything and everything he does," said Republican Peter Plante, University of Connecticut alum and member of the Mansfield Planning and Zoning Board.

"I know there's a natural propensity for people to look at the bad in a situation, for example, we don't talk about the good that was done in Iraq, only the bad," Plante said.

According to a poll by Time Magazine, 57 percent said they do not believe the government will be able to provide relief for them in the result of a natural disaster or terrorist attack.

This Community Emergency Response Team is meant to save the lives of victims and the people of the area who naturally want to help when disaster strikes. Any Uconn students who live in the area and are over 18 can join.

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

Global warming: an issue needing urgent attention

Among many of the difficulties that the nation is going through: inflated gas prices, a country at war, the results of Hurricane Katrina, there is one underlying problem that needs the attention of all of us. Global warming, an environmental crisis that is staring us in the face now more than ever, is finally drawing attention and is becoming something that people, including celebrities and politicians, are helping to reach out against.

Laurie David, wife of HBO's "Curb Your Enthusiasm" star Larry David, has started a virtual march against global warming which can be found at stopglobalwarming.org. This Web site is something that all students should take a look at, this issue affects all of us directly.

A lot of people have become accustomed to taking certain things for granted. The excessive burning of fossil fuels has turned into a non-issue for students that are too focused on getting their reading assignments done or getting to class on time. And while, for some, it may be something that stays in the back of one's mind, it's time to bring global warming to the foreground and allow everyone to realize the seriousness of the situation at hand.

Given the Internet savvy bunch that most college students are, this virtual march is a perfect way for people to get involved and make a difference without actually holding protest signs and picketing. The plan of the march is to have made it to Washington D.C. by Earth Day, 2006 with ideally as many towns and cities they can to support their cause.

Hurricane Katrina, in all its devastation, may serve as an eye opener in the worst way possible. This is just one natural disaster that has hit our nation in recent years. The mudslides in California also caused a lot of turmoil and grief, although the cause may not have been closely linked to the issue of global warming. Regardless, this country is going through so much right now that adding to the pressure of possible future natural disasters is something that we can all live without.

Granted, this is not just a United States issue. Global warming will obviously affect all countries. However, we have the power to take a stand and actually do rather than say we will do. The pressure is on big businesses to become more environmentally efficient and for the federal government to pass more legislation preventing excessive pollution.

It is the beginning of the semester and we have only just completed our first full week of classes. There are very prominent things on all of our minds that pertain to classes, course work, jobs and getting enough sleep. With any luck, global warming awareness will be something that will also become a prominent thought in our minds. The effects may not be so drastic here in Massachusetts, but that isn't to say we won't be feeling them a week, a year, 10 years from now.

Proper guidance a necessity

Mike Anmuth

College is a time to make decisions; decisions about where to live, decisions about what courses to study, decisions about getting up early or staying up late, decisions to do homework or not to do homework and decisions on which major is most appropriate to one's wishes, feelings and desires. This decision on choosing a major is the one on which I will focus in this column simply because I am a major-choosing veteran, switching majors 12 times in my college career.

Here at UMass, and at most other schools, there is a Pre-Major Advising Service. On our campus, it is located in Goodell Hall and the staff there is very knowledgeable about helping students find a major, and which classes to take before formally choosing a major that are beneficial in creating an atmosphere where students actually want to learn what they are taking. Additionally, they help you strive towards a major, rather than just picking and choosing courses out of the course catalog that sound easy or that do not need a lot of attendance.

I have traveled down that road of choosing classes simply from the course catalog because of their title and the easiness of subject that I associated with them. Sometimes I have been right and these courses have turned out easier than expected; sometimes I have been very wrong and these courses have turned out much harder than expected, but often having the benefit of learning very interesting subject matter.

Choosing courses this way was tantamount to choosing a major this way as well, and I may have had a better chance of finding one I actually liked by listing them all on paper, putting that paper on a dartboard and throwing darts at it with my eyes firmly closed. Simply put, without direction or guidance, I chose majors that I thought sounded interesting, and perhaps, interestingly easy. This is not to say that any one major is particularly easy, and if it was, I probably would not have searched out 11 others to replace it.

I transferred here to the University last fall, and I have only changed majors once here at UMass. At my previous schools, it was a lot easier to change majors, and there would be no one there to welcome you to a new major, citing requirements or lending a helping hand or an ear. When I switched to Sociology here, I was required to meet with the undergraduate advisor, a meeting that was most beneficial to me in terms of being able to use some of the classes I had already taken during my previous stay with the other majors.

I have found out that majors are not like magazines with a new one arriving each month in one's mailbox; they need careful consideration and seeking advising with Pre-Major Advising Services or the department in which you want to be a major is a good idea all around.

When it feels like no one cares whether you're taking the right classes, on the right track or even going to graduate within this decade, it can be a rather dismaying atmosphere. Luckily, at UMass, we do not have this type of atmosphere, and changing majors is a process that must be followed with advantageous results for the student. Still, through all of this, I do not think that undecided is a particularly bad choice for a major, especially as a freshman.

Colleges like ours are big and daunting; you are getting used to making many decisions on your own, but being undecided on your course of study is one that is acceptable as a freshman and even beyond. I have found out that majors are not like magazines with a new one arriving each month in one's mailbox; they need careful consideration and seeking advising with Pre-Major Advising Services or the department in which you want to be a major is a good idea all around.

Being a major-choosing veteran is not all that it is cracked up to be, and I believe that if I had started at UMass and had the proper guidance, I would have ended up as a Sociology major a lot sooner than I did and probably without so many extraneous classes that I could have used the credits for another major or a minor. Students here have the opportunity to find themselves, get advised and find a major that is suitable for them. Being undecided is not such a bad decision when it comes to a major, and when you find the right major, doing work for your major classes becomes almost enjoyable.

Through 12 majors, I have learned that you have to take your education by the horns and guide it the way you would like. Here at UMass, there are plenty of tools to help you do just that.

What it means to be a hero

Andrew Freeman

I don't have any heroes. Not Lance Armstrong, the man who battled cancer and dominated the Tour De France, not Pat Tillman the football player who gave up his professional career and life in defense of the nation. The more I learn about someone that is regarded as a "hero," the more I realize that he or she is an ordinary person, not worthy of the extraordinary esteem they receive.

Merriam-webster.com defines "hero" as everything from an illustrious warrior to an idol. This breadth of interpretations means that nearly everyone of notoriety can claim to be a hero. Britney Spears is an idol for hundreds of thousands of people - should that make her a hero? Bill Gates is the richest man in the world. Does he qualify as a hero?

There are five basic types of heroes that our society creates; military heroes, political heroes, occupational heroes, idols and "everyday heroes."

Since the time of the Ancient Greeks and the first heroic epic, "The Iliad," heroes have been proclaimed from the ranks of armies. Valor in combat is often lauded as heroism, although in many cases it is simply action necessary for survival. Recent examples of military heroes are Pat Tillman and Jessica Lynch, respectively soldiers in Afghanistan and Iraq. Lynch was captured during the invasion of Iraq, having been knocked unconscious when the convoy she was in came under attack. She was captured and then rescued, with the military dramatizing her story for the media - they claimed she resisted capture and was abused in captivity, none of which was true. Pat Tillman, who was held up as hero after his death in Afghanistan, was a victim of "friendly fire," dying from wounds inflicted by the gunfire of American soldiers.

One of the problems with military heroism is that honoring the dead for their valor can lead, in the worst case, to encouraging martyrdom. This is a hallmark of many conflicts in the Islamic world, especially in Palestine and Iraq, where people with dreams of paradise blow themselves up, achieving nothing for their cause but a higher body count.

Heroism in politics is even rarer, as idealism is almost always secondary to winning elections, and even the greatest leaders in history are often overrated.

[Occupational heroism] gained a great deal of credence after Sept. 11. As inspiring as that was, it was also expected of them — when your job is to save lives, you do what is needed. I consider heroism to be going above and beyond the call of duty.

Abraham Lincoln, the first president of a very different Republican party, came to office opposed only to the expansion of slavery, not its existence. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt ordered the firebombing of Japanese cities during World War II; in one night's bombing of Tokyo over 80,000, mostly civilians, were killed. Had the Japanese won the war, the bombing would have been prosecuted as a war crime.

Another type of heroism is occupational heroism, which holds that firefighters, police and others, are heroes, just because the jobs they do are so inherently good. This idea gained a great deal of credence after Sept. 11, when courageous firefighters and police rushed into the collapsing towers. As inspiring as that was, it was also expected of them - when your job is to save lives, you do what is needed. I consider heroism to be going above and beyond the call of duty. Another issue with this concept is that it does nothing to distinguish an individual firefighter or policeman for his or her actions, whether good or bad. Declaring all police officers are heroes means that corrupt or racist cops are just as esteemed as the honest ones, for example.

A related type of heroism is better described as idol worship, and it refers especially to sports players and other pop culture figures. These people are lionized for their abilities (or appearances), and their capacity to entertain. However, being able to hit a grand slam or sing is not a substantial contribution to societies.

Finally, in contrast to all of the above types, there is the "everyday hero" or "unsung hero" - the average person who does good deeds like mentor or coach youth volleyball. The "everyday hero" is a staple of media fluff journalism, serving to make people feel special about ordinary positive things they do. However, to paraphrase the movie "The Incredibles," if everyone is special, then nobody is which means that the significance of these actions is minor.

To me, a hero should be someone of impeccable moral character, who has achieved great things for the improvement of mankind. He or she should be a role model and have a far-reaching influence throughout society. Their accomplishments should be substantial and long lasting, and should benefit society. This is unquestionably a high standard, but I think that would-be heroes should aspire to nothing less.

Time to look to the present

Sanam Hakim

It's my senior year here at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. The time flew by really fast. Now, as a senior, I feel a fantastic mix of fear and excitement, thinking about my future and wondering where I'll go and what I'll do after I graduate. My options range from getting an internship around here to teaching in an urban high school in New York City, to going to a Third World country for a few years, or just going straight to law school.

When I think back on my time here at UMass, I noticed a huge flaw in my decision making process.

Ever since the word "college" enters our lives, the word "future" does as well. College is a time when we begin to actually invest in our futures; four years of schooling and a lot of money in exchange for a piece of paper that will open doors for us ... in the future. As college students, however, while we spend so much time thinking about our futures, we sometimes forget to stop and look at the present, which will become the past a lot faster than we expect.

Personally, I wasted two years of college attempting a computer science major with the logic that it will be "good for my future." The fact that the most complex program I could write had no function other than printing out the words "Hello World" on my screen didn't really mean anything to me. Coming out of UMass with a computer science degree, especially as a woman, would have been great for my future, right? It would have been, I suppose, but it wasn't. When I think back on it now, I regret it. My G.P.A. was destroyed because of it. It depressed me to be in a major I hated and it depressed me that I was so bad at programming. I also wasted a lot of money on Math and Computer Science books that I can't even sell to any new students because the same classes no longer require Edition 6, but rather Edition 7 - a brand new and exciting book that has exchanged words like "study of the brain" to "neuroscience," and needs to charge new students full price for the "dramatic change."

When I think back on it now, I wish I remembered to notice my present as well as my future. I wish I didn't keep picturing myself in 30 years as a successful computer programmer or a successful businesswoman.

When I think back on it now, I wish I remembered to notice my present as well as my future. I wish I didn't keep picturing myself in 30 years as a successful computer programmer or a successful businesswoman. I wish I looked at myself in the moment, because it would have saved me a lot of time. I would have noticed that I loved to write. I would have noticed which classes I absolutely despised, and which ones I actually enjoyed.

We are required to take dozens of general education requirements, not only to make our college education more diverse, but to let us experience a wide variety of majors and find what it is we enjoy. It's an opportunity for a biology major to see how much she loves history or an art major to see how good he is at astronomy. It's a chance to find what you are good at and build on it. Actually, whenever I read about the history of any country, that's how futures have been and still are determined.

The society we live in now is starting to breed children who are taught to find a major that there is a high demand for and just "stick it out" through college because it will offer them a promising future. I suppose the logic is a good one: a few years of painful studying in exchange for a wealthy future, but what kind of damage has this done to our society? It's created doctors who don't care about their patients and teachers who hate their jobs. It's created engineers that hate going to work in the morning and lawyers who manipulate their clients.

I say look at your classes and see which ones you actually like going to. Think about your talents and see how you can develop them in a way that will make you successful in the future. I am not suggesting that we all take our clothes off and become starving artists in the streets. I am suggesting that we all find success in something we love. If I stopped and looked at what was in front of me during my freshman or sophomore year, I would have noticed that the answers to all of my questions were really right in front of me the whole time.

I became a columnist as soon as I got to the school. I enjoyed politics. I taught children's classes for years and all my good grades were in English classes. Now, here I am at the end, as an English and Journalism major. I recently passed my Massachusetts Teacher Education Licensure exam, which made me a certified English teacher in the state of Massachusetts. Within the boundaries of my interests and talents, I decided to go to law school. If I just noticed that from the start and stopped obsessing about "my successful future," I would have noticed what I enjoyed and built on that, and more importantly, I wouldn't have Multivariate Calculus and Linear Algebra dragging down my G.P.A., and I would have never, ever, ever learned how to have a short conversation with 0's and 1's.

The real looters in New Orleans

Nzingha Tyehemba

The images of survivors of Hurricane Katrina, for the most part images of poor African Americans "looting" neighborhood supermarkets and grocery stores exemplify this nation's fetish with stigmatizing, criminalizing and dehumanizing black people, even in the midst of a great tragedy.

Last Friday, as I watched CNN, a reporter referred viewers to a blog entitled "The Daily Dish," which had links to photos of the interior of a local Winn Dixie. Apparently, New Orleans residents had cleaned the grocery of the food products and the pharmacy of much of the medicine during the hurricane.

While the photos provided evidence of the survival tactics of the Katrina victims, I continued watching, perplexed, in an attempt to identify the truly newsworthy element. Hadn't major news outlets broken the story of "looting" occurring more than a week ago? Yet the reporter, a white woman, continued to encourage viewers to log on to view more pictures of the "looting."

The language used to describe the black and white looters/finders provides evidence of the racist bed in which many in this country continue to comfortably lie in.

By highlighting the act of "looting," this news report isolated the act from the struggle to survive a situation in which many Katrina victims found themselves in the days following the hurricane. Other news reports have taken the same myopic approach of identifying one act of survival, "looting," and not providing ample context to justify that action.

At a community meeting in Houston my mother, a nurse, who drove to the Houston Astrodome from New York to help, said that one young evacuee from New Orleans, 15, spoke of how he had to do what was necessary to provide what was needed for his family. During the hurricane, his grandmother pointed at his chest and said "Now you're the man of the house. You gotta help us survive."

The national hysteria and anxiety over the "looting" seems displaced and not cognizant of the desperate situation in which New Orleans residents found themselves: waiting for days for adequate food, water and shelter. In the same situation, what exactly would you do?

Major news outlets also disseminated stories of widespread violence, including one of a child being raped, babies being killed and bodies piled on the floor of the New Orleans Superdome. As of last Tuesday, "The Guardian" newspaper reported that New Orleans police had been unable to confirm any such reports of violence in the Superdome. The preponderance of stories of violence and "looting" attributed to the predominantly black New Orleans residents makes me question not just the journalistic integrity of our major news outlets, but the racial consciousness of a nation that would allow such falsity to be projected by the news media.

Both the persistence of the media to cover the "looting," and the difference in the language used to describe the "looters" perpetuate a criminal image of the black survivors of Katrina. The now-famous photographs issued by separate press agencies of a white person "finding" food and of a black person "looting" food attest to the inextricable and subconscious way racism manifests itself in the media. The language used to describe the black and white looters/finders provides evidence of the racist bed in which many in this country continue to comfortably lie in.

Given the racial and class realities of New Orleans, with more than 70 percent of the population black and 23 percent living in poverty, the manner and tone in which the media continues to perceive and portray New Orleans Katrina survivors hardly comes as a surprise. Indeed, last Tuesday, Barbara Bush declared the response to Hurricane Katrina, criticized by many as seriously flawed, a success for evacuees who "were underprivileged anyway." The constant and repetitive images of "looting" and the rumors of murderers and rapists running rampant are consistent with this nation's historical pattern of viewing blacks as shiftless, lazy, thievin', triffin asses, which surfaces continuously in sit-coms, soaps, reality shows, movies and other media.

As major news outlets daily furnish the national narrative with memories of this disaster of historic proportions, it is more than shameful that the media perpetuate, unconsciously perhaps, common racist stereotypes of blacks. Instead of stories and images depicting the remarkable restraint and incredible grace of the overwhelming majority of the survivors, major news outlets have taken to looting the national narrative of truth. In so doing, they have directly contributed to the entire festering swamp of stigmatization and racist language surrounding the survivors of Hurricane Katrina.

Town problems with authority

Terry Franklin

In the spring of 2000, Amherst voters passed a bold and far reaching referendum concerning the decriminalization and de-prioritization of marijuana. This landmark on the road to liberty was the result, in large part, of the efforts of UMass students. Much praise to the members of the Cannabis Reform Coalition.

Since the election, 489 people in Amherst have been charged with marijuana offenses.

Mr. Del Castilho, the Town Manager, expectedly chose to disregard of the voters. After all, his police chief announced, even before Election Day, that "nothing would change."

New victims are generated on a weekly basis because of this policy. Oddly enough, town officials don't seem to be trumpeting this accomplishment. It seems that they want to have it both ways. On the one hand, they are eager to show how tough and macho they are, always following orders and never questioning authority. On the other, they realize that public opinion has turned against them, so they'd rather downplay the whole controversy.

The parallels to the South in the '60s, with the segregationists trying to hold out in the face of more progressive public sentiment, are striking. It is instructive to examine the statements of public officials in rationalizing their acquiescence in the policy of prohibition. The words are so similar, one would think that Mr. Del Castilho and his cronies had gone back and studied the old speeches for inspiration.

"The law is the law. We must enforce the law."

That is the fundamental excuse they use. Whether the law is good or evil is never even taken into consideration. These same words were spoken countless times to Martin Luther King by many a southern bigot.

"Our town is no worse than any other. The arrest numbers are not that high."

The goal is control, and keeping people closeted as second class citizens. The "body count" doesn't need to be as high as possible, just sufficiently high for maintaining a climate of fear.

"Lots of people get away with it." "If you're speeding on the Mass Pike, and no one sees you, you get away with it."

This kind of remark is designed to belittle. It is calculated to insult the integrity of reformers and activists. If they succeed in tarring you with the brush that you are interested in "getting away with" something, you've conceded that you are doing something wrong.

I, for one, don't speed on the Mass Pike. And Rosa Parks, in sitting too far forward on the bus, was not doing anything wrong she needed to "get away with."

On the one hand [town officials] are eager to show how tough and macho they are; always following orders, and never questioning authority. On the other, they realize that public opinion has turned against them, so they'd rather downplay the whole controversy.

"Hey, I'm gonna be a nice guy and let you get away with it this time ... and lady, you'd better appreciate that."

If you kowtow and act submissive, they might let you go. Standing up and acting confident will get you in trouble. Self respect is always a punishable offense.

"Boy, you got an attitude problem. I'm gonna teach you to know your place."

"Not all the arrests were made by town police. Some were made by UMass. (129 out of the 489 arrests.) That's a totally different department."

The guy in the cuffs can be excused if he's not fascinated by all the nuances of jurisdiction. In Selma, Sheriff Clark and Chief Baker ran completely independent agencies. They both though, put Civil Rights advocates in the same jail - as do the two police forces of Amherst.

"Besides, they aren't even all arrests. Some are citations."

Big difference. Same court, judge and punishment.

"Many people busted for marijuana were also committing other crimes."

"This is only an issue here because Amherst is such a liberal town."

I don't believe this is intended as an insult, since so many in Amherst don't mind being called "liberal." However, it is certainly intended to be dismissive, and to pigeonhole anti-prohibition activists as a minority, rather than part of a movement which is able to appeal to people across the whole political spectrum - as did the earlier Civil Rights Movement.

489 citizens arrested in Amherst. That is the bottom line.

It's time to say to the prohibitionists, "enough is enough." Just as in the '60s, government officials will have to realize that they will be held accountable for their actions, criticized, shunned as pariahs, and eventually booted out of office.

Too many of us have seen too many sweet, gentle people's spirits broken by being ground up in the gears of the criminal justice industry, to permit this outrage to continue.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

MISCONCEPTIONS OF THE GAZA PULLOUT

The decision by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in late August to pull out Israeli forces and settlers from occupied territories in Gaza and the West Bank revives the need to understand the Israeli-Palestinian conflicts through a historical and pragmatic lens, one which I feel the Sept. 12 editorial "Giving up Gaza" did not do. In the editorial, Jessica Zolotorofe expressed dismay at the nature of the pullout and argues that this action by Israelis will do little to suppress violence.

While I agree that the Gaza pullout will do little to ease tensions there, I would argue that this failure of peace is due to the true intentions of the Israeli government in Tel Aviv, and the revolutionary nature of the Palestinian resistance.

The area of the Gaza Strip in question is not historically a Jewish homeland (at least it hasn't been for the last one thousand years.) This land was seized by the Israeli forces in 1967, as a product of Israel's continual imperialist war against the Palestinian people. The actual number of Israelis evicted from the settlements is miniscule compared to the number of Palestinian families affected by unjustified housing demolitions performed by Israel. In fact, many of the protesters seen in the news were not even actual Gaza Strip settlers. The Israeli army predicted that at least 3,000 of the Gaza protesters were from right-wing organizations throughout Israel.

At the same time as the withdrawal was happening in the name of "peace," the Israeli government was preparing to increase their offensive against the Palestinians. The continued control of borders and checkpoints surrounding the Gaza Strip, and the continued construction of the 400 mile wall which permanently annexes the majority of Israeli settlement blocks in the West Bank is a testament to this.

While suicide bombings have produced a senseless form of terrorism which has only hurt the Palestinian cause, the legitimacy of the Palestinian fight for freedom and sovereignty is unmistakable. The correct path for true change in the Middle East is to move towards the creation of a Palestinian state free of Israeli and U.S. influence.

UMass: our home sweet home

Julia Metzidakis

So there you are, early September, driving down Route 116, seeing the library sticking out like a sore thumb and all of the little buildings surrounding it You can't help but grin and feel glad that you've left your real home to come back to your home away from home. This year for me that drive down 116 put everything into a new perspective. The sun was shining, my windows were down and my back seat was filled with crap causing extreme blind spots. College bound I was.

Three months ago, I returned back from an amazing year studying abroad, and although I cannot even try to express how lucky and thankful I am to have done what I had, I think we can all agree that we've been in a situation where losing what was taken for granted at the time became significantly important after realizing its honorable virtue. Take that time in fourth grade when your mom said to bring an umbrella to school. Five minutes later, I don't care how fast you thought you were in your Adidas Sambas, there wasn't anything to protect you from the severe drenching en route to the bus stop. And yes, your PB & J and Lisa Frank folders were also soaking wet. Hey, you asked for it.

Looking around the Zoo this year, I see things that I've always been happy were there, but never really acknowledged as treasured items. So as the absent observer, I've compiled a sampling of what one should never take for granted while at UMass:

THE PVTA BUS SYSTEM.

Yes kids, you should be so lucky that you have that big friendly blue and white vehicle to take you where you want to go. Why? Well, for starters, it's free. I can't tell you how many people complain at other schools about paying for bus fare. It definitely put a dent in my bank account while I was away. It's also pretty reliable. You can here the cheers almost a mile away when the bus arrives at the little Pufton Village shed on a Saturday night to carry back all of the cold, drunken freshman to Southwest.

BOYS IN BOSOX HATS.

This serves as a prototype for that laid back UMass college guy. Yeah, you know him. You're probably sitting next to him right now. He'll always laugh at a good "Family Guy" quote, Monday through Friday he's probably sporting a 5 o'clock shadow, and he's got about seven guy friends that all wear the same thing. (I swear that's what they really produce at that little factory over by the Textbook Annex. "Physical Plant" ... yeah right.) These hat-adorned men are not only a staple on campus, but a symbol for the state in which we reside. Yes, the accessory gets tattered and dirty, yes your boyfriend uses it to cover up his severely greasy mullet and yes chances are pretty good that he loves Johnny Damon more than he loves you, but believe me, these guys don't just live anywhere. So embrace them and their B emblem because most are cool, down to earth guys who probably won't cheat on you, unless Big Pappi's in town.

I think we can all agree that we've been in a situation where losing what was taken for granted at the time became significantly important after realizing its honorable virtue.

THAT LONG WALK TO CAMPUS.

Unless you sleep on a bench near the lake, most students must walk into campus to get to class. Yeah, it sucks to live in Sylvan and have four classes in Bartlett, but cry me a river, build a bridge and get over it ... or take the beloved bus. That New England breeze wakes you up a little. The scenery is pleasant. It allows you to catch up with friends, or, if nothing else unites you as a half awake population aged 17-23 on your way to that exam that you didn't study for.

YOUR ROOMMATE.

Although sometimes you might want to move all of their stuff into the hallway and switch the lock on your door, your roommate is usually always there as your drunk buddy, fellow interior decorator, gossiper and shoulder to cry on when they find you in a fetal position on the floor in the middle of the hardest week ever. Everyone craves personal space sometimes, but there are even more times when you need that unconditional companionship. Plus, who else would have the patience to put up with your crazy ass shenanigans? That's right, no one.

Be thankful that you have someone there to just talk to, laugh with or to watch the OC. So the next time you decide to wear all of your roommate's dryer fresh clothing to do Buns of Steel in and all they can do is shake their heads and compliment you on your good taste in clothing, know that putting up with you is a saintly chore.

I hope that you take these humble, yet sacred college trifles and appreciate them as you walk the streets of Amherst this year. Embrace the home away from home and always be sure to keep Lisa Frank out of harms way.

A plea to students

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld warns that the insurgency in Iraq could continue for another 12 years. While he assures us that it will be the U.S.-trained Iraqi forces that will finally defeat the insurgency, it indicates the United States military will remain in Iraq for years or even decades.

There is no indication that the war is nearing an end and no exit strategy has been developed. The military is now preparing to maintain current troop levels (more than 100,000) for another four years.

Even if troop levels in Iraq decrease, the so-called "enduring" military bases and embassy (the largest U.S. embassy in the world) indicate we are there to stay, that is unless the American people demand an end to this senseless war.

It has been two and a half years of war, and what is there to show for it?

According to the British newspaper, The Guardian "About 100,000 Iraqi civilians - half of them women and children - have died in Iraq since the invasion, mostly as a result of air strikes by coalition forces, as was mentioned in the first reliable study [by "The Lancet"] of the death toll from Iraqi and U.S. public health experts."

Do we need a draft before we are forced to answer [the] question, [am I willing to die for Iraq?]

According to the United Nations Development Programme, infant mortality and malnutrition among children has increased and supply of safe drinking water has deteriorated.

According to a January 14, 2005 article in the Washington Post, The National Intelligence Council reported that "Iraq has replaced Afghanistan as the training ground for the next generation of 'professionalized' terrorists."

Nine billion dollars of Iraqi "reconstruction" money under U.S. control is missing, according to the Wall Street Journal, and the cost to the U.S. taxpayers is more than $200 billion thus far.

The one positive outcome of this war is that Saddam Hussein is in a jail cell awaiting trial. However, if removal of Saddam Hussein were the goal, there were other options than war. For example, end the sanctions and let the Iraqis get rid of Hussein themselves, but, this wasn't the primary aim, as evidenced by the first President Bush's decision to suppress a popular rebellion that would have likely toppled the Hussein regime following the Gulf War in 1991.

Investigative reporter Seymour Hersh reports that the United States government rigged the Iraqi elections. This revelation further discredits the latest reason for war in Iraq: bringing democracy. This claim has always been absurd considering crucial support for the brutal dictatorship of Saddam Hussein by the war planners within the Bush Administration.

The war rages on and we still haven't had a serious debate as to why our nation went to war in the first place. Our leaders have put forth numerous reasons, none of which have squared with the facts.

Many soldiers have risked their careers and even prison time to oppose this war on moral grounds. Unsatisfied with the reasons and justifications, they refuse orders to risk their lives and to kill people in a foreign land.

Cindy Sheehan and other parents of soldiers who have paid the ultimate price in this war have begun to organize and protest. Mrs. Sheehan asks a simple question that still remains unanswered: for what cause has my son given his life?

How long will our generation of students wait before we stand along side courageous soldiers and grieving mothers opposing this war?

Shortly before the war began, former United States Marine Scott Ritter spoke to an audience of college students saying, Do we need a draft before we are forced to answer this question? Are we that selfish?

Some will say that those who protest the war dishonor our troops.

Our soldiers earned their honor when deciding to risk their lives to defend our Constitution and our people. We can honor them by demanding they no longer fight for any other reason.

It took five years after the United States began bombing South Vietnam before students became organized enough to lead the mass movement against the Vietnam War. Let's not wait five years. Let students unite now and end this war.

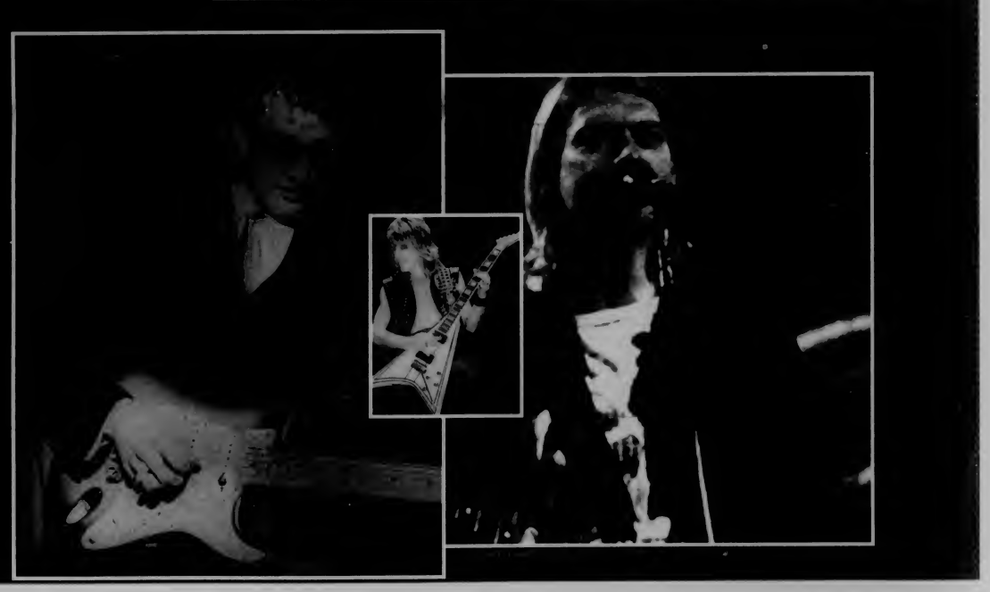
Sex, pop culture and dead rock stars

By Ian Jones
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Esquire" and "Spin" columnist Chuck Klosterman is deeply concerned with popular culture. His previous novel, "Sex, Drugs and Cocoa Puffs: A Low Culture Manifesto," is a collection of essays dealing with topics as diverse as "Saved by the Bell," Billy Joel as the "anti-cool," the social implications of amateur pornography, women who love John Cusack and why Coldplay is an awful band. For his next book, he decided to focus on the story behind a story he wrote for "Spin."



His latest work, "Killing Yourself to Live: 85% of a True Story," is ostensibly the story of his road trip through the United States visiting rock star death sites. He describes stops at Graceland, the woods where Lynyrd Skynyrd's plane crashed, the cornfield where the plane carrying Buddy Holly, Richie Valens and the Big Bopper went down and the greenhouse in which Kurt Cobain was found, among others. He even writes detailed comments on these places - for example, why rock stars seem to die in plane crashes so often. On the surface, it is very easy to say that "Killing Yourself" is about the deaths of rock stars.

Most of the book, however, is devoted to Klosterman's relationships with other people, specifically his romantic relationships. Late in the book, he relates a conversation with a friend in which she begs him not to write a book about the women he has dated. Of course, he does not take this advice, but he is somehow able to write an interesting book about both dead musicians and former lovers. His thoughts on his relationship with a woman named Lenore seem just as relevant as any thoughts he might have on the deaths of Sid Vicious and Nancy Spungen.

Part of the appeal of the book comes from Klosterman's informal style. It almost seems as though he is having a conversation with you. He comes off as a friend you have never met, and although it is often easy to disagree about things that he hates (his targets include the city of Los Angeles and punk rock) or things that he loves (his favorites include "The Real World" and Fleetwood Mac), there are a lot of things that many readers will be able to relate to.

Readers might have a hard time believing what Klosterman says at times. He opens the book by saying, "I am not qualified to live here," referring to New York City, and often writes about growing up in North Dakota and enjoying Chinese buffets and Fleetwood Mac. He complains that New York is more complicated, but if there's anything more complicated than a man who likes those things and also writes for "Spin," or holding down relationships with two women at the same time, it certainly isn't evident in this book.

The fact that Klosterman did not write a book solely about notorious deaths is actually what allows the book to succeed as it does. There is certainly an audience for that sort of thing, but his decision to write about a variety of things gives "Killing Yourself" a more universal appeal than one would expect. People who know nothing about music will not necessarily be turned off when he makes references to rock and roll, just as people who know nothing about sports probably will not mind when he writes about Lakers vs. Celtics games. The book ends up being about death, but not just the deaths of celebrities, and not just about the physical death; the book is about everything dying, from relationships with others to the success of a sports team. Although there will be plenty of times when a reader will disagree with Klosterman, there will be many more times when they are able to relate to him completely and understand exactly what he is talking about.

Flamboyant martial arts of 'Ong Bak' hit the small screen

By Stephen Gladwin
Collegian Correspondent

Twinkle-toed Thai martial artist Tony Jaa plays Ting, a pious villager trained in the Thai martial art tradition of Muay Thai. When Bangkok thieves steal the head of the village's Buddhist statue (the titular "Ong Bak"), Ting embarks to the capital city to retrieve the icon, trading twirling punches and kicks with vicious gangsters along the way.

Although the film may be considered something of a disappointment due to an annoying, self-serving narcissism and overkill visual flamboyance (most of the action sequences play in gratuitous slow motion, often replaying Jaa's martial acrobatics in various camera angles and distracting MTV-style jagged cuts), Fox's region-one NTSC DVD release offers up a mostly satisfying presentation. The anamorphic 1.85:1 image is sharp and mostly damage-free, reproducing the sun-splashed amber hues of the Bangkok photography without any chroma noise and only mild edge enhancement.

"Ong Bak"

Grade B+

Darker scenes fare slightly worse, tending to appear murky and undetailed. Tnan-kfully Fox has retained the Dolby Digital Thai soundtrack (presented in 5.1 surround), which makes good use of the surrounds for ambient noises (birds chirping, engines revving), instead of remixing it to include distractingly artificial sound effects. More problematic are the English subtitles, which inexplicably add closed-captioning cues ("birds chirping," "man groaning") to the subtitles. Although the subtitles are excellent, the closed captioning quickly grows tiresome, sometimes featuring useless cues such as "Thai language" or "inaudible" instead of subtitles!

An English 2.0 Dolby Digital surround track and Spanish subtitles are also included. It should be noted that this DVD release features the shorter "Luc Besson" cut (named after the French director who helped distribute and recut the film for foreign release), which inserts some French rap into the soundtrack and omits some of the more graphic bone-breaking shots, as well as most of the subplot involving Ngek (Rungrawee Borrijindakul), a drug-addicted Bangkok gangster. Those interested in seeing the film in its original form should seek out the Australian two-disc region-free PAL release, which offers both the Besson cut and the longer Thai original.

The extra features mostly consist of the expected promo materials, such as six trailers (U.S. teaser and theatrical trailers, Thai teaser and theatrical trailers, and French teaser and theatrical trailers), a music video, a "selected B-roll" (behind-the-scenes) segment of three scenes in the film (the taxi chase, the "flaming legs" sequence, and the arena fight), and a "making of" featurette on the music video. None of these features are particularly interesting, mostly consisting of cast and crew chest-puffing and, in the case of the music video, inane French rapping set to shots of Jaa bouncing around in a boxing ring. More exotic, but no more intriguing, is a short promo for the film featuring The Wu Tang Clan's RZA, in which the self-absorbed rapper spouts hip-hop pap set to clips from the film.

Rounding out the extras is a "live performance" (2 minutes, 32 seconds) by Jaa featuring the performer demonstrating his unique brand of martial art to a raucous audience, and "the eight movements of Muay Thai," a short (1 minute, 40 seconds) showcase of the eight main attacks of Muay Thai.

What to do if your friend is dating a jerk and doesn't know it

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Everyone knows a Jessica. If you watch "Laguna Beach," then you know what I'm talking about. She's the girl in your group of friends who dates a Jason. Jason was cool at first, and then turns out to be not-so-cool. Jessicas never see it. Somehow, this used-to-be-cool Jason is still seen by her as amazing, so when he stops picking up her calls or when he's not IMing her online, she doesn't choose to kick him to the curb. Instead, she turns to her friends for support.

The friends obligingly sit there and analyze with the Jessica until there's a viable excuse to give the Jason the benefit of the doubt, but soon a one-time occasion becomes a whole bunch of occasions. Suddenly, the formerly obliging friends interrupt and say, "I don't like him."

As soon as a girl decides she doesn't like a friend's choice in men, anything good said before that moment is null and void. The army comes out, and as the friend you're in danger of making Jessica feel like she was crazy to pick him to begin with. There's a better way.

As the friends, it's vitally important to help the blinded-by-lust (which she mistakenly thinks is love) Jessica ease off of her latest crush. Here's how.

Jessicas generally suffer from a low sense of self-worth. That shouldn't be too hard to figure out. Why else would she put up with such poor treatment from someone who is obviously no longer worth the time of day? As the friend of a Jessica, you can't simply announce that the Jason is a jerk and that she should get over him. The strategy is to talk her down off the ledge, and back to rational thinking, so she eventually comes to the decision herself.

Sit down with her as the good, caring friend that you are. She may resist at first, but tell her it'll help. Have her take a piece of paper and label one side "pros" and the other "cons." Then have her list as many things about the Jason that she can. At the end, she'll have more cons than pros. If she didn't, she wouldn't be at this point anyway. Putting things down on paper can put things into perspective, as the emotions tied in with those thoughts are no longer mixed in. It's black and white. Your Jessica can see it and come to the conclusion herself that the guy is lame and needs to go find someone much less fabulous than herself to confuse.

When she's done this, you can gently add that you think she can do so much better - and that the Jason is an idiot for not realizing what he had in the first place. She'll probably still be really emotional about things, but that'll pass eventually. Once she herself starts to realize that Jason isn't exactly the perfect male specimen she once thought he was, she's actually begun the process of moving on - or as I prefer to call it, moving up. Moving up is a much better phrase, because chances are the next guy she meets will be cooler than the guy she's currently stressing over. At least we can hope that he won't cause her as much stress.

After she's made the list of the pros and cons, have her turn it over and make a list of what she wants in her dream guy. Through this process she'll see that he's a lot less than her ideal, and that there's still more to hope for. Then, ask her if she'd trade her dream guy for the guy who's been broken down into pros and cons. If she says yes, you'll have to wait a few days and try again, but if she has any rational thought left in her poor confused head, she'll say no, and then you can jokingly tell her to quit wasting her time and go find the dream hottie.

It's common for relationships to start out really well and crumble as time goes on. The two realize they're not that compatible, some flaws start to show or whatever else. As a friend with no emotional involvement, you can see that Jessica is taking crumbs from Jason, when she should really be getting the whole cookie, and it's not just that Jessica deserves better - even though she does - because she's your friend. Everyone deserves better than crumbs. Never settle unless you're getting the whole cookie.

And don't lose hope that your Jessica friend can grow out of her ways. It takes time, but it can be done. Show her how awesome she is, take her out and flirt with a bunch of guys, and prove that, astonishingly, other guys exist besides her Jason.

'My Name is Earl' star skateboarded his way to acting success

By Luaine Lee
Knight Ridder

BEVERLY HILLS - When actor Jason Lee was offered the role in NBC's new comedy, "My Name is Earl," he actually sat down and drafted a pro-and-con list. It's the first time in his life he's been so torn about an idea.

"And there were, in fact, a few more pros than cons, so I said, 'OK.' In a situation like this - where it's a seven-year deal - I had to," says Lee in a quiet vestibule of a hotel business center here.

Making tough decisions was not new to him. At 16 he decided to blow out school and become a professional skateboarder. That decision wasn't nearly as difficult to make as this one, he says.

"I wasn't anti-social. I was very funny in school and very silly - I'd go along with everybody and hung out with the jocks and the weirdoes and the skaters and punkers. It wasn't like I was bitter and anti-social and wanted to rebel. I just knew I wasn't going to be a star baseball player or go to college to become a lawyer or something. I knew that just didn't suit me. So it was easy. It was, like acting, a naive thing. Had I put thought into it, it would've scared me away from doing it."

He grew up in Huntington Beach, Calif., in what he calls "a little bit of a Brady upbringing - where you go to school, you have a bedtime, you eat dinner every night, the mundane suburban upbringing."

Lee's dad was in the car business and Lee's youth revolved around sports and school. But at 17 he found himself in the brave, new worlds of Stockholm, Paris, Tokyo and points east in America.

"So through the traveling around the world that's when my eyes started opening up to books, museums, architecture, movies, music. It just started growing."

He became captivated with old German art, etchings and dry-point, photography and movies. The cinematic techniques of the Coen Brothers drew him to movies and filmmaking. "I found it fascinating, the Coen brothers and their style and the way they made films, and it was a genuine curiosity. It wasn't I wanted to be famous or make a lot of money. I didn't know better. It was a naive idea. But some of the best decisions you make that become successful right away are without over-thinking them. So it was a genuine curiosity to see what it would be like to play a character in a movie."

Lee was 24 and still a professional skateboarder. He wasn't sure how to start. "My girlfriend at the time, her mother was a manager for actors, and she's still my manager to this day. She knew the casting director of 'Mallrats,' Don Phillips. I went into meet with him. He said, 'He seems like a nice kid but he's a skateboarder, he's not even an actor. But I'll have him come back and read as sort of a favor.' So I came back and read for (director) Kevin Smith a bunch of times and he finally gave me the part."

With films like "Vanilla Sky," "Almost Famous" and "Chasing Amy" to his credit, he's fully embedded in show biz. But Lee, 35, is not impressed by the fame.

"With skateboarding I was always in some sort of spotlight or another, making money, the pressure, the trial-and-errors, the ups the downs. It was never about 'I want to be famous.' I wasn't trying to fill a void. Some people who are trying to fill a void - things become appealing to them because it makes them feel something. I don't need to feel that thing," he says.

"I have it through other means — as a photographer or as a writer. I was writing when I was a teen-ager and now I'm writing screenplays and have my own production company and my significant-other and my son. I'm excited when I wake up in the morning about creative things that drive me, not where's the party tonight?' and 'who can I schmooze and get to know?'" his almost 2-year-old son is Beth Riesgraf. Like him, he says, she's down-to-earth. "We're sort of old souls and my company is our company, we started it together so we have that creative process to look forward to every day," he says.

Jason Lee is 'Earl'

"She comes from a family that is very tight and full of love, from the Midwest. Her parents have been married for 40 years; she has five older sisters. They all get along. She's 27 but is an old soul and a great mother, very grounded, very creative and my best friend."

When the role of the goofy Earl came along, Lee wasn't sure he wanted to move into television. "Apparently (creator-executive producer) Greg Garcia wanted me to play Earl. I'd never done TV before and I think originally I said no. Then I said maybe, then I said no, then I said yes, then I said no. I put NBC through a bit of a difficult time because the commitment — signing a seven-year deal, 12-hour days, five days a week for half a year, every season. It was a really tough decision for me to make but in the end I couldn't deny the material and knew it was unique."

Jones remains 'Duchess of Coolsville'

By WALTER TUNIS
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

COURTESY RINK FM

Ricki Lee Jones remains an artist whose contributions to popular music are hard to classify when compared to those of her contemporaries such as Joni Mitchell and Linda Ronstadt.

She figures the term was coined nearly 25 years ago, when Time magazine became one of the first national publications to recognize the poetic pop-soul stride and overall hip quotient of her music. That's when Rickie Lee Jones became known as the Duchess of Coolsville.

It's a title the songwriter takes seriously. With it comes duties, of course — such as maintaining an artistic integrity that enforces the lasting quality of such early hits as "Chuck E.'s in Love" as well as comparatively overlooked albums, including 2003's "The Evening of My Best Day."

"That is the place most unique to my vision, my persona, that did not really exist before," Jones said via e-mail. "It's taken for granted now. My work has become easy to mistake for others' as well. But, no. I am the one who brought that kind of singer-songwriter girl-speak to pop music. It's a small and meaningless detail that will be lost in the history books. But before me, who was it?

"Joni Mitchell, dulcimer and saxophone? Linda Ronstadt and country-pop? Donna Summer and the early disco queens? Blondie — what was that? There were no bridges yet between rock-type songwriters and jazz and pop.

"I mean, I was, and still am, a strange brew."

Jones' invasion of pop radio at the close of the '70s couldn't have been more unexpected. For stations caught in a tug-of-war between disco and the emerging New Wave, the street-smart symphonies of Jones' irrepressibly jazzy self-titled debut album served as a dose of purposeful cool.

"I did not know who I was," Jones said of the time. "But now, watching it all unfold - and having a past, a present and a future — I think what a little character I was. The character I am now, it's a good and seasoned woman. There's not so much vaudeville, but plenty of heart."

Early success provided Jones a platform for abundant creativity. Albums would shift from her own rich music to reinventions of classic (and classy) pop nuggets to more overtly jazzy — and, at times, abstract — adventures. Some sold well; many didn't. But all serve as chapters in a compelling career saga summarized on a recent triple-disc Rhino anthology called — you guessed it — "Duchess of Coolsville."

"I guess I suffered a bit, success-wise, by performing so much diverse material early on - like 'My Funny Valentine,' 'Chuck E.'s in Love' and 'Under the Boardwalk.'" Jones said. "I mean, how do you market that? But I really felt vindicated as years went by. We don't sing a type of music. We sing a music and then you think of a name for it."

"Music labels are created after us, not before us. Do you know what I mean? Uncreative people, they reverse it. They've got a name. They've got a stereotype and they want someone to act that, ignoring the fact that what worked once, worked once. It worked because it was magic then and there."

Jones admits she approaches songwriting differently today than when albums such as 1981's sublime "Pirates" were hits. Then, there was a Bohemian excitement to creating her work. Today, she relies on improvisation, inspiration and a degree of channeling.

"When I was young, I took to the writing like an assignment," Jones said. "I got the right pen, the paper and circled the moment like a dog circling in the dirt trying to make things feel right. I'd find the right booth at the coffee shop and listen for the right line to start off. It was great fun, great work, pulling out the stories.

"Now, they come easier. I'm very into improvisation, into writing as it comes. The fact is, it does seem to arrive like a fax in a machine. Your job is to get it out."

And once it does emerge, then what? How does the music sent to the world with love from Coolsville sit with the singer today?

"As time goes by, maybe once in a while, you can say to yourself some sunny afternoon while having a Coke somewhere, 'Hey, that's my song they are playing.' Or at least, 'That's somebody copying my song.' That's gotta feel good."

Favre's streak continues on

"I've found myself a couple times saying, 'Why me?' Or, 'Why of all places . . . ? As quickly as that thought pops in my head - and it probably pops in my head more than I'd like it to - I try to remind myself of the things to be thankful for, which there are a lot."

Then, Favre sprained his ankle in the final exhibition game at Tennessee.

People who marvel at Brett Favre's ability to withstand the personal upheaval and still play football have forgotten what happened a decade ago.

Nothing comes close to the seasons of 1996 and then 1999 in terms of obstacles that could have derailed The Streak.

While Favre was the biggest star in the NFL, winning three straight MVP awards and going to two Super Bowls, he also had two problems: He abused painkillers and alcohol.

In 1995, Favre won his first NFL Most Valuable Player award. He was magical even as he withstood a flurry of injuries. Taking the prescription medicine Vicodin at first for the pain, Favre began abusing the drug and then became addicted.

After he suffered a terrifying seizure that made him realize he needed help, Favre agreed to check into the Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kan., for 45 days. It was the summer of 1996 and he has called it the most difficult period in his football career.

"I stopped taking painkillers," Favre said. "I kept drinking, which was stupid."

When he returned to Green Bay and began training camp, he said many memorable things in a news conference. Among them, the famous "Super Bowl or Bust" proclamation.

And then, after challenging anyone to bet against his full comeback from drug rehabilitation, Favre denied any problem with drinking and fought the ban placed on him by the NFL.

What happened next usually only happens to fictitious characters in movies. After Favre beat the drug addiction, he went on to lead the Packers to a 13-3 record, a Super Bowl championship and his second straight MVP award.

Soon after that, he decided to quit drinking, too, and has abstained from alcohol for seven years now.

"I've never been completely diagnosed as an alcoholic. I consider myself one," Favre said.

"When I drank, I drank to get drunk. There were times I had two beers, but that was because the other 10 were not available. I knew I drank for a reason. It wasn't the social aspect of it. If I was going to have a beer, I was going to have 30 or however many I could drink.

"That's an alcoholic. As I spent enough time in rehab, even though I was in for different reasons, I was listening, and I'm like, that's me. Even though I didn't want to say it, I fit that.

"That's being honest with myself, which took me a long time to do. And until I stopped, I was not honest with myself."

Favre stopped before the 1999 season, which was also the year Holmgren was gone and Favre played all season with an injured thumb that ruined his year.

That was also the year when he had considerable pressure on him as he neared the NFL starting streak record, which was held at the time by Ron Jaworski at 116 games.

"I am so thankful now I don't drink," Favre said. "There was so much I wasted back then. At least I was strong enough to overcome it. If I thought there was one person who could never stop drinking, it was me. I mean, that is what I grew up around . . . It's what everyone did.

"So I had to make huge lifestyle changes. Once I did, I found out I was not near as social as I thought I was. Was not near as much fun. Once I got over that, I was fine."

Today Favre does worry about the long-term effects the painkillers and alcohol may have on him.

"What's done is done," Favre said. "The biggest thing is that I stopped and was still able to have a normal life; was still able to play football. I have kids. [Quitting] turned my life around.

"I'm so thankful. Of all the negatives that have happened in my career, it's how you overcome them. I didn't do it alone, but I'm still here today and am as proud of the fact that I have turned my life around in so many different ways.

"More so than starting 225 games, that's an amazing feat. Because after that's done, you still have to live a life and what type of life you live is most important."

Despite Katrina and the sprained ankle, Favre started Game 226 of The Streak on Sunday at Detroit. When it will end, he has no idea.

Will he decide?

Will an injury?

Or maybe time?

There are reminders everywhere that time is passing by more quickly.

The Packers' first-round draft pick and anointed heir apparent is 21-year-old old Aaron Rodgers. He is 5 years older than Favre's older daughter, Brittany.

In the locker room, there aren't many players left from the old regime. One, Edgar Bennett, is an assistant coach.

"When Mike Holmgren left, I hated that he left; he was a great coach and meant a great deal to my career," said Favre. "I had already lost Mooch (Steve Mariucci). I had lost Andy Reid.

"I lost Frank Winters a couple years ago, and Chewy (Mark Chmura). Reggie White. All these guys were not only great friends but great teammates. We had something in common. Even Doug Pedersen, we had been here together before the Super Bowl. Lost a Super Bowl. The whole evolution."

Favre's record starting quarterback streak is somewhat of a widely accepted assumption. The Packers cannot confirm whether Favre's streak is the longest in team history, much less in the NFL among quarterbacks, because not all records from other teams are as complete to include such details.

And now, the game ball Jaworski gave Favre for the record 117th start that sits in his home in Hattiesburg seems ancient history anyway.

"I remember when Ron gave me that ball, I was too naive to know any different at the time," Favre said. "I had no clue I would be talking about this at 225 games. Hopefully there's 60 more, I don't know. As amazing as it has been, I haven't spent a whole lot of time dwelling on it."

Technically, Favre's starting streak is 206 regular-season games. Indianapolis quarterback Peyton Manning already has 112, from 1998-2004, only second to Jaworski, who had 116 from 1977-'84.

Favre is certain The Streak will be broken eventually.

"I'm sure they will," Favre said. "I know it seems like an unreachable record, but if you'd have asked me 10 years ago if I'd reach 225, I would have said I just hope I make it through today."

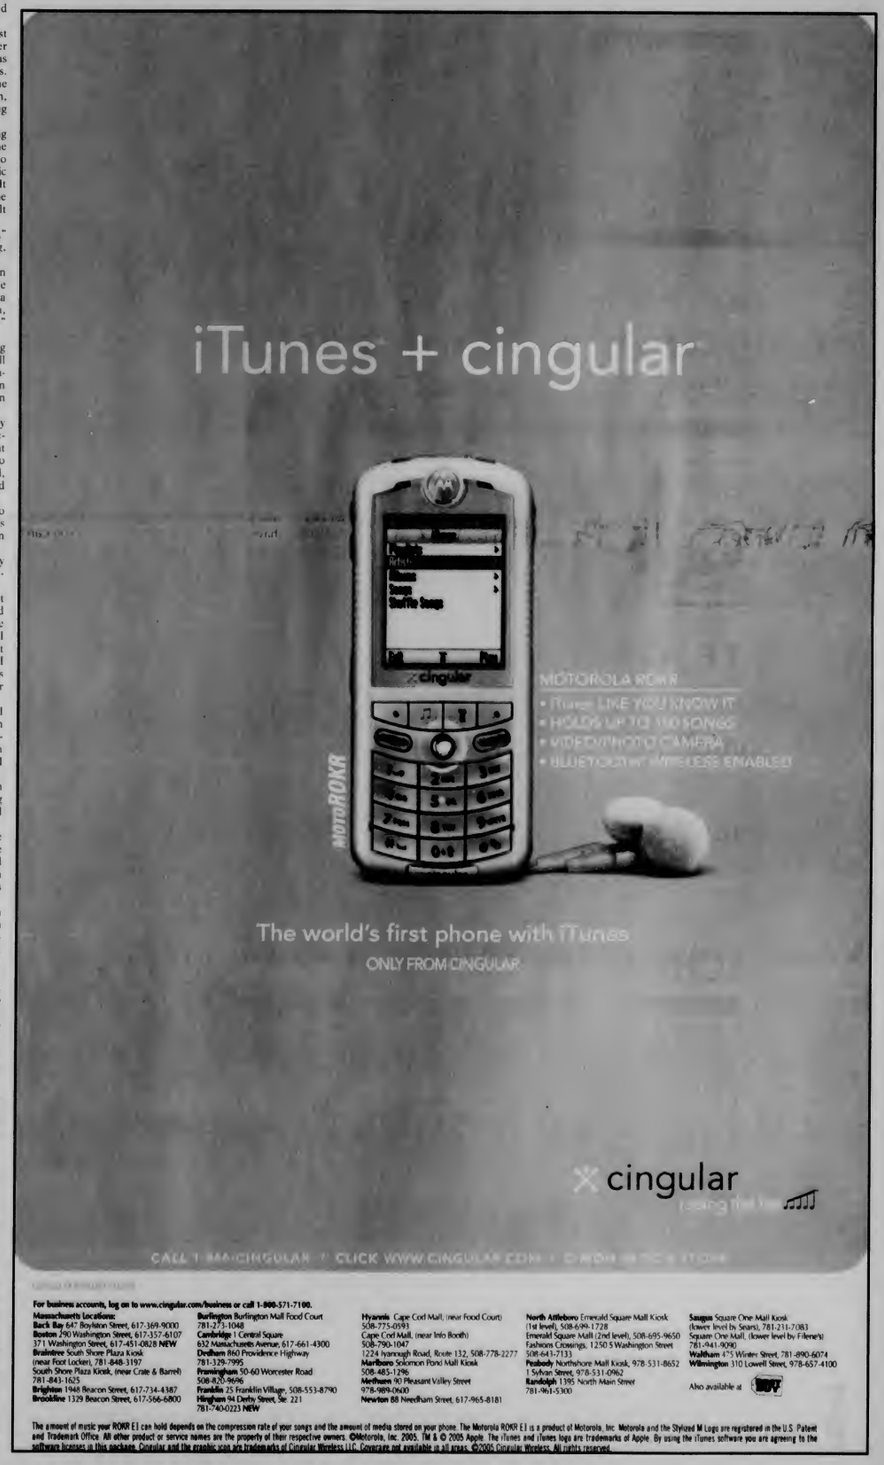
their claim against Next Proteins in an attempt to recoup part of that $16 million.

Moore said the Northwestern settlement "smacks of collusion."

"Northwestern is buying its way out of this case," he said. "It doesn't want Next Proteins to have an opportunity to join it in buying its way out of this case, because it wants to recover that money which it's paying."

The university, Moore said, was paying the excessive amount to shore up its reputation.



"It is suffering damages that have nothing to do with the kind of damages being suffered by (Next Proteins)," Moore said. "Northwestern is paying money to eliminate an exposure which has nothing to do with the facts of this case."

Thomas Demetrio, the lawyer for Wheeler's father, objected to Moore's characterization that the method of settlement amounted to collusion.

"I point-blank state there was never at any time collusion between the estate, the estate lawyers, the mediator and Northwestern University," Demetrio said. "And I want the record to be very clear on that. It was loosely thrown around in this courtroom."

Moore told Flanagan that he used the word collusion as a "term of art" in objecting to the settlement.

While Moore was arguing that the $16 million was excessive, lawyers for Linda Will, Wheeler's mother, were arguing the opposite.

Lawsuit in player's death

By Todd Lighty
Knight Ridder

CHICAGO - A lawyer for the maker of a performance-enhancing supplement taken by Northwestern football player Rashidi Wheeler the day he died in 2001 argued in court Monday that the $16 million the university agreed to pay Wheeler's family was "unreasonable and excessive."

Gary K. Moore, a lawyer for Next Proteins Inc., said Northwestern pushed for the settlement because one of its doctors burned Wheeler's medical records and because of the negative publicity the case has generated.

"Northwestern is making an attempt to resurrect its already soiled reputation by paying an excessive amount," Moore said.

JEFFREY SALVADOR/CHICAGO TRIBUNE FREE PRESS

Former Northwestern safety Rashidi Wheeler tackles Michigan State tailback Tyrell Dortch back in 2000. Wheeler died during practice in August of 2001.

Cook County Judge Kathy Flanagan noted Moore's objections but formally approved the settlement Monday and ordered the family's wrongful-death suit against the university dismissed.

The case now pits Northwestern against California-based Next Proteins, which once made the supplements Ultimate Orange and Ultimate Punch.

Wheeler, a senior safety, was one of about a dozen Wildcats who took supplements banned by the NCAA before participating in a preseason conditioning drill Aug. 3, 2001. Wheeler, a lifelong asthmatic, collapsed and died while running a series of sprints with his teammates.

Wheeler's family sued Northwestern and its athletic staff, saying the school was solely responsible for the death because the staff provided poor medical care and failed to quickly summon emergency help. In addition, the family alleged that the university engaged in a cover-up when one of its doctors burned records of Wheeler's last physical examination.

The university has maintained that the ephedra-containing supplements made by Next Proteins and others triggered an irregular heartbeat that killed Wheeler, even though the medical examiner ruled he had died from a "classic case of exercised-induced asthma."

Northwestern officials say they are still exploring their options but may pursue

Favre wise past his years

By Lori Nickel
Knight Ridder

GREEN BAY, Wis. - He's human, really. And that's hard to remember.

This is Brett Favre. Gunslinger. Competitor. Fighter. Champion.

Favre has started an NFL record 226 straight games at quarterback for the Green Bay Packers. Now into the 14th year of The Streak, Favre drives on as the records, his coaches, the opponents and his teammates fall by the wayside.

He walks gingerly on feet that ache and an ankle that's killing him. His head has at least one gray hair for every one of the 379 sacks.

This is Brett Favre. Survivor.

The kid transplanted from Mississippi's Rotten Bayou into Vince Lombardi's shadow has bared his soul from the beginning. And it's not just the injuries, the losses and the victories.

He's feared for his wife's health in front of us, mourned the death of his father before all of us, watched helplessly with us as Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Gulf Coast, his home.

He won a Super Bowl then lost the next one. He kicked one addiction, then another. All along the way, he's pulled up a chair and shared his tales, making so many feel like they can relate, somehow, to a rich, elite athlete who comes from the deep, rural South.

This is Brett Favre, an old friend.

In the 13 years before Favre, the Packers had one season above .500. In the 13 years since, the Packers have never had a losing season.

This is also Brett Favre. Savior.

But he's human, and he's made mistakes. He's endured hardships. To overlook that diminishes his perseverance.

It's not the end, but it's getting close. Sometimes the 35-year-old Favre doesn't resemble the cannon-armed kid. He's wise now, gracious and grateful.

And the person he's become may be more impressive than the player.

There have been numerous close calls that could have - maybe should have - ended The Streak.

To rank or rate them would be ridiculous. So they are presented here only for the sake of organization: injuries that should have been insurmountable; tragedies that left Favre in despair; and personal mistakes that only he could control and ultimately correct.

But know this first.

The NFL-record starting streak at quarterback began Sept. 27, 1992, but it really began Oct. 10, 1969, when Bonita Favre went into labor with her second child on a Friday, and Coach Irvin Favre went on to coach a high school football game later that night.

The Favres don't miss football games and Irvin would teach Brett more than the love of the game. He would pass on two strong traits: pride and stubbornness.

Brett had perfect attendance in 10 of his 12 years in school. Even when he had mononucleosis the month before his sophomore year of high school, and it kept him from football all year, he didn't miss an hour in the classroom, not the son of two teachers.

Today, three injuries stand out to Favre, injuries that brought him the closest to the bench and a certain end to The Streak: a broken thumb midway through 2003; the elbow injury in 2000 that caused him to miss most of the exhibition season; and the sprained ankle in 1995.

"When I broke my thumb, I felt fine," Favre said. "The problem was, how can I throw? We tried to throw a little bit that day of the Minnesota game, and it was OK, but it's different when guys start chasing you, and it's different because we're playing in Minnesota and I haven't had too many good games there."

In 2000, Favre hated missing exhibition season games and said throwing in the opener against the New York Jets that year was "like throwing darts at a pub; that's all I could do."

FROM LENOMEDE KATE/SURVIVAL SENTINEL

Brett Favre has started an NFL record 226 consecutive games for the Packers.

Against Chicago, Favre played on an ankle that should have been propped up on a sofa for two weeks. Coach Mike Holmgren let Favre make the call on that one, and Favre played one of the best games of his career.

Emotionally, Favre has had more than his share of heartbreak in the last two years. Taking a game off to cope and regroup would have been acceptable, yet he never did.

Near the end of 2003, after his father, Irvin, died of a heart attack, he played, as he knew his father would have wanted him to. But who would have ever expected that Favre would play his greatest game ever at Oakland, throwing for 399 yards, four touchdowns and a near-perfect quarterback rating?

Then midway through 2004, just a week after Favre's brother-in-law died in an all-terrain-vehicle accident, his wife, Deanna, was diagnosed with breast cancer. Tough enough to catch passes from Favre when they were kids, she was wiped out by her chemotherapy treatments.

Favre was so distraught that he seriously contemplated retirement at the end of last season. It wasn't until Deanna's successful treatment that Favre decided to come back for 2005.

Hoping the bad news was behind him for a while, Favre looked forward to just playing and enjoying this season.

Hurricane Katrina has already ruined that.

On Aug. 29-31, Favre's home in Hattiesburg became a refuge for 50 family members and friends from the most devastating storm of all time, more deadly than Camille in 1969, which also smashed into the Gulf Coast.

Flood waters saturated Favre's childhood home in Kiln, just 5 miles from the coastline, where his mother, brothers, grandmother, aunts, other extended family members and lifelong friends all reside. Some were left with just the clothes they had on when the wall of the eye and the storm surge hit.

Worse still, Favre couldn't get down there to help, and his loved ones couldn't get out. He remained in Green Bay, preparing for an exhibition game on almost no sleep with the building anxiety of watching TV news.

"I have been through my ups and downs. To try to focus in those situations is very difficult," Favre said. "I'm trying my best.

Parents of dead Red Sox fan sue gun company

BOSTON (AP) - The family of a Red Sox fan killed outside Fenway Park after a police officer trying to control a rowdy crowd accidentally fired a pepper-spray pellet into her eye has filed a $10 million suit against the gun maker.

The suit by the family of Emerson College student Victoria Snelgrove charges that FN Herstal USA falsely claimed its pellets don't break the skin. In fact, the suit said, the hardness and shape of the pellets "almost guarantee a serious or fatal injury if a vital area, such as the eye, is hit," according to the suit filed Monday in Suffolk Superior Court.

"As marketed, designed and sold, the (pepper-pellet gun) actually increased the likelihood of injury to innocent bystanders," the suit said.

The suit also claimed FN Herstal didn't adequately train officers when to use the guns. As a result, officers were confused and didn't understand the effects of firing a round.

James Falk, an attorney for FN Herstal, did not immediately return a call for comment on Tuesday. An official at the company's headquarters in McLean, Va., did not immediately return a call for comment.

In May, the city of Boston agreed to a $5 million wrongful death settlement with Snelgrove's family. As part of the agreement, the city cooperated in the suit against FN Herstal and will receive half of any award, up to $2 million.

Snelgrove was killed on Oct. 21 in a crowd that gathered outside Fenway Park to celebrate Boston's pennant-clinching win over the New York Yankees. Officer Rochefort Milien fired the "less lethal" weapon at an unruly man and hit Snelgrove.

The company claims the pellet breaks apart on impact so it doesn't penetrate the skin and cause serious injury, the suit said. But the pellets broke the skin on three people's heads that night, and is fired at a speed that makes penetration of soft tissue areas, such as the eyes, almost certain, the suit said.

On Monday, Suffolk District Attorney Daniel Conley determined that that no criminal charges would be filed against the police officers involved in the shooting.

Damon's MRI negative

Damon didn't play in Boston's 6-5 win in 11 innings over Toronto on Monday night. He has been playing with discomfort since injuring the shoulder on a slide against Baltimore on Sept. 4.

"The report was as good as it could be," Boston manager Terry Francona said. "Structurally there is no damage. I think he bruised that area. He's got some swelling."

Francona said Damon will remain in Boston for treatment while the Red Sox finish their Toronto road trip. Boston returns home to play Oakland on Thursday.

"Even if he can't (play), the news is good. He's going to be OK," Francona said. "We just have to let it settle down."

Damon got a cortisone shot after Friday night's game in New York, sat out Saturday and was Boston's designated hitter on Sunday. He is second in the AL in batting average (.321) and fifth in runs scored.

Vince Young's Longhorns are a newer breed of winners

By Gil LeBreton
Knight Ridder

FORT WORTH - Forget what you may have thought about the Texas Longhorns.

Forget the head coach, the one who annually bends a knee to Oklahoma. Forget the Chris Simms pampering days. Forget the image of a team that shies from a good fight. Forget all the seasons that Texas football always seemed to finish a game or two short.

Forget it because, as it proved Saturday night at Ohio State, this Longhorns team doesn't seem encumbered by any of it.

Against the No. 4-ranked Buckeyes, this Texas team stayed around for the fight.

In one of the preseason sidebars, head coach Mack Brown expressed his consternation over a photo of him that appeared on the September cover of Texas Monthly magazine.

In the picture, Mack has his arms defiantly crossed against his chest. His jaw is set. His disposition appears grim.

Below the folded arms, the cover reads, "Mack. Let's go kick some O.U. butt."

For one thing, Brown said, he wasn't told by the magazine that that's how the photo would be used. And for another thing, Mack added, he's well aware of what his recent record is against Bob Stoops and the Sooners. He was miffed that the cover makes him come across as cocky, when Brown clearly hasn't kicked enough OU posterior to be cocky.

Reactions came swift. Oklahoma fans reportedly mailed dozens of Texas Monthly copies to Stoops' office, presumably as pregame kindling.

Another fan, who wrote to the Austin American-Statesman Web site, was more pragmatic.

"Cancel my subscription," the man named Bob wrote. "Mack is too classy to say 'butt.' And too scared to say 'beat OU.' "

Two weeks into this college football season, however, Stoops is the one whose mood has to be grim. Brown's Longhorns are 2-0 and haven't flinched yet.

Forget what you might have thought about the Texas Longhorns. The defense doesn't blink. And the quarterback, as the Buckeyes learned Saturday, is no longer the green kid who thought with his feet at the first sign of trouble.

Vince Young was far from perfect at Ohio Stadium. He fumbled twice, threw two interceptions, was sacked three times and sidearmed the ball errantly at least five times to open receivers.

But the junior from Houston Madison put together scoring drives of 64, 84, 72 and 67 yards, the last one ending in a game-winning touchdown pass to Limas Sweed.

"Very seldom can you give up three turnovers, like we did," Brown said, "and still win the ball game, but our guys kept coming back and coming back. They believed in each other and gave themselves a chance to win at the end."

If Young, the hero of last season's Rose Bowl, has any lingering sins, it's that he still seems to think that he should always be the one who wins the game.

Brown's instructions to Young before the game-winning drive, however, reminded him that the quarterback doesn't always need to win the game on a 50-yard touchdown.

"It's staying poised," said Young, who finished with 346 yards of total offense. "It's Coach, pitching in my head, 'Do not turn the ball over. Take care of the ball. Take it a play at a time.' We've got some great athletes on our side of the ball."

With exactly five minutes remaining to protect a six-point lead, and with Young and the Longhorns starting from their own 33, the Ohio State defense relied on the old UT scouting report. It crowded the line of scrimmage, seeming to dare Young to throw the football, if he expected to win the game.

Forget what you used to think, though, about Texas football. Young now has the maturity and confidence to scan for options.

A third-down-and-six pass for nine yards to Jamaal Charles kept the winning drive going. On the touchdown pass, Young had the patience not to force the ball to the primary receiver, tight end David Thomas, and instead found Limas Sweed, falling backward in the end zone.

The Longhorns' final two big plays came, appropriately, from the Texas defense. It forced a fumble on the first play after the Texas kickoff, and with 19 seconds left, linebacker Aaron Harris smothered OSU quarterback Troy Smith for a safety.

Ohio State finished with 255 total yards. Brown finished with a confirmation that his defense can be counted upon.

Forget that Texas Monthly cover. Mack Brown does have demons to exorcise. He'll see those crimson-shirted Forces of Evil in October at the Cotton Bowl.

The Longhorns are tough. They're tested by battle. They're ranked as the second-best team in the country.

You can hardly recognize them.

RSO groups protest latest proposals

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

Students representing a wide range of Registered Student Organizations gathered yesterday to voice concerns about recently enacted policy changes and a recent shift in RSO advisors.

Approximately 65 students gathered outside the Student Union beginning at 10:15 a.m. and walked briskly in a single file line over to the Whitmore Administration Building around 11 a.m. to present their concerns to Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano. Students were calm and organized.

"It's not a protest. That's not the feeling we're going for," said Sean Bliss, SGA Speaker of the Senate. "There'll be no gimmicks, no sit-ins or chanting or any kind of publicity stunt along those lines."

Elvis Mendez, Vice President of AHORA, passed out campus activities request forms, which are typically used by RSOs to make purchases, and asked the assembled students to identify their organization and address their concerns to Gargano.

"It's important that we're not screaming and yelling, that we're quiet and we just pass in the form," Student Pagans Integrating Religion and Life Spiritually (SPIRALS) member Aimie Costello told the crowd.

In groups of two or three, students filed silently into the Whitmore Office for Student Affairs and left the forms with a secretary.

Following the protest, RSO members attached signs to their office doors with red tape that called for "Student Leadership, not Administrative Management."

Students began to mobilize after a Friday meeting was held in the SGA office for RSO leaders to share concerns and ideas. The informal meeting was organized by SGA leaders after several concerned students approached them.

One of students' main grievances is the mandated RSO advisor reassignments and the impending transfer of one of the four current full-time RSO advisors, in addition to the loss of a graduate student advisor who graduated last spring.

This will leave the Center for Student Development understaffed and make it difficult for students to schedule meetings with their advisors in time to plan events, said Bliss.

With the shift in advising assignments, RSOs

Category one hurricane pounds Carolinas

By Kristen Gelineau
Associated Press

NAGS HEAD, N.C. — Hurricane Ophelia crept up the North Carolina coast Wednesday with high wind, driving rain and pounding surf that washed away a barrier island street, cut off electricity to thousands and threatened widespread flooding.

The storm had sustained wind of 85 mph Wednesday afternoon, up from 75 mph early in the morning, the National Hurricane Center said. Hurricane warnings were shifted northward, covering the entire North Carolina coast from the South Carolina line to Virginia, where a tropical storm warning covered the mouth of Chesapeake Bay.

The northern side of Ophelia's eyewall — the circle of strongest wind surrounding the eye — was expected to reach North Carolina's southeast coast late Wednesday, the hurricane center said.

Up the coast on the Outer Banks, officials warned that Ophelia could bring 11 hours of hurricane-force wind to Hatteras Island.

Gov. Mike Easley issued a last-chance warning to residents to get out the way of anticipated flooding from hours of sustained rain and storm surges that could reach 11 feet.

"We have a concern that people in flood-prone areas need to get out," Easley said at an afternoon news conference. "We're asking and begging them to do that because it's going to be hard to get them out later."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency had at least 200 workers on the ground in North Carolina for the first post-Katrina hurricane, a larger-than-usual contingent given Ophelia's size. FEMA also put Coast Guard Rear Adm. Brian Peterman in place to command any federal response the storm may require.

Unlike Hurricane Katrina, which made a head-on charge at the Gulf Coast two weeks ago, Ophelia had slowly meandered and waxed and waned in strength since forming off the Florida coast last week, making it hard for some to take the storm seriously.

Wednesday dawned bright and sunny, but windy, on the Outer Banks, where stormy weather is a way of life.

KRT

Members of the North Carolina National Guard battle through heavy rain from approaching Hurricane Ophelia yesterday in Harlowe, N.C.

"It's an island. The water will come over, it'll go out, and we'll do it all over again," Tiffany Bigham, 27, said after she finished boarding up her living room windows. Bigham, a lifelong resident of Hatteras Island, said she and all the other locals she knows were planning to stay put, despite an order that everyone evacuate the island.

However, the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina along the Gulf Coast prompted others to take Ophelia more seriously.

"We got such a dose of it on TV, it's almost impossible not to be concerned," said Roger Kehoe, 68, of Yardley, Pa., one of the visitors who left a campground at Myrtle Beach, S.C.

Rain had started falling Tuesday in the state's southeast corner, and by Wednesday morning Brunswick County had measured 6.5 inches. Meteorologists warned that some areas could get a total of 15 inches as the storm slowly crossed the region.

A 50-foot section of street was washed away by heavy surf at Brunswick County's Ocean Isle Beach, about 100 miles northwest of the storm's center, and other streets were under water, emergency officials said. A message at the police department said the island's only bridge to the mainland was closed.

Some 50,000 homes and business were without power in eastern North Carolina, including the entire barrier island community of Kure Beach - population 1,700 - south of Wilmington, Easley said.

Northeast of Wilmington, Onslow County reported some docks underwater near the New River Inlet and 215 people in shelters.

RSOs, SGA prepare for possible changes

By Brian Castro
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA), Registered Student Organization (RSO) leaders and student businesses organized last Friday night to discuss recent policy changes that included facilities fees and administrative changes students felt were unfair.

Since the school year began, several RSOs brought complaints to the SGA.

"At first rumors went around. The RSOs found out about these policies over the summer," said SGA President Pavel Payano.

According to Payano, the SGA spoke to Student Activities staff to find out about the policy changes because they were not informed by the administration.

Payano left it up to the RSOs to organize and allowed them to use SGA meeting space.

"There were too many issues for the SGA to handle. We thought it would be better for the RSOs to go at it and have their voice heard," said Payano.

Nearly 80 RSOs and student business leaders crowded into the SGA office Friday to discuss

Memorial for student planned

The Newman Catholic Center, located at the intersection of North Pleasant St. and Massachusetts Ave. on the University of Massachusetts campus, will hold a ceremony this afternoon at 4 p.m. to remember the life of Alex DeSerpa, a student who unexpectedly died a few weeks ago.

DeSerpa, who is from East Bridgewater, was in the UMass Class of 2006. He was a member of the Phi Beta Kappa fraternity, a Commonwealth College student, a Psychology and Mathematics major and a Classics minor. He also served as a student advisor, teaching assistant, and TAP ambassador in the psychology department. He held a campus job as a second-shift custodian at the UMass Campus Center for three years, and he was also a resident assistant in Webster Hall in the Orchard Hill Residential Area.

Members of the Newman Catholic Center say DeSerpa was a highly respected member of the University community. His family would greatly appreciate people's presence at the memorial service today.

UDEMS gear up for a new school year

By Georgia Kelley
Collegian Staff

Approximately 60 individuals, including students and members of surrounding local communities, gathered last night at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center for the University Democrats' first meeting of the year.

With more than several new executive board members, the UMass DEMS started off their year by bringing in keynote speakers Jon Bonifaz and Patricia Duffy.

Bonifaz, a candidate for the Secretary of the Commonwealth in 2006, says returning politics to the people, making democracy work for all, free and fair elections and political equality are all part of his new "Bill of Rights."

Other rights in his bill include counting every vote, making voting easier and ensuring access to voting for all new citizens.

"We should not discriminate against people who cannot speak English," said Bonifaz.

He also expressed his negative feelings towards the war in Iraq, arguing that during Hurricane Katrina, when the storm hit full force, National Guard members from Louisiana and Mississippi were stationed in Iraq when they could have been helping victims.

"This war is illegal, this war is unconstitutional and it is time to bring our troops home," said Bonifaz.

Duffy, a candidate for the Nov. 8 Holyoke City Council election, spoke briefly about her campaign plans. She wants to focus on developing Holyoke jobs and businesses, wastewater management and decreasing crime statistics.

Duffy also hopes to increase safety in Holyoke by holding police force meetings regarding crime, as well as increasing their time patrolling.

The UMass DEMS spent the summer planning events, redrafting their constitution and participating in national conventions.

On July 21, members attended the College Democrats of America conference in Washington, D.C. where they learned new tactics to educate and mobilize students to get involved with politics. There they saw guest speakers ranging from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

The organization's biggest upcoming event is a national conference to be held at UMass. On Nov. 12 from 9-6 p.m. the UMass DEMS will welcome Congressman Barney Frank, State Representative Ellen Story, Director of Public Relations and Governmental Affairs for the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts Angus McQuilken, and Interim President of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America Karen Pearl to speak on topics varying from environmental issues to emergency contra-

Gay marriage remains legal in Mass.

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — A year after the nation's first state-sanctioned same-sex marriages began taking place, the Massachusetts Legislature on Wednesday rejected a proposed constitutional amendment that sought to ban gay marriage but legalize civil unions.

It was the second time the Legislature had confronted the measure, which was designed to be put before voters on a statewide ballot in 2006. Under state law, lawmakers were required to approve the measure in two consecutive sessions before it could move forward.

After less than two hours of debate, a join: session of the House and Senate voted 157-39 against the measure.

It was a striking departure from a year earlier when hundreds of protesters converged on Beacon Hill over the hot-button issue, legislators were torn over it and spent long hours debating the matter, and thousands of same-sex couples began a new era of getting married.

This year, the crowds were tamer and some legislators who had initially supported the proposed change to the state constitution said they no longer felt right about denying the rights of marriage to same-sex couples.

"Gay marriage has begun, and life has not changed for the citizens of the commonwealth, with the exception of those who can now marry," said state Sen. Brian Lees, an East Longmeadow Republican who had been a co-sponsor of the amendment. "This amendment which was an appropriate measure or compromise a year ago, is no longer, I feel, a compromise today."

The state's highest court ruled in November 2003 that same-sex couples had a right under the state constitution to marry. The first weddings began taking place on May 17, 2004 - two months after lawmakers began the multi-step process of seeking to change the constitution to reverse the court's ruling.

In the year-plus since the weddings began taking place, more than 6,100 couples had married.

Still, the battle is far from over.

Now, lawmakers are girding for a battle over a more-restrictive proposed constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage but not allow for civil unions. The earliest that initiative could end up on the ballot is 2008.

"The union of two women and two men can never consummate a marriage. It's physically impossible. We can't get around that. You can be a family, absolutely. You can be loving, and I respect that absolutely. But you're not married," said Rep. Phil Travis, D-Rehoboth. "The other 49 states are right and we are wrong."

In March 2004, the Legislature had voted 105-92 in favor of the measure, which would have banned same-sex marriages but introduced Vermont-style civil unions. For the proposed amendment to wind up on a state ballot for voters to weigh in, lawmakers in two consecutive sessions needed to approve an identical proposal.

But the political landscape has changed.

Roberts fights through tough questions

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts carefully picked his way through a second day of questions from the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday as Republicans challenged Democrats to support his all-but-certain confirmation as the nation's 17th chief justice.

"If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

Minority Democrats sounded unswayed.

Sen. Charles Schumer told Roberts he was "cutting back a little on what you said yesterday," referring to Roberts' earlier statement that the Constitution provides a right to privacy.

The New York Democrat made his charge after Roberts declined to cite any examples of disagreement with the opinions of Justice Clarence Thomas. Thomas has written there is no general right to privacy, a right often viewed as the underpinning of a right to abortion.

"We are rolling the dice with you," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., told the 50-year-old appeals court

Judge rules Pledge of Allegiance unconstitutional

By David Kravets
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal judge declared the reciting of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools unconstitutional Wednesday, a decision that could put the divisive issue on track for another round of Supreme Court arguments.

The case was brought by the same atheist whose previous battle against the words "under God" was rejected last year by the Supreme Court on procedural grounds.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton ruled that the pledge's reference to one nation "under God" violates schoolchildren's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God."

Karlton said he was bound by precedent of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in 2002 ruled in favor of Sacramento atheist Michael Newdow that the pledge is unconstitutional when recited in public schools.

The Supreme Court dismissed the case last year, saying Newdow lacked standing because he did not have custody of his elementary school daughter he sued on behalf of.

Newdow, an attorney and a medical doctor, filed an identical case on behalf of three unnamed parents and their children. Karlton said those families have the right to sue.

Newdow hopes that will make it more likely the merits of his case will be addressed by the high court.

"All it has to do is put the pledge as it was before, and say that we are one nation, indivisible, instead of dividing us on religious basis," Newdow told The Associated Press.

"Imagine every morning if the teachers had the children stand up, place their hands over their hearts, and say, 'We are one nation that denies God exists,'" Newdow said.

"I think that everybody would not be sitting here saying, 'Oh, what harm is that.' They'd be furious. And that's exactly what goes on against atheists. And it shouldn't."

Karlton, ruling in Sacramento, said he would sign a restraining order preventing the recitation of the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

Court ruling could affect Kazaa music downloaders

By Alex Mueller
Daily Collegian (Penn State)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — A recent court ruling across the world could affect the way students at Pennsylvania State University download their music.

Last week, a federal judge in Australia ordered distributors of the Australia-based file-downloading program Kazaa to alter software so it cannot be used to download illegal files.

Kazaa is an immensely popular downloading tool with more than 390 million downloads since its inception in 2001, according to The Associated Press.

The court ruling could significantly cut back the amount of files available for illegal download around the world.

A 2004 Penn State partnership with the Napster online music service gave students a legal music-downloading alternative that included a variety of music downloads that are available for free on students' computers.

The Napster program has been evolving since it was instituted, Penn State spokesman Bill Mahon said.

"They have more options available and an increasing number of Penn State student bands and musicians are making their music available over [Napster]," he said.

"Where students in the past taking popular music courses would have had to buy CDs, they can now, through an online version of the course, click and listen to the music on their computer," he added.

Bill Kelly, head of the integrative arts department, teaches Integrative Arts 115 (Popular Music), an online course that uses Napster.

Kelly said that although he does not condone downloading files illegally, he disagrees with the ruling in Australia about Kazaa.

"I'm not convinced that because software programs can be used illegally that we can then restrict those programs," he said. "Personally, I'm deeply troubled by illegal downloading."

Kelly said Napster has been useful in teaching his course, adding that he sees no reason why a student should use another downloading service.

"Napster has made it possible to even do this course," he said. "We couldn't have the amount, or the kinds, of musical resources that Napster provides otherwise."

Forest Mullinary (senior-telecommunications) said he used Napster last year when he lived on campus, but since he moved off campus, he has stopped using the service.

Two Katrina victims stabbed in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Two Loyola University students attending classes at Boston College after their school was shut down by Hurricane Katrina were stabbed on a Boston street early Wednesday morning.

Joseph Vairo, 19, was in stable condition at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center after being stabbed at least twice. Marley Lovell, 20, of Oakland, Calif., was treated and released for cuts and a broken nose. Vairo is originally from Holden.

The students — among 150 from Loyola and Tulane University who are temporarily attending Boston College — got into an argument with five men at 1:30 a.m. outside a Store 24 in Cleveland Circle, said Officer Mike McCarthy, a Boston police spokesman.

They walked away, but were attacked moments later, McCarthy and Boston College spokesman Jack Dunn said. McCarthy said there have been no arrests. Police said they are seeking two young men.

Vairo was stabbed "multiple times" in the "left and right chest area," Dunn said.

"His condition is stable and he is improving," Dunn said. "He is doing remarkably well."

It was not immediately known if the students had been in the New Orleans area when Katrina struck. On Sept. 6, they began attending classes at Boston College, one of many schools around the country that reached out to displaced students.

Loyola, located in New Orleans, is closed for the fall semester. The school's Web site said the campus suffered only minor physical damage and will reopen for the spring semester.

The two victims were living off campus, although most displaced students are on campus. After the hurricane, the city of Boston approved an emergency permit to allow Boston College to house 100 displaced students in a building it recently purchased from the Archdiocese of Boston.

Snow on cars could bring fines

BOSTON (AP) — Winter drivers too lazy or rushed to clear snow and ice from their cars would face fines and even jail under a bill being considered by the state Legislature.

The bill, considered Tuesday by the Joint Committee on Transportation, seeks to reduce the danger to other drivers from chunks of snow and ice that fly off car roofs or hoods. Motorists who don't clear their vehicles face a $500 fine or a prison term of up to six months.

If it passes, Massachusetts could become the first state to require snow- and ice-free cars.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Brian Knuuttila, D-Gardner, told The Boston Globe that it's urgent to pass the bill into law before winter.

"We're not too far away from the first snow flying," Knuuttila said. "We've got to make people aware that if they persist in this type of negligent behavior, someone is going to get seriously injured. We need to have some serious negative sanctions."

Art Kinsman, director of government affairs for AAA Southern New England, said people who don't clear their cars should be fined because they are "lazy and irresponsible."

But he said the proposed penalty is too high and said police officers might be reluctant to enforce the law.

Rep. Joseph F. Wagner, co-chairman of the Transportation Committee, said the language in the bill is too vague. Right now, it bans "operating a motor vehicle with an accumulation of snow or ice which constitutes a threat to public safety." But he noted snow and ice can easily accumulate on a cars driving through a heavy storm.

"There is some gray area here we need to try to figure out how to deal with," said Wagner, D-Chicopee. "But I don't think it's unreasonable that folks should clear their car of snow and ice."

Paula Waugh saw a need for the bill after a chunk of ice flew off a tractor trailer in Winchendon and smashed her windshield, leaving her with a broken nose and other facial injuries.

After the accident 2 1/2 years ago, she pushed Knuuttila to sponsor the bill.

"It's a matter of taking a little extra time," she said. "I've had people tell me they wouldn't want to fool with something like that, that they don't have time to clean off their cars. But they have no idea what that ice can do."

Local Paris Hilton stalker faces jail time

BOSTON (AP) — A Massachusetts teenager who reportedly hacked into Paris Hilton's cell phone account has been sentenced to 11 months in prison at a juvenile facility.

Celebrity phone numbers stored in Hilton's cell phone were posted online when her account was hacked earlier this year. A Washington Post report on Wednesday identified Hilton as a victim of the 17-year-old Massachusetts boy.

The boy is a juvenile under federal law. Prosecutors would not name him or confirm Hilton as a victim, citing federal law that keeps such information under seal in juvenile cases.

The teenager was sentenced last week in U.S. District Court in Boston. He pleaded guilty before Judge Rya W. Zobel to nine counts of juvenile delinquency, prosecutors said.

The charges included hacking into Internet and telephone service providers, theft of personal information and posting it on the Web, and making bomb threats to high schools in Florida and Massachusetts, all over a 15-month period.

While in custody and during two years of supervised release, the teenager is prohibited from possessing or using any computer, cell phone or other equipment capable of accessing the Internet.

Prosecutors said the teenager's first crime was committed in March 2004, when he e-mailed a bomb threat to a Florida school. The school was closed for two days while officials investigated and ruled the threat a hoax.

In January, the teenager hacked into T-Mobile's computer system and looked up account information of its customers, including Hilton.

This spring, he arranged "with one or more associates" to make a bomb threat to a Massachusetts school, prosecutors said. They said an investigation of the teen's associates is continuing.

Paris Hilton's stalker from Mass. was recently ordered to 11 months at a juvenile correctional facility.

Hilton, a hotel chain heiress whose sex tape with an ex-boyfriend became a cyberspace novelty, stars on the Fox TV reality show "The Simple Life."

The story was first reported on the Post's Web site on Tuesday. It said a washingtonpost.com reporter had a series of telephone and online communications between March and June with the teen, and that he admitted to the crimes for which he was sentenced. It did not publish his name.

Court nominee faces tough questions

judge, who turned aside questions about abortion, the right to die, the permissibility of torture and other issues he said may come before the court.

Even as Roberts fielded questions, there was fresh evidence of the contentious issues that await him if he is confirmed to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. There were gasps from the audience when word was relayed from the committee dais that a federal judge in California had ruled the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools was unconstitutional because it includes the words "under God." Roberts was not asked for his opinion.

For the second straight day, Roberts fielded questions calmly, summoning descriptions of past cases from memory. He spiced his testimony with a sense of humor, promising at one point that if confirmed, he would not seek a pay raise "next week."

Republicans projected ever greater confidence that he would soon preside in the grand marble Supreme Court building across the street from the Capitol.

"We need you to bring to the court your compassion and your understanding for the lives of others who haven't been as successful as you have been," said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, one of several Republicans who spoke as if giving a send-off message to a man about to embark on a new mission.

GOP officials say they are confident of the support of all 10 Republican members of the committee when the roll is called next week, although it is possible all eight Democrats will oppose him.

Officials in both parties say Roberts is likely to receive votes from several Democrats when his nomination reaches the full Senate. Among them are senators who represent Republican-leaning states or those who joined in a bipartisan compromise earlier this year to defuse a threatened showdown over the administration's conservative appeals court judges.

Across several hours in the witness chair, the former Reagan administration lawyer was modestly more forthcoming than he had been on Tuesday.

He sparred anew with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy about civil rights. "Did I hear that it's not constitutionally suspect as far as you view it today?" the Massachusetts Democrat asked about a key section of the Voting Rights Act. "Yes," said Roberts, going beyond what he had said on Tuesday.

In other areas, while he made no commitment, he told Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., that if four other justices wanted to grant a new hearing to a prisoner on death row, he would join them to make a majority for temporarily prevening the execution. "It obviously makes great sense. ... You don't want to moot the case by not staying the sentence," he said.

In response to a question from Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., he said Congress has the right to overturn a recent Supreme Court ruling that allows cities broad power to seize and raze people's homes for private development. "This body and legislative bodies in the states are protectors of the people's rights," Roberts said. He said he had been surprised when he learned of the court's ruling.

In numerous other cases during the day he politely but insistently declined to answer questions.

He told Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., he would not discuss questions of discrimination against homosexuals, or provide an opinion about the legal representation due to certain prisoners held in the war on terror.

He refused to be drawn into a discussion with Biden or Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California when they asked about a "right to die."

And he said he wouldn't discuss the particulars of a case that Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, asked about in which the Supreme Court overturned a law Congress had passed.

Later, Specter told reporters Roberts had "answered more questions than most."

"Nominees answer about as many questions as they think they have to to be confirmed," added the Pennsylvania Republican. "I think it may well be, and it's too soon to say with certainty, that Judge Roberts has gone beyond."

Schumer disagreed. He told Roberts he had turned the hearing room into a "cone of silence."

Bloodiest attack in Baghdad kills 160

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — More than a dozen highly coordinated bombings ripped through Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least 160 people and wounding 570 in the capital's bloodiest day since the end of major combat. Many of the victims were day laborers lured by a suicide attacker posing as an employer. Al-Qaida claimed responsibility for the attacks in the name of Sunni insurgents, saying it was retaliation for the rout of militants at a base close to the Syrian border.

The spasm of violence terrorized the capital for more than nine hours. The first attack, at 6:30 a.m., was the deadliest: a suicide car blast which tore through the predominantly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Kazimiyah.

In what was believed to be a new tactic, the bomber set off the explosive after calling the construction and other workers to his small van and enticing them with promises of employment, a witness said. At least 112 people were killed and more than 200 were wounded, according to Health Ministry officials. Twisted hulks of vehicles blocked the bloodstained main street in Kazimiyah's Oruba Square.

Al-Qaida's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, purportedly declared "all-out war" on Shiites, Iraqi troops and the government in an audiotape posted Wednesday on an Internet site known for carrying extremist Islamic content.

The al-Zarqawi tape was a clear attempt, coming on the heels of the attacks, to create a climate of fear, sow deeper sectarian discord and scare Iraqis away from the Oct. 15 referendum on a new constitution.

Iraqi forces arrested two insurgents in connection with the Kazimiyah bombing, one of them a Palestinian and the other a Libyan, Iraqi television quoted Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari as saying. Al-Jaafari also said the suicide bomber was a Syrian, without offering any details how the identification was made so quickly.

The attacks came as U.S. and Iraqi forces pressed their offensive against insurgents in the northern city of Tal Afar and along the Euphrates River valley, striking hard at what officials have said were militants sneaking across the border from Syria.

Al-Qaida in Iraq said in a Web posting that it launched the attacks, some less than 10 minutes apart, in response to the Tal Afar offensive, which began Saturday and evicted most insurgents from the city about 50 miles from Syria and 260 miles northwest of Baghdad.

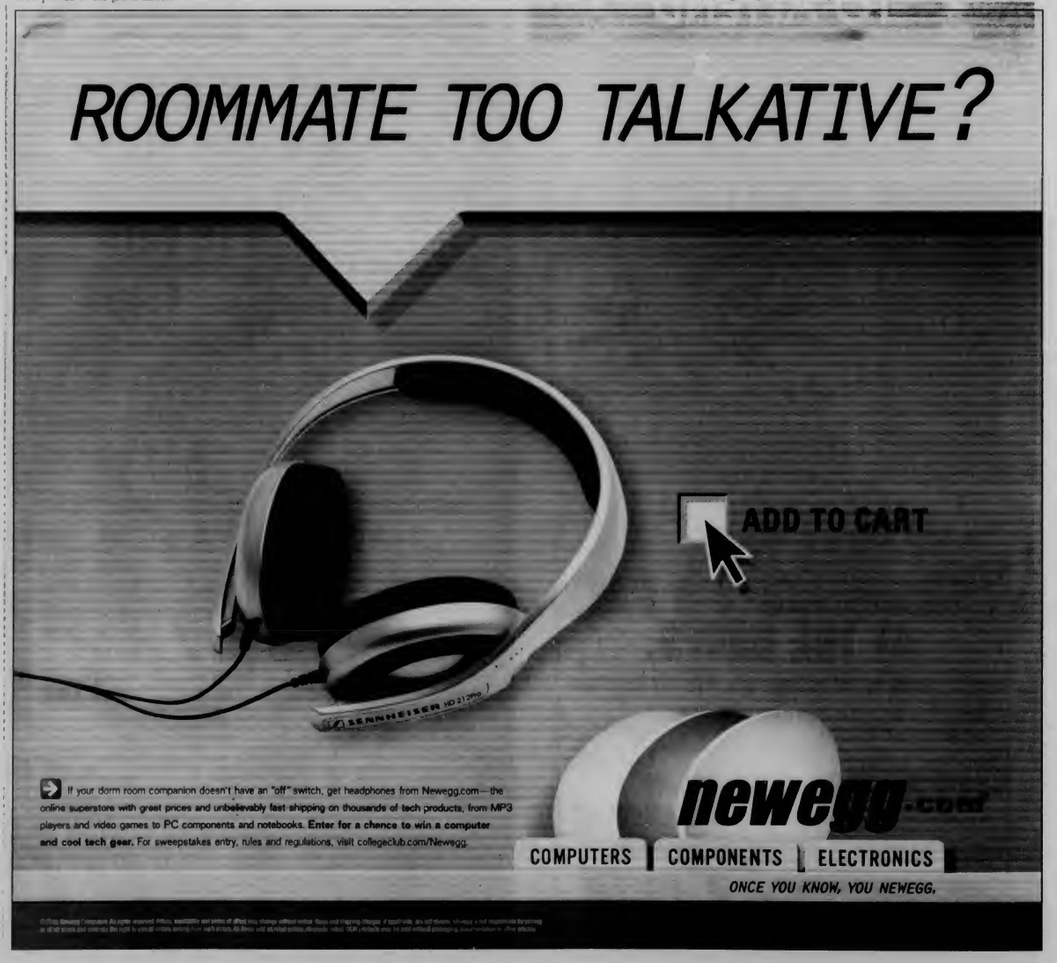
ception.



The conference will also include a liberal date auction where people will offer to go out on dates to raise money for liberal causes - featuring a live band.

Additional plans for the upcoming year include a training session in October called "Campaign Core," which explains how to run a successful campaign, and a possible debate with the Republican Club.

The UMass DEMS' main goals are getting Patricia Duffy elected in Holyoke, raising awareness and increasing involvement in politics on campus, and holding successful meetings.

The UMass DEMS plan to have bi-weekly meetings, the first of which will be an open meeting where current events will be discussed. The second meeting will host a panel of experts answering questions involving healthcare, social security, reproductive rights and equal marriage.

Meetings will begin next Wednesday, Sept. 21, from 7-8 p.m. at a location that has yet to be determined.

Calif. rethinks emergency plans

By April Lynch and Glennda Chui
Knight Ridder

SAN JOSE, Calif. — The federal government's failure to help thousands of survivors for days after Hurricane Katrina has many Californians wondering if they would face the same fate in their own worst-case disaster — a catastrophic earthquake.

How long would neighborhoods and cities be left to fend for themselves, without food, water, shelter or security? Would the very basics of survival be beyond people's reach?

Those questions have Bay Area residents stocking up on disaster supplies and officials considering whether they'll have to go it alone for longer than the 72 hours that current disaster scenarios assume.

"The response in Louisiana was representative of a Third World country," said Dallas Jones, a leader of California Professional Firefighters and former director of the state's Office of Emergency Services. "What can we expect, and in what time frames, from the federal government? We need to look into this so that we know if we need to be self-sufficient for two days, three weeks or three months."

California starts from a position of strength. It has spent billions strengthening its freeway overpasses and reinforcing buildings. Its mutual aid system, tested time and again by fires, quakes and floods, is a national model.

But much work remains undone. The Bay Bridge and BART tube have yet to be reinforced. Hospitals, schools, apartment buildings, workplaces and water systems remain vulnerable. And federal funding for earthquake research and preparedness has been cut.

RSOs frustrated with admin's new plans their concerns and create a plan for action.

RSO leaders decided to organize once they learned that one of the advisors was being forced to leave. The group, composed of members of assorted RSOs, student businesses, and Greeks, is calling themselves the "Student Union."

The students mobilized and handed out petitions at the meeting. RSO members also created committees to focus on different areas for their campaign, including advertising and a Web site.

At the meeting, students voiced their opinions about reshuffling four RSO advisors. Many said the switch would make it harder for RSOs to reach their advisors.

"[MASSPIRG] has many sporadic events that pop, and we have to be able to get a hold of an advisor as soon as possible," said Marcin Wolynski, UMass MASSPIRG Chapter Chair.

With the news that one of the four advisors would soon be transferred to another department at UMass, students were also concerned that there would only be three advisors to work with the nearly 200 RSOs at UMass.

However, Amy Glynn, Associate to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano, said Student Affairs isn't eliminating or letting go of anyone.

"We had a resignation in event planning, and we are looking to meet each area's needs. I asked for a volunteer advisor interested in transferring," said Glynn.

To replace the transferring advisor and a graduate associate advisor who left last spring, Student Affairs will add three more graduate assistants, at least one of whom will work with RSOs 20 hours a week, Glynn said.

Glynn had suggested this past summer that advisors shuffle their RSOs. "Each advisor already has an eclectic group of RSOs, and each fall there is usually new leadership," said Glynn. "There is transition anyhow. This allows advisors to learn something new by working with someone else."

Glynn said she had previously sent out a letter to RSO leaders with some of the changes.

RSO members are also worried about new fees that auxiliary services will charge for audio-visual equipment.

"Most RSOs host weekly meetings and events, and most don't have the money to cover these costs," said Wolynski.

According to Campus Center/Student Union Complex Director Meredith Schmidt, Auxiliary Services is implementing charges to cover the cost of equipment upgrades over the summer. Upgrades include new PA systems, wireless microphones, TV/DVD combinations and lighting.

In addition, Auxiliary Services will now charge for wireless mics because some have been stolen in the past, which increased audio-visual attendant fees.

"We feel that these charges are very minimal compared to what you have to pay someone outside the University," said Schmidt. "We're excited about upgrading and keeping up with the technology needs of the students."

The Student Union Ballroom and the Campus Center Auditorium will also have new PA systems installed soon. The Campus Center Auditorium's system is currently 30 years old.

RSO leaders also expressed concern over a new fee for renting out meeting space. However, Schmidt said Auxiliary Services won't charge RSOs for meeting rooms.

With the added fee of equipment costs and the shuffling of advisors, though, RSOs will still feel the impact of the policy changes.

"These groups that bring life to UMass will have a harder job than it should be," said Wolynski.

RSOs protest administration plans, march to Whitmore will also have to meet with new advisors unfamiliar with issues particular to their organizations and establish new relationships.

"It's impossible to transfer all that information," said Marcin Wolynski, MassPIRG Chapter Chair.

In addition, many RSO members are concerned about new charges to rent space and equipment. They were also concerned about the financial impact of a new policy that would require them to purchase wristbands from Tix Unlimited prior to any event and only admit up to the number of people anticipated.

The recent policy changes that were enacted without students' knowledge or input, said Bliss, despite a prior request to be included in these conversations. Further, he said that Gargano had not yet attempted to contact the SGA or students.

Associate to the Vice Chancellor Amy Glynn said she respected students' approach yesterday morning and said she thought it was "productive."

However, she said students are acting largely on rumors and incomplete information.

Glynn said she e-mailed RSOs in August about the changes, and today she sent an e-mail to the RSO listserv and other parties that the changes concerned. "I would love to meet with the students. I wasn't asked to meet with anyone," she said.

According to Glynn, Student Affairs had nothing to do with the new rental fees, which were implemented by Auxiliary Services.

Further, the nominal cost of two cents per wristband would be covered by Student Affairs and would not affect RSO budgets, Glynn said, and RSOs could order wristbands for as many people as the venue could safely hold.

Glynn also said the shift in advisors was part of Student Activities and Affairs' vision for the university.

"When there's an event held by a specific group, it's mostly members of that RSO who attend," Glynn said. She hopes to open up events to all students to create "a much broader co-curricular experience."

"By setting the example of having the advisors stir up their advisee list a little bit, we start to get into that mindset," she said.

However, Mendez said that although the administration may be well-intentioned, in the short term the shift would still create at least a semester of difficulties. "That's not creating diversity, that's creating confusion," he said. "I don't think there's any reason this RSO advisor shift is necessary. The RSOs were running pretty well."

Glynn said that the advisors "liked the idea" of switching RSO assignments at the time.

Further, even though one of the four professional advisors is going to transfer to another department within the University, Glynn said that three new graduate advisors have been added to replace the loss, and one of them will be working twenty hours a week advising RSOs.

During a previously scheduled meeting with Gargano this morning, Bliss brought up the issue of the changes affecting RSOs.

ICEing one's phone an emergency necessity

Cell phones have proven to be the lifeblood of our society. During Sept. 11, they were the only source of contact many frightened people had. After Hurricane Katrina, victims turned to cell phones to alert their loved ones they were safe. Regardless of whether or not those phones were able to get reception, the numbers were there to call.

In case of emergency, numbers and information are things that save social workers and emergency medical personnel a lot of time and effort. For people with medical conditions like diabetes, heart conditions and any major allergies, MedicAlert tags provide EMTs and paramedics with ways of knowing your history so they have a better sense of what's wrong and how to help you more quickly.

Now, people are going to be able to go one step further and ICE their phones. ICE, standing for "in case of emergency," is a new feature that was started by a paramedic of almost 15 years, Bob Botchie. The system is designed so that people can store emergency contact numbers in the ICE database. Emergency personnel will be able to get a hold of these numbers by scrolling down the person's phonebook in their computer to "ICE." From there, they can call the ICE database and all of that person's emergency contacts will be released.

This is especially useful for younger teenagers who are now receiving cell phones at the ages of 10 and 11. Because of their ages, children and young adults are unable to legally make medical decisions for themselves. For example, if a 13-year-old has a medical emergency, whether it's a sprained ankle or a syncopal episode, they have to be transported to the hospital regardless of what they want. Being able to contact the parents, who would be listed as their in case of emergency people in their cell phone, would make the situation a lot less hectic and more comforting. Notifying a parent their child sprained their ankle before they're at the hospital and letting them know the severity of the situation is a lot better than the parent getting a call from the charge nurse at Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

ICE also has different packages that people can elect to have on their phones, including ICE Basic, ICE Alert, ICE Solo, ICE Family and ICE Corporate, with a range of levels of information stored and methods of access.

This is not a mandatory service, and yes, it does cost money. However, for those of us who are able to afford cell phones, this is nothing compared to the comfort and security of knowing your loved ones are safe and well that ICE offers. This service would have been a great help during Sept. 11, Hurricane Katrina and the London bombings. You may not see a need for such a service right now, but neither did the victims of any of the above disasters. The emotional comfort it gives is at least something positive when one's world seems like it's collapsing.

UMass students: pray for Gargano

Marisa Kanof and Rachel Kaplan

Several years back, right wing religious pundit Pat Robertson called on viewers of his nationally syndicated "news" show to pray for divine intervention concerning the members of the Supreme Court. Robertson, who was worried that the court might be put into a position to hand down decisions at odds with Christian values, essentially asked viewers to pray for the court's older liberal members to die in an effort to replace their vacant seats with more conservative judges. Seeing as how none of the liberal members died (in fact, the only member of the court to die since then has been staunch conservative Rhenquist), the authors of this article feel that prayer may not have been the best avenue for Robertson to accomplish his mission. However, it doesn't mean that it shouldn't be tried again now.

Recently, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano (reachable at dunk@stuaf.umass.edu or by phone at 413-545-2333) devised a new onslaught of rules and regulations that affect all student businesses and Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), much to the tune of the collective groan of campus. However, if you didn't hear that collective groan, it might have been because Gargano decided to enact these policies without any prior input from students.

Under Gargano's new rules, the already thick, red tape student groups must go through to put on an event or hold educational programming has gotten considerably thicker. Prior to a Wednesday press release issued by Associate to the Vice Chancellor Amy Glynn, the student body was being led to believe that Gargano had a new wristband policy. Any group wishing to hold an event would have had to anticipate the number of attendees in advance and purchase wristbands for each person. In addition to taking money from groups' already slashed budgets to purchase these wristbands, they could lose money if not all anticipated individuals show up. Thankfully this will now no longer have any financial implications for the RSOs.

However, there are new policies that require increased police presence at events at a cost to RSOs, and audio-visual equipment that used to be free now eats up more of groups' limited funds.

It would be bad enough if Gargano was merely seeking to push RSOs and student businesses to bankruptcy. However, his new policies aim to dismantle RSOs and student businesses entirely. Any time a group wants to hold an event, they have to hold countless meetings with their advisors to seek approval for anything they want to do.

Pray the administration will realize that [Gargano] is the cancer that is sucking the life (and money) out of UMass.

Now Gargano is downsizing the Center for Student Development's professional advising staff (formally the Student Activities Center) so that all RSOs will be advised by one of three advisors. Perhaps this wouldn't be an issue if there weren't more than 170 RSOs on campus. Limited access to advisors taxes both the already overworked advisors and students and increases the amount of paperwork necessary for anything to get done. In addition to downsizing the advising staff, Gargano has also re-shuffled them. This means that the advisors aren't just getting more RSOs to be responsible for, but they are getting RSOs they have never worked with before.

Feeling frustrated at the new policies, the authors of this article, both social liberals and Democrats, have been left with no other option than to turn to the example set by Pat Robertson. We, graduating seniors, are asking the student body to pray for Michael Gargano.

Pray the administration will realize that he is the cancer that is sucking the life (and money) out of UMass.

Pray that Gargano will realize he is a horrible administrator, especially one who manages student affairs, and that in a moment of enlightenment he will submit his resignation to Chancellor John V. Lombardi. Pray that if the space-for-rent-sign where Gargano's brain should be is busy collecting dust, the administration will free him of any responsibilities he has to this campus.

(Not) surprisingly enough, in the Princeton Review's rankings of the best colleges and universities, UMass was ranked as the number nine party school in the nation. We should have expected this, seeing as how Gargano's newly implemented rules cut RSO funding and leave students with an absence of activities to participate in on campus. Without social programming, Gargano is essentially driving students to drink.

So, once again, we ask the UMass student body to pray for Gargano. If, like Robertson's request, this one fails, then we have one last message for the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs: Michael Gargano, the next round is on you.

Marisa Kanof and Rachel Kaplan are UMass students.

Attention newbies

Paige Cram

Okay, freshmen, listen up. You're new here, so I'm going to let you in on a little secret: there is no longer anyone covering your asses. You are now responsible for yourselves, and as scary and overwhelming as that can be, you're going to have to learn to cope ... fast.

This past weekend my roommates and I, like everyone else, went to our first parties of the new year. We went to catch up with friends, relax and celebrate the kickoff of our final semesters here at UMass. As a senior, I'd like to think that I'm older and wiser now than I was when I first came here, but until this weekend, I wasn't entirely sure that was true. After witnessing the hoards of new students wandering around the streets long after the buses stopped running, I realized that I just may have a few valuable lessons to pass on.

On Friday night, I was acting as the designated driver for my friends when my roommate called and said that she needed to be picked up immediately. She didn't explain why, but when I arrived, I found her accompanied by another one of our roommates and a girl who was, for the most part, completely unconscious. My roommates explained that they had found her passed out on the lawn under the air conditioner of a house nearby. She was coherent enough only to tell them that she was a freshman and lived in the dorms.

After we got her into the car she luckily remembered both her own name and the name of her building, so while I waited downstairs my roommates carried her inside. After spending nearly half an hour trying to find her name on the paper sailboats inside the dorm, they put her to bed and returned to the car.

For those of you who are thinking anything less than, "Oh my God, that's really serious," this is directed at you.

This situation was alarming on so many levels that I don't even know where to begin. The first thing I wanted to know was, where were this girl's friends? I know none of you want to take the advice you had to follow at seventh grade camp, but haven't any of you ever heard of the buddy system? You never, ever leave a friend behind at a party, especially when they are too drunk to be in control of themselves. And if you are out alone, you never, ever get so drunk that you don't know where you are or how to get home.

This is not your hometown. You don't know all the students here, and you definitely don't know everyone that lives in this town. Amherst and UMass are both relatively safe places, but you can't take that for granted.

This is not your hometown. You don't know all the students here, and you definitely don't know everyone that lives in this town. Amherst and UMass are both relatively safe places, but you can't take that for granted. When you put yourself in a situation like this, there is no guarantee that you are going to make it out alright.

I'm not typically a morbid person, but on Friday night I couldn't help thinking of all the other outcomes that girl may have faced. What if she needed medical attention and no one knew she was there? What if there was no one to hold her head when she threw up and she choked? What if, God forbid, some guy found her and took her home with him?

This is a serious issue, and for those of you thinking, "That would never be me," think again. Are you sure? How much of this past weekend do you remember? How did you get home? How well did you know the people you were out with? Hopefully well enough to know they would've had your back even if you got so drunk that you almost killed yourself.

Now I'm not trying to pick on any one person; the only reason I'm writing this is because from what I could see, this girl was definitely representative of the new students of UMass that night. People were running across the street right in front of my moving car. I had to slam on my brakes multiple times in order to avoid hitting people that darted into the road. In case some of you haven't noticed, not all the residential streets are well lit, and - newsflash - if you're wearing black pants, you're hard to see.

I realize that many students come here and are on their own for the first time. But the way to handle new responsibility is not to blow it. Sure, drunken stories are sometimes amusing for years afterward, but it stops being funny when people get hurt. And believe me, you can get hurt, especially if you don't take some responsibility for yourselves these first few weeks while you're still learning the ropes.

I realize that not every freshman acted recklessly last weekend, and to those of you who are mature enough to know your limits already, thank you for setting an example.

To the rest of you, I'm all for going out and having a good time, but you still need to be careful. You don't know your surroundings, you can't find your way home yet, and some of you barely know the people you are living with. Go out and get your buzz on, but make sure you still know where you are and who you're with. And please, if you don't listen to anything else I have to say, watch out for each other, because there may not always be people like my roommates to make sure you get home safely.

I know what I learned this summer

Matt Brochu

Have you ever stumbled upon a random picture in a shoebox and thought to yourself, "How the hell did I get so old?" Everyone has a certain Kodak moment that does the trick. You know the one. Maybe you're waiting for the bus on the first day of school in a pair of over-worn, under-sized Umbro shorts or a dress with a floral pattern that makes your grandma's couch look cool. Maybe you're posing next to your grandparents, your old house or a partially melted snowman (five minutes before your older sister gave it a carrot penis and a pair of snow balls).

Photographs, for whatever reason, often play the momentary role of Marty McFly's garbage-guzzling DeLorean and have a funny way of transporting us back to the future. Trust me, I should know. I see a picture that does this to me every day. It's on my UCard.

Luckily, my 23-year-old ass only has to look at it for one more year. This, of course, is a good thing, because it won't be much longer until my pop culture references become dated and render me the literary equivalent of that old dude with the Reebok high-tops and three knee braces who tries to run ball at Boyden. If everything goes according to plan, I should get out of here right before I overtake Brian Long as the UMass version of Van Wilder.

But don't let my age fool you. My friends, and my parents, can assure you that I'm a college kid at heart. And since I can still pound an Irish Car Bomb at Charlie's faster than you can read this sentence, then I guess I'm still a college kid at liver as well.

But don't let my age fool you. My friends, and my parents, can assure you that I'm still a college kid at heart. And since I can still pound an Irish Car Bomb at Charlie's faster than you can read this sentence, then I guess I'm still a college kid at liver as well. Contrary to popular belief, I can still learn new things from time to time. So without further ado, here's what this past summer has taught me.

I learned that every girl featured on MTV's "My Super Sweet 16" should be required to line up side-by-side in my driveway so I can get a running start and punch each one in the face. I learned that there's nothing scarier than an elderly woman who's really, really tan. I learned that it's become cool to like Kelly Clarkson's music, but even cooler to yell her name while getting your chest waxed. I learned that I should just shorten my name to Brochu, because the "Matt" is coming between me and my fans. Plus, Brochu's easier to chant.

I learned from the MTV Video Music Awards that even if R. Kelly hadn't allegedly peed on that little girl's head, I would still think he's absolutely crazy. I learned that journalistically speaking, I'm forced to say "allegedly" despite the fact that definitive proof of the "pee watched 'round the world" can be found hidden in the bowels of half a million computers across America, including my roommate's. I learned that any R. Kelly song can be used as a modern drinking game alternative to "Roxanne" by The Police. Instead of drinking when Sting says the words "Roxanne" or "red light," just drink when R. says "club," "after party" or "poppin' that Cris."

After the mini gas crisis, I learned that the United States needs to step it up and investigate alternative energy sources. I can just see the Bush-appointed primary investigator (undoubtedly a former failed lawyer turned Arabian horse judge) holed up in an office somewhere with an accordion folder making about as much progress as George Costanza did with the Penske file.

Sure, we have hybrid cars now, and double sure, environmentally conscious celebrities buy them all the time. But have you seen the Toyota Prius? If the Prius were a UMass student, he would play the tuba and under no circumstances would he get laid.

The act of pushing this frumpy, pregnant-roller-skate-of-a-Toyota upon the world is the equivalent of God running a misleading ad in the paper to advertise "Brand New 2005 Economical Women. Not only do they pay for every date and insist that Valentine's Day shouldn't be celebrated by exchanging gifts, but they also have a computer chip that prevents them from recognizing the word Tiffany's." Fine print: "By the way, all models come fully equipped with Queen Latifah's body and Owen Wilson's nose."

I also learned that 1-508-880-0000 is the most widely recognized phone number in New England, that nothing would be more awkward than your mom walking into your apartment while the chorus of "Put it in your Mouth" by Akinyele streams through your computer speakers and that yes, the Yankees still suck.

Apparently I haven't learned enough, because I'm back here at UMass for yet another round - one last year of books, bars, campus construction and popped collars. But if you think I'll ditch my UCard next year, you're crazy, because a lifetime of cheap movies beats watching cheap movies on Lifetime any day of the week.

Legions of adoring fans, millions of dollars in money from his many successful chart-topping albums, marriage to one of the most beautiful and talented women in music: yeah, country music star Tim McGraw has at all, but recently McGraw's efforts have been in more of a relief role.

It seems autobiographical that Tim McGraw titled his last album "Live Like You Were Dying," because for all intents and purposes, it seems exactly like what McGraw does. He works hard, plays hard, and is the model Nashville family man. In his recent days, however, McGraw's interests have shifted to a dramatically different area.

McGraw was born in 1967 in the small Louisiana town of Delhi, the son of a waitress named Betty Trimble. His mother had a short affair with baseball pro Tug McGraw, and Tim discovered his father's identity at the age of 11. Tim and his mother moved to the town of Start, Louisiana, where he was raised.

He later attended Northeast Louisiana University, where his interest in music began. It was in the clubs of Louisiana, many of which were destroyed in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, that McGraw began to find his way as a musician.

McGraw's link to Louisiana left the singer compelled to assist the many people who were affected in the days following one of our nation's most devastating tragedies. Two days after the hurricane hit, McGraw posted an intimate letter on his official Web site.

"As a member of the American Red Cross National Celebrity Cabinet and native of Louisiana, I am writing to seek your support in their response to the people affected by Hurricane Katrina," McGraw said.

In another release, announcing that McGraw would headline the "Concert for Hurricane Relief" in Nashville, McGraw echoed his sentiment.

"I am heartbroken by the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina in my home state," he said. "Like so many Americans, I am watching the news reports with great sadness," he added.

McGraw was also quick to accept the opportunity to open the Fashion Rocks music show at the Radio City Music Hall. The show, which was held on Sept. 9, began with McGraw's tribute to his native Louisiana with the song "My Old Friend." The show also included music legends such as David Bowie, Duran Duran, Billy Idol and Destiny's Child.

McGraw will play a sold-out show at the Mullins center, which is an achievement some notable past performers have not been able to accomplish. Along with opening act The Warren Brothers, he will be hitting the stage for what many students have considered a long-awaited event.

It is not certain what elements of the emotional effects of the disaster McGraw will bring to his performance at the Mullins Center tonight, but it is certain that the performer is running full throttle to try and aid victims of the disaster.

Information from the Web site timmcgraw.com was used in compiling the information used in this article. People who would like to learn more about McGraw's commitment to hurricane relief can visit this Web site for useful links.

'Crash' burns racial tension and numerous stereotypes

By Jed Pressgrove
The Reflector
(Mississippi State U.)

MISSISSIPPI STATE, Miss. — With its interweaving stories and outstanding performances, "Crash" almost becomes something special. But the rushed ending and borrowed ideas dampen the impact.

Taking place in Los Angeles, the film sets up strangers with coincidental encounters to show how they all affect each other. The main issue is race. "Crash" features a cast of blacks, whites, Asians, Persians and Hispanics, all upset with the stereotypes in their city, and at times proving the stereotypes to be somewhat true.

At a suitable pace, several stories are juggled at once. Sandra Bullock is the wife of the city's district attorney, Brendan Fraser. While Bullock seems intent on insulting any Hispanic around her, Fraser is worried about appearing politically correct with black voters. Another plot line deals with the bigoted and lewd police officer, Matt Dillon, who pulls over a black couple for fun, frustrating his younger, more tolerant partner (Ryan Phillippe).

Other stories include a Persian storeowner who believes a Hispanic locksmith is a cheat and a pair of automobile thieves—one played by rapper Ludacris—who discuss racism in general while carjacking. Meanwhile, Don Cheadle is a cop who has trouble choosing between standing up for the right thing and looking good.

Inevitably, these characters and situations mix for top-notch drama. Unfortunately, while the effect pleases, it's not overtly original. Coincidences were covered quite thoroughly in P.T. Anderson's excellent "Magnolia," and one can't help but remember Quentin Tarantino's "Pulp Fiction" during certain scenes, especially one where fate is narrowly avoided.

As mentioned earlier, racism pervades the movie constantly. Characters who seem untouched by it fall prey to it in the most unfortunate circumstances, while others possessed by ignorance find sympathy in unlikely places. Along the way, we are treated to some funny dialogue. A rationalization involving the Discovery Channel contains the film's wittiest repartee.

And the majority of the cast grabs your attention like shattering windows. Although his character nearly disappears after the midpoint, Dillon's insensitive and vulgar cop attitude has shock value and merit to match; while most of the character's actions are abominable, Dillon finds humanity in the wicked officer. A surprise is Ludacris; he deftly appears vaguely humorous and angry during his enraged speech about white women being scared of passing black strangers. Rarely has a rapper appeared as genuine in a drama.

Disappointingly, Bullock didn't meet many expectations. At first she leaves behind the girl next-door image, convincing the view-

CMJ 2005 a party for the undiscovered talent today

The Hold Steady are one of the many indie rock bands slated to play at College Music Journal's Annual Music Marathon in New York City. The event showcases emerging acts in rock music.

Montreal's The Arcade Fire won over the crowd and the critics at last year's festival, garnering an article in Rolling Stone and increased album sales.

By Ciel Hunter
Columbia Daily Spectator (Columbia U.)

NEW YORK — This week, thousands of people will flock to Lincoln Center for CMJ's Annual Music Marathon. They'll be coming for a variety of reasons: to become the next buzz band, to report on the hype, or to discuss the issues of the day, from Grokster to Payola.

It will be a chaotic week for thousands of bands, bloggers, and A&R guys — nothing like what the Marathon looked like when it first started in 1981 as an extension of the new College Media Journal. Then, it was just a group of like-minded people participating in an event called the College Radio Brainstorm. There were no bands at that Marathon, no crowds of corporate sponsors, and the discussions were about a very different set of issues.

The basic idea behind the Marathon, however, remains. The Music Marathon, and CMJ Networks, Inc., the company that puts it on, have always been dedicated to college radio and the emerging, underground, and alternative artists that the format supports. They created this event to be both a party and a resource for the people who work to support such artists.

CMJ founder and CEO Bobby Haber wanted to create a forum where people could discuss both the industry and their careers, and, later, where they could review new music that CMJ presented. That pairing of business and music remains essential to both CMJ's publications (the New Music Report and New Music Monthly) and to the event. "It really was created as a live counterpart to the publications, and of course now, sort of ironically, it's clearly the biggest thing that CMJ does," Haber said.

This year's marathon has over a thousand performers, a full schedule of panels, and a film festival whose offerings include Martin Scorese's Bob Dylan biography "No Direction Home." What you won't see are many big name musical acts. There are a lot of critical darlings, like Clap Your Hands Say Yeah and Dungen. The biggest commercial name may be The Arcade Fire, a band CMJ sought not only because they sell out venues, but also because, as Haber said, "We're super proud of The Arcade Fire. They very much debuted in a big way at CMJ last year."

That sentiment expresses the essence of CMJ. This is not an event for the well-established artists, but rather for the emerging. That's not to say that established acts aren't a part of CMJ. According to Haber, everyone wants a piece of the Marathon in order to reach out to the old and new fans and the press. "Columbia records wants to present their artists in the same way that Sub Pop does, the same way that some tiny garage indie wants to, in the hopes that somebody from the New York Times, or from MTV or from USA Today or from NPR or whatever is going to pick up on that event, and all of a sudden light the fire, to trigger the whole domino effect to make that band big," he said.

By focusing on the emerging, though, the Marathon has also maintained a reputation, along with South By Southwest, as a necessary stop for new artists, thus drawing hordes of sponsors and labels on the trail of the next big thing. The Killers were signed here, and so were Nine Inch Nails. Like mainstream radio, it is driven by hits — but of the future, not the present.

"Majors want to be there with their A&R people, hopefully scouting out these bands," Haber said. "The bands they're looking for are not the ones that are going to play the Bowery or Mercury Lounge. They're looking for someone who's going to play some obscure Brooklyn venue, that's not going to be the wannabe band, the buzz band of the moment."

Major labels may be scouting, but the focus for CMJ itself is good music. The huge majority of the bands who play can be called indie rock, which Haber attributes to its audience, but the Marathon also includes jazz, hip-hop, electronica, and world music acts.

"We're like a missionary. We want to spread the word, that there's other great stuff out there. And we also believe that there really aren't that many outlets for people in a grand scale to get this broad a palette of music, and we want to be the ones who deliver it to them," Haber said. In order to accomplish such grand goals, CMJ has grown a lot since it started, employing people working year-round first to choose the artists, and then to set up the shows.

It is that business side that has given people the opportunity to criticize both CMJ and the other major industry festival South By Southwest for being too commercial. "Remember, these are both ventures which cost a bloody fortune to put on," Haber said in response to people who gripe. CMJ survives on a combination of corporate sponsorships and proceeds from the passes to its events, which Haber says it strives to keep affordable.

Rumors also always seem to pop up that CMJ might be going under, but Haber dismisses them. "We've been around for 25 years, and we're certainly not going anywhere." The reason the Marathon will probably always stick around is that it caters to the industry, not to its more fickle fans.

The clearest sign of CMJ's dedication to those who work in the music industry is the program of educational panels it offers them. "A lot of other events are amazing showcases, but they're kind of light on the panels," Haber said. He argued that there are simply so many questions and issues facing the industry today, from legal issues to new technology, that it is essential both artists and those who work at labels understand them.

"We cover so many areas, that when you leave New York, you're not going to only have what we think is an incredible, just consumption of music. But we think that if you keep your laptop or your pen or your pad out there, and you really, really work at it, it's basically like going to college for a couple days," he said. "We're trying to give a crash course."

In order to do that, Haber said CMJ tries to choose a mixture of topics and speakers who are "old school people, who have a wealth of wisdom" and who he refers to as "the new taste-makers and leaders in the business, who really have some novel ideas and who are not afraid to speak their minds."

"We try to be as preemptive as we can, but we are not trying to present this like an Internet convention, or anything but a music convention. It's very much still about the bands and the people working in the industry, and how do we collectively figure out a way to get through the economic reality, the problems of distribution, the problems of marketing, the problems with the very, very stingy public," Haber said, referring specifically to the blessing and the curse of online music. "We're just really trying to help people navigate through all this. And we take that part of what we do very seriously."

With all that the Marathon and the company has become, Haber still sees college radio as the "cornerstone of what CMJ does." In the fluctuating industry, Haber said it's still an important force, especially if stations begin to utilize the internet to reach out to a much larger audience.

If anything, CMJ is more closely linked with college radio than ever, for both face the same conflict. Both are legitimately dedicated to new music and talented artists. But both also must deal with commercial pressures: CMJ copes with its role as the platform for both the next big Top 40 hitmaker and critical darling, and college radio stations must balance the pressures of pleasing labels and promoters with fulfilling their long-standing role as the place where music is judged based on merit, not money.

In navigating these conflicts, the true value of the festival becomes apparent. The Marathon has a little of everything. You can play the hype game, find old favorites, and, if you're lucky, hear a band that will earn a lasting place in your music library.

'Crash'

er that she's a racist witch. However, near the end of the movie, she loses believability. She's decent, but most actresses could have pulled off her performance.

Fraser fares better as the district attorney, and Cheadle is quite amazing as the conscientious and confused police officer. His dry eyes permeate more sadness than tears, and he feels that nothing can be done to change the world: "In L.A., nobody touches you. We're always behind this metal and glass."

Plus, Ryan Phillippe, Thandie Newton, Terrence Howard and Shaun Toub are among a slew of supporting cast members who add even more to an already powerful display of acting. And you have to love Keith David's brief turn as a lieutenant of the LAPD. This guy is severely underused.

Director/co-screenwriter Paul Haggis pulls you in slowly and then seemingly never lets up. However, "Crash" slams on the brakes after it builds considerable momentum, leaving you wondering what could have been done with the potential.

The movie has its share of unoriginality and a couple of other letdowns. Yet "Crash" succeeds more than it frustrates, and Haggis, the man responsible for the hard-hitting screenplay of "Million Dollar Baby," does a suitable job with his first try at directing. The film won't be remembered as one of the best, but at least it avoids being a total wreck.

The introduction to the DVD by Haggis has to be one of the more embarrassing claims as an actual extra. Ditto for the Kansascali music video. Nobody wants MTV garbage for bonus material. Sure, the 10-minute behind-the-scenes feature isn't as loathsome, but it should have been longer. The best extra comes from the commentary track that lets Haggis, Cheadle and co-screenwriter Bobby Moresco muse about their ambitious project.

Pop Culture: top 5 things that need to go

By Jackie Ronin
Collegian Staff

5. People who were born in the late 80's that wear "Know Your Roots" Nintendo shirts

No offense to any freshmen, but NES came out in 1985. You guys were born around '87, which means you wouldn't have the motor skills to use a game paddle until at least '91 or '92. By then, however, Super NES had come out with its comfort streamline paddles. You never really had the experience of playing for hours on end while having to deal with a sharp corner digging into the thumb tendons. And it hurt, but we loved it!

4. Movies with planes in them

What happens when the guy next to you not only takes up both armrests, but also wants to kill your dad? Or your robot plane is struck by lightning, becomes self-aware and goes all evil? Or a woman who is desperately searching for her daughter...in coach? How could we go from "Airplane!" to "Soul Plane?"

3. Upturned Collars

Nobody looks cool doing this! Nothing says unoriginal yuppie like an upturned canary-yellow IZOD. How did this become a preppy look? It's a fashion trend that can be mistaken for accidentally getting dressed wrong. What's next, tucking your skirt into your panty hose? Being off a button? Having your fly down? As far as being an 80's fashion revival, this goes right past the kitchiness of leg warmers and belted shirts and straight into acid wash tapered jeans and sock tucking. Dude, Regeanomics is over.

2. Emo Hair

Rather then bottling up one's emotions like the rest of the world, some people choose to express their sorrows not through art or poetry or acts of violence, but through hair. Perhaps the idea is to protect themselves from even more pain seeping through an Aqua Net-reinforced defense of wisps. Or maybe they're creating a force field designed to keep their own misery from escaping and possibly infecting others - something like a public service. But either way, this has got to stop. Look, I understand you're still pissed that "Dashboard Confessionals" went mainstream with the theme to Spider-Man 2, but come on! You're bumming the rest of us out. Still, I suppose in world were the majority of people live well below the poverty level, we can't even began to imagine the agony of suburban white kids.

1. Napoleon Dynamite Saturation

Let's get one thing straight - I'm not saying this is a bad movie. It's probably one of the most original movies to come out in the last ten years. Somehow, it manages to be hilarious without using the handicaps of swearing and toilet humor. And it's always great to see something that was created in one man's vision rather then the marketing boardroom capturing the public's interest. With that being said, will you people please stop liking it so damn much? You're killing it.

My God, there is no need to quote every single line in every single situation you come across during the day. If I have to hear "idiot," "gosh," or anything involving "skills," I'm going to have a nervous breakdown. I really feel that, like the Internet and the universe, "Napoleon Dynamite" will eventfully collapse on itself.

Remember a few years ago when, like "Napoleon," "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery," mostly through word of mouth, became a very successful sale and video rental and rose from the mediocre box office ashes? Do also recall how many times you heard "Yeah baby!" and "Oh, behave"? Annoying, right? And do you remember all the merchandise that followed? Now do you remember "Austin Powers: Goldmember?" This is where Napoleon is headed. Already you can buy "Vote for Pedro" shirts at Wal-Mart. Wal-Mart, people! This overexposure and praise will totally dull its appeal.

And Napoleon, aka Jon Heder, is already getting top billing only one movie later ("Just Like Heaven"). Let the guy settle for a few years. This is a lot of pressure to live up to. Do you want him to be on the "Surreal Life" in five years sharing a room with Coolio and the youngest boy from "Home Improvement?" I say we should stop watching, quoting, discussing, and buying "Napoleon" for about a year. Give it a break, and then go back. Please, think of Pedro, do it for Pedro.

Eugene brings levity

By Nancy Mills
New York Daily News

HOLLYWOOD — With his nerdy glasses and a pair of eyebrows that may merit their own zip code, Eugene Levy hardly seems the type to be courted by Hollywood studios.

But if you're looking for an Average Joe, who happens to have written a few well-regarded comedies himself, Levy's, well, the man.

"I am the common man," says Levy, who wears his trademark black-rimmed glasses off-camera, too. "I'm polite, I love my family and I play by the rules. And sometimes I get pushed around. That's my lifestyle, and that's what I try to bring to characters."

In "The Man," which opened Friday, Levy plays a dental-supply salesman who gets caught up in an international arms deal gone wrong. Forcibly partnered with federal agent Samuel L. Jackson, he finds himself trying to buy guns instead of discussing tooth care.

"Sam and I are two actors you'd never think would show up in a movie together," Levy says. "Most buddy movies are seasoned with quippy one-liners, but I think it's important to have an emotional investment in the characters. 'The Man' may not always be laugh-out-loud funny, but the situation is funny."

In the film, while spending many hours driving around Detroit in Jackson's souped-up Cadillac Coupe de Ville, Levy temporarily gains the upper hand. At one point, he drags Jackson to a ballet recital. At another, he calls Jackson "my bitch" and slaps him across the face.

"Eugene has been doing comedy for so long he can find humor in the most overlooked places," director Les Mayfield says. "When he slapped Sam, that wasn't scripted or my idea. The reaction shot we used was that first take. Sam didn't know the slap was coming."

"The Man" is Levy's first starring role since "Armed and Dangerous" with his cult skit-comedy "SCTV" co-star John Candy in 1986, and he is slightly dumbfounded. "A lot of guys my age can't get a job," the 58-year-old actor notes.

"'American Pie' opened a lot of doors for me."

Before Levy was cast as "Jim's dad" in that 1999 teen-comedy blockbuster, he had built his film career on playing shlubby guys who pop in for a few scenes, steal them and then disappear. The same pattern should have prevailed in "American Pie." He worked for only five days. But Levy brought poignancy to his clueless-yet-caring father that helped turn the film into a classic.

Meanwhile, he was busy working with filmmaker Christopher Guest co-writing and co-starring in three comedies aimed at a more sophisticated audience - "Waiting for Guffman," "Best in Show" and "A Mighty Wind." The fourth, "For Your Consideration," "about what happens when 'Oscar' is dropped into a conversation in relation to someone's performance," starts shooting in October

Minutemen looking to rebound against Albany under the lights

however, the ball did not roll the way of Albany, as Hofstra put up 424 total yards and forced four turnovers.

The Great Danes handed the ball off 11 times to two separate backs in the loss, with Williams recording 42 yards on 11 carries and Marcus Allen gaining a team-high 46 yards on his 11 runs.

Although a home crowd and a familiar stadium is a relief for UMass, Minuteman coach Don Brown doesn't think it is the deciding factor.

"You have to play the game," Brown said. "You have to play Saturday night at 6 p.m. regardless of where you're at. It's nice to play at home, it really is. It's nice to play in front of your own fans, and I'm anticipating that we're going to get a good showing and I think that will be a big jump for our guys."

If the crowd is anything like what it was in the 2004 home opener, UMass will have a surfeit amount of seats filled at McGuirk Stadium. That game, which was a 30-20 win over Colgate, drew in 16,405 people, the most since 1974.

In order to please the crowd, the Minuteman offense will have to thwart the plan of the Albany defense and avoid the type of turnovers that it surrendered on Saturday.

"They kind of do look a lot like our own defense," Day said. "They run around and do a lot of blitzing from different ways, and there are always three down linemen and four linebackers. And they're always coming from different positions, so it's really confusing."

The Minutemen have been shutting down their opponents on defense, allowing only a field goal against Colgate and six points against Richmond in their season opener. Much of the success has come from strong safety James Ihedigbo (11 tackles, four sacks) and team captain Shannon James (10 tackes, one interception), who have kept the opposing offense in check.

Offensively, junior tailback Steve Baylark has rushed for 181 yards on 49 carries, but was unable to get much going in the loss against Colgate, taking the ball on 19 carries and gaining 60 yards.

With Albany days away, the Minutemen will try to not make the same mistakes as they did against Colgate and keep their focus on the Great Danes.

"When you have that kind of frustrating Saturday, you really can't dwell on it. You have to move on, and I thought we did a decent job of it.

"We're much more efficient with the ball in all phases," Brown said. "The bottom line is, mentally you need to move on and focus on your next opponent, and I think we've done a pretty good job of that."

won't tell you.

Don't ask the two job applicants. They won't tell you, either.

Don't look at the preliminary depth chart, because all you'll see is "Tim Day or Liam Coen".

It should be worth noting, though, that this is the first time the word "or" has appeared on the depth chart in regards to the starting quarterback.

So maybe they are still thinking about it.

But, once again, who deserves to play?

Let's see what the two candidates have to say.

"Liam came in and played great [on Saturday], so that helped the team," Day said. "We've got two guys who can do the job."

OK, so we're still searching for the starter.

"It's still Timmy's team," Coen said. "We compete to make each other better and to make the team better."

Since this doesn't appear to be working, let's move on.

Coen has taken the same amount of snaps in practice this week as he has in the past, and he has worked with both the first team and the second team.

Do these snaps seem a little more meaningful? Maybe just a tad?

"The only thing that is different is that I know [what it's like to be in] the game now," Coen said. "It's no different. I'm just preparing to be thrown into the fire."

Day, on the other hand, is ready to get back onto the field for a little peace of mind.

UMass senior Tim Day (pictured) is in the middle of a quarterback controversy with redshirt freshman Liam Coen this week.

"When we lose, I just want to go back out there and play the next day," he said. "That is the way I am. I hate losing. It's probably the absolute worst thing in the world for me. I can't stand it. Going back out there everyday and trying to get better is the main thing for this team."

From what they're saying, the edge could go to Tim Day.

From Saturday's second half, the early favorite might just be Liam Coen.

But you can throw all of that out the window, slam it shut and close the blinds, because it's all just guesswork.

For now, the fans, the students, the writers, the Great Danes of Albany and everyone else everywhere in between will just have to wait until Saturday.

D-Line poses test

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP)— Kris Jenkins is out of the picture, but Julius Peppers is not.

That means Tom Ashworth will be in the spotlight on Sunday when the New England Patriots play the Carolina Panthers in a rematch of Super Bowl XXXVIII.

Jenkins, Carolina's two-time Pro Bowl defensive tackle, suffered a season-ending knee injury in last week's opener. His absence should allow the Patriots to devote more attention to blocking Peppers, the Panthers' Pro Bowl defensive end. That's good news for Ashworth, who figures to match up against Peppers at right tackle.

"He's a unique person," Ashworth said of Peppers, who has 30 career sacks in 45 regular-season games. "If you look at the film, he's phenomenal. He's extremely gifted. For a guy his size to be able to move like he does, he's probably faster than a lot of the wide receivers in this league."

The 6-foot-7 Peppers played basketball for two years at North Carolina, averaging 5.7 points and 3.7 rebounds. He has lined up as a goal-line wide receiver for the Panthers, and Patriots coach Bill Belichick said Peppers is talented enough to play six or seven positions in the NFL, including defensive tackle and offensive tackle.

Ashworth, a former undrafted free agent, has some versatility, too. He was Colorado's starting tight end as a sophomore before switching to the offensive line.

"There are not a lot of tackles who can say that," Belichick said.

Ashworth spent time on the Patriots' practice squad during their first Super Bowl-winning season in 2001. Two years later, he was the starting right tackle for the 2003 championship team. Ashworth played in only six games last year due to a back injury, but he reclaimed his job during training camp.

"He's been healthier this year," Belichick said. "He's been out there every day. He's been durable. He's gotten a lot of reps, so his technique and his timing are better."

Against Oakland last week the Patriots rotated three tackles, using rookie Nick Kaczur to spell both Ashworth and left tackle Matt Light. Kaczur could see action against Peppers. The Patriots also might keep a tight end in to help out, as they have done against Indianapolis Colts' defensive end Dwight Freeney.

Two years ago in the Super Bowl, Ashworth held his own against Peppers. In fact, the entire Patriots offensive line rose to the occasion against Carolina's decorated front four. New England did not allow a sack, even though Tom Brady attempted 48 passes, completing a Super Bowl-record 32 of them.

"Their offensive line doesn't get enough credit," Carolina safety Mike Minter said. "They played a heck of a game in the Super Bowl. They work well as a unit."

McNabb may sit on Sunday

By Rob Maaddi
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA— Donovan McNabb threw four touchdowns on a broken ankle. He won't let a chest injury keep him on the bench.

McNabb didn't practice Wednesday because of a bruised chest, but the five-time Pro Bowl quarterback said he'll play in Philadelphia's home opener against San Francisco on Sunday.

"Nothing will stop me from being on that field," said McNabb, who was injured in the first quarter in the Eagles' 14-10 season-opening loss at Atlanta on Monday night.

If McNabb can't play — he's listed as questionable — longtime backup Koy Detmer isn't a lock to get the start. Detmer shared reps with third-string quarterback Mike McMahon in practice, and coach Andy Reid wouldn't select a potential starter.

"We'll see as the week goes on," Reid said. "I'll evaluate it and see what we want to do with it. I know both do a nice job."

Detmer has started eight games in his nine seasons with the Eagles. He led Philadelphia to a 38-17 victory in San Francisco in a Monday night game three years ago, one week after McNabb broke his ankle. Detmer threw for 227 yards and two touchdowns against the 49ers before injuring his elbow and missing the rest of the season.

McMahon started seven games in four seasons with Detroit before signing with the Eagles in the offseason. He isn't as familiar with Philadelphia's version of the West Coast offense, but outperformed Detmer in the preseason.

"We're going to take the reps the way they want us to and see how it shakes out," said Detmer, who probably has maintained his status as the backup because he's the holder for Pro Bowl kicker David Akers.

Detmer expects to be on the sideline watching McNabb.

"He's a warrior," Detmer said. "We've seen him play through all kinds of things, broken ankles, everything. If he can walk, he can go. He will be out there."

McMahon said he's comfortable with the Eagles' complex offense.

"It's nothing too difficult," he said. "You just have to prepare and go out and help the offense move the ball. Don't do anything too fancy and move the chains."

McNabb didn't miss any plays after a crushing hit from Chad Lavalais sent him wincing to the sideline, but he struggled the rest of the game against the Falcons.

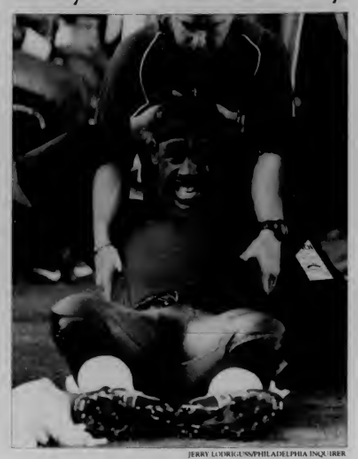
McNabb, coming off his best season, threw one interception, lost two fumbles and often missed his target with erratic passes. He finished 24-of-45 for 257 yards and one touchdown.

"I don't want to make excuses," McNabb said. "I just didn't do my job the way I'm used to."

Reid said McNabb doesn't have any structural damage in his sternum. Last season, Titans quarterback Steve McNair missed eight games with a sternum injury that eventually required surgery.

"It's bruised and a matter of it calming down," Reid said. "We are not going to put him out there in a situation where he could be injured."

McNabb has played through pain in the past. He broke his ankle in the first quarter of a game against Arizona in 2002, stayed in and threw four TDs. He had trouble playing with an injured thumb in 2003, but didn't miss any time.



"It's just a process you go through with bumps and bruises," he said. "If I'm out there I feel like I can help the team as much as possible."

Center Hank Fraley said the offensive line has to protect McNabb better.

"I won't be surprised if he plays. He's played on a broken ankle," Fraley said. "We want him as clean as possible and take the least amount of hits."

McNabb said he stopped wearing a flak jacket two years ago, but would consider putting one on this week.

Neither McNabb nor Reid wanted to comment on the hit that injured McNabb, but it's clear both thought it wasn't entirely clean. Lavalais leveled McNabb with his helmet.

JERRY LODRIGUS/PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Philadelphia Eagles quarterback Donovan McNabb gets worked on by team trainers during the first quarter against Atlanta on Monday.

Parker fills in for injured RB's

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Those eight quarters watching a going-nowhere offense last month weren't erased from Pittsburgh Steelers coach Bill Cowher's mind by 11 mostly effective passes by Ben Roethlisberger.

Cowher isn't ready to proclaim the Steelers' offensive problems solved, even though they scored on six consecutive possessions during a season-opening 34-7 rout of Tennessee on Sunday made possible mostly by Willie Parker's 209 yards of rushing and receiving.

"I'm not ready to sit here and say everything is set with one game," Cowher said Tuesday. "I've said this before, the first month of the season, you're creating an identity. It's not what you do in one game. It's not what you do in two games."

It's also about what the Steelers' starting offense did during the preseason — namely, nothing. The starters failed to score a touchdown, although they played no longer than a half in any of the four exhibition games.

Roethlisberger, unsettled and ineffective throughout the preseason, couldn't have been much sharper while going 9-of-11 for 218 yards with two touchdowns and no interceptions. He also became the first NFL quarterback since 2003 to have a perfect 158.3 passer rating.

But with Parker's big plays making it unnecessary to throw more than 11 times — the Steelers' fewest attempts since 1977 — the passing game didn't get the work it normally would in a regular-season game. The 11 attempts were about what Roethlisberger would get in one half of a preseason game.

"Certainly from a first-game standpoint, it was probably pretty good," Cowher said. "There are some things we can do better execution-wise."

While Parker will make his second career start Sunday at Houston (0-1), the injured Duce Staley (knee) and, possibly, Jerome Bettis (calf) could play. Both sat out Sunday, allowing Parker to enjoy the best opening-game performance by a running back in the franchise's 73-season history. He ran for 161 yards, the 12th-best effort in team history, and set up their first touchdown with a 48-yard catch on a swing pass.

Staley, limited by injuries to 41 carries since the midpoint of last season, is listed as questionable. Bettis is doubtful, meaning he has a 25-percent chance of playing.

"I've got to see them run and I've got to see them jump, cut and accelerate," Cowher said. "They have to feel comfortable and I have to feel comfortable."

Cornerback Willie Williams, who missed the opener with a groin injury, also is probable, as are starting offensive tackles Max Starks (ankle) and Marvel Smith (knee). Both were lifted during the Tennessee game, though Starks returned.

Ike Taylor replaced Williams, and Cowher said there's a chance Taylor could remain in the lineup even if Williams is ready.

"I thought he did a lot of good things," Cowher said. "He tackled very well. He was in position when needed to be in position. I thought he played a solid game."

Minutemen can't get offense going two corners in the first half alone didn't make it past Hartford goalie Ryan Carr.

The Maroon and White came out with a very physical attack in the first half. Out of the gate it was clear that UMass was a much more physical team than the Hawks.

At some points in the game both teams became too physical, as four yellow cards were handed out. Each team received two cards apiece.

Sophomore Matty Lemire was given UMass' first yellow card at the 37:35 mark in the first half. Lemire received the card after he took down Bublil as both players were going for the ball.

Hartford's first yellow card was given to the team in the 45th minute.

Hawks junior Mitchell Joseph got a yellow card for his over aggressive play early in the second half at the 49:59 mark.

Minuteman redshirt freshman Chris Brown received his yellow card for taking down Hartford freshman Keith Womack as he was heading to the net. Brown and Womack were doing battle for most of the second half.

Earlier in the half Womack was able to get past Brown with some nice dribbling skills and even made it through two more UMass defenders before losing his handle on the ball.

"I don't think that [the yellow cards and aggressive play] were that big of a deal," Koch said. "It was competitive, and when you're competitive you're going to have fouls."

The Minutemen will try to bounce back this weekend as they have their home opener against Cornell on tomorrow and play Navy on Sunday at Rudd Field in Amherst.

Redshirt freshman Chris Brown and UMass will look to get back on the winning track at home this weekend against Cornell and Navy.

Frustrating loss for UMass on the road

have just finished up a four-game road trip to start the season before beginning with their home opener on Friday against Cornell.

Tuesday night's loss, however, might have been more frustrating than the other three.

The match was littered with missed opportunities, including two point-blank shots by senior captain Oral Bullen and junior Stewart Wagner that both missed wide.

Hartford's lone goal came on a breakaway; UMass defenders were caught upfield and were late sprinting back to stop the play, as redshirt freshman Zack Simmons was burned for the first, and last, goal of the night.

To add a little salt to the wound, the Minutemen suffered a scare late in the second half and when Bullen went down hard and — after coaches and players gathered around — walked gingerly off the field.

It wasn't the only injury of the night for the two teams, who were playing on Al-Marzook field's unforgiving turf.

Its misleading green color was visually pleasing from a distance, but up close it revealed gray gravel that was just underneath the artificial surface. It was rubber that didn't give much.

"Feels like it's got a lot of rubber on it. It's green, it's got a lot of white lines," Koch said, stating the obvious. "The cow can't eat it, though. If the cow can't eat it, I don't like to play on it."

For the players, it was a tough adjustment to make, and the constant presence of injuries and players hitting the ground holding various body parts in pain answered the question: was playing on turf better or worse than grass?

"Definitely worse," Bullen stated. "The grass gives a bit. The ball moves faster. Unless you practice on this stuff, it's hard to play on it."

The Minutemen won't have to worry about playing on turf for a while, as they return home on Friday to the friendly confines of Amherst for a well-deserved two-game home stand.

UMass senior forward Oral Bullen (10) had the Minutemen's best scoring opportunity during the team's 1-0 loss to Hartford on Tuesday night. His open shot in front of the net five minutes into the game sailed wide.

MVP year for Jones

By Paul Hagen
Knight Ridder

PHILADELPHIA — Andruw Jones won his seventh straight Gold Glove last season. The centerfielder played in more than 150 games for the eighth consecutive time and hit 29 homers, drove in 91 runs and helped the Braves win yet another division title. In short, it was the kind of season that would have had many players thinking about ringing up their agent to look into renegotiating their contract.

Jones, who clearly isn't like many players, had the opposite reaction. He became determined to work harder than he ever had before.

"Because of the struggles I had, I just wanted to improve," he said. "That was my goal. Whatever happened after that was a bonus."

Well, you could find a bunch of guys who would love to struggle like that, but by his standards he had a point. He batted just .261 and had averaged 35 homers the previous four years. He didn't even make the All-Star team, for crying out loud.

So, in the offseason, he buckled down. His workouts, including playing basketball with teammate John Smoltz, took on an added urgency. And he retooled his batting stance after resisting the idea for a couple of years, moving his feet further apart and raising his hands.

So far, the reward has been a .275 batting average, a franchise—record 49 home runs —for a franchise that employed all-time home run king Hank Aaron, mind you - and 121 RBI.

A Most Valuable Player trophy could follow.

Jones, who had a single in four at-bats during Monday night's 4-1 Phillies win at Citizens Bank Park, has been one of baseball's best players since bursting into the national consciousness during the 1996 postseason. There was always the suspicion, though, that he could be even better.

This year, at age 28, he's put it all together.

Asked Monday night if he wished he'd made these changes sooner, he shrugged. "You wish a lot of things, but you can't bring it back," he said. "You've got to put that in the past and learn from your mistakes."

Earlier this season, the Braves' streak of first-place finishes appeared to be in jeopardy. Three members of the starting rotation (Tim Hudson, Mike Hampton, John Thomson) were on the disabled list at the same time. Closer Dan Kolb pitched his way into a middle-relief role. Chipper Jones missed six weeks with a foot ligament problem. All-Star catcher Johnny Estrada went on the DL with a strained lower back. The Braves have played only 18 games this year without at least one rookie in the lineup and have used 17 rookies overall.

Despite all that, Atlanta is closing in on its 14th consecutive division title and Jones is a big reason.

"He's absolutely the MVP," said Braves general manager John Schuerholz, a subjective observer. "I can't imagine anybody doing more on both sides of the ball. We lost three-fifths of the rotation and Chipper and the bullpen went amok and one guy carried us."

Hudson, who started Monday night, seconded that Sunday in Washington after Jones passed Aaron and Eddie Mathews for the most home runs in a season by a Braves player by going deep twice.

"He's been amazing," Hudson said. "If you define MVP, he's the guy. Without him, we wouldn't be where we are now."

The Cardinals would argue for Albert Pujols and the Cubs would nominate Derrek Lee, but Jones probably has to be considered the front-runner at the moment.

Braves manager Bobby Cox said the biggest difference this year has been the changes Jones has made at the plate. Willie Mays first suggested that he widen his stance a couple of years ago. Cox and hitting coach Terry Pendleton also tried to sell him on the idea. Now that he's embraced the idea, he's seeing the ball longer, which has led to a more patient approach.

"He's become more disciplined. A lot more disciplined," Cox said. "He opened up his stance and he hit 10 home runs in spring training. He got off to a little bit of a slow start (enduring a career-worst 0-for-28 streak in April) but he stuck with it. Then when Chipper went down he really picked it up."

Did he ever. He was named the NL Player of the Month in June and again in August.

Minutemen look to bounce back against Great Danes

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Rebounding and recovering are two concepts that the No. 25 Massachusetts football team (1-1 1-0 Atlantic 10) will try to buy into this weekend after a 17-14 loss on Saturday against Colgate, which featured eight turnovers for the Minutemen.

With a loss in the books, UMass will face out-of-conference Albany (0-1) for the home opener under the lights of McGuirk Alumni Stadium at 6 p.m. on Saturday, in the third night game in the history of Maroon and White football. This contest will mark the first time the two teams have ever met.

"We didn't have a good week last week, but luckily it wasn't a conference game and we're just getting to go this week," senior quarterback Tim Day said. "Going out there, working hard and getting rid of those terrible plays; things didn't go our way, so hopefully we just got them all out of our way for our conference games."

In their first game of the season, the Great Danes were matched up against Hofstra on Sept. 10, and did not fare well, falling to the Atlantic 10 team 36-7. Although the game itself resulted in a blowout, Albany showed potential on its opening drive, taking the ball 51 yards for a touchdown.

During that offensive series, redshirt freshman Daniel Bocanegra was able to move the ball down to the goal line, leading the way for tailback Kenny Williams to take the carry into the endzone on a two-yard run.

After that glimmer of success,

UMass junior running back Steve Baylark will look to get the Minutemen back on track against Albany on Saturday night at 6 p.m. at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. UMass lost 17-14 at Colgate on Saturday.

And the starting quarterback is...

Jeff Howe

Over the past few days, stemming as far back as the second half of the Massachusetts football team's 17-14 loss to Colgate on Saturday, there has been one significant question looming over Minuteman football.

It hasn't been the simple "How did they lose to Colgate?" question, but rather a more specific speculation.

Who will start at quarterback?

When senior starting quarterback Tim Day threw four interceptions in the first half against the Raiders, he still came out for the first series of the second half.

It was on that series, however, that Day completed a pass to wide receiver J.J. Moore while taking a helmet-to-helmet hit that sent him to the ground in obvious pain. Day doesn't remember the hit, but he said it was the way he fell that caused the injury to his ribs, which doomed his fate to the sideline for the afternoon.

But that begs the old question: Does a quarterback - or any player, for that matter - deserve to lose his job following an injury?

Well, when backup redshirt freshman Liam Coen finished the game 20-of-35 for 193 yards, a pair of touchdown passes and a chance to bring the team down the field in the final minutes to potentially win the game, he may have earned the job by his interview alone.

So now, for the first time under the direction of coach Don Brown since he took over the Minutemen prior to last season, this football team is being faced with a legit quarterback controversy.

Since Saturday, Brown's staff has been watching tapes, crunching stats, reviewing formations and forecasting potential problems in order to reach their ultimate verdict.

But who knows?

They may have made their choice already. But unless you're a member of that team, or you know something no one else on the outside knows right now, everything until UMass' first drive on Saturday night against Albany will continue to be mere speculation.

Don't ask the coaches. They

UMass drops close game at Hartford

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

WEST HARTFORD, Conn. — What was once a promising start for the Massachusetts' men's soccer team (1-3-0 0-1-0 Atlantic 10) has quickly turned into a disappointing start to the 2005 season.

The Minutemen dropped their record further below .500 with a 1-0 shutout at the hands of the Hartford Hawks (2-1-1) on Tuesday night in West Hartford.

The game marked the home opener for the Hawks, who were also playing their first game at the newly renovated Al-Marzook Field in front of 722 fans.

Hartford's lone score came at the 21:12 mark of the first half, and they never looked back. Junior Kenniel Martin took a pass from sophomore Nir Bublil and booted it over outstretched redshirt freshman goalie Zack Simmons.

The play began with Bublil dribbling up the middle of the field when he saw a streaking Martin up the left side. Martin received the pass and immediately released his shot. Simmons dove to try to block the shot, but the ball soared just past his hands.

"We got caught with too many players forward, and we didn't get back in time," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "They had a counter, and the guy was in alone, pretty straightforward."

Hartford's game-winning goal came on one of its only two shots the Hawks had in the first half. On the other side of the ball, UMass took seven shots in the half, not being able to capitalize on any.

The Minutemen had a total of 13 shots in the game compared to just five for the Hawks.

Redshirt freshman defenseman Chris Brown and the Minutemen dropped a 1-0 contest on Tuesday night at Hartford. The loss dropped UMass' record to 1-3 on the season.

UMass' best shot at the net came early in the first half when senior captain Oral Bullen had a wide open breakaway. Bullen beat the Hawks' defense up the middle of the field only to see his wide open shot sail wide left of the net.

"If Oral puts that first one in, it's a different game, but he didn't," Koch said. "You've just got to keep plugging away, which I thought we did but, unfortunately, we didn't finish it."

Koch's team also wasn't able to capitalize on the 10 corner kicks they had in the game, with eight of those coming in the second half. The

Orlando rakes in the awards after big weekend

By Danny Picard
Collegian Correspondent

Massachusetts field hockey forward Katelyn Orlando was named the WomensFieldHockey.com Rookie of the Week on Tuesday. She was granted her third award of the week after a solid performance, over the weekend, in Vermont. Orlando was also named the Dinn Brothers/UMass Athlete of the Week and A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week on Monday.

Orlando was thrilled to hear that she received the award, even though she was caught off guard.

"I was excited and kind of shocked," the freshman said. "I knew the whole team had played well, and there are other freshmen on my team that I feel played just as well as me, if not better."

Orlando scored the game-winning goal with 49 seconds left in Saturday's contest to defeat Vermont 3-2. The goal gave UMass (2-4) its first win of the season.

Orlando became the team's leading goal scorer when she put another one away against Sacred Heart Sunday. The Minutewomen won the game 2-1, giving them a two-game winning streak after starting the season with four consecutive losses.

The Manchester native was excited to have her first career goal be an important one.

"That was probably one of the best feelings ever," Orlando said. "It was really cool to go into the game and help the team out in that kind of way."

While Minutewoman coach Patty Shea knows she may ask a lot out of her freshmen, she believes it is Orlando's confidence and competitiveness that make her the player she is.

"One of the strengths about Katelyn is that she is such a competitor," Shea said. "She's not afraid to make mistakes. She's not afraid to go out there and assume the expectations that are on her when she's out there on that forward line."

Orlando, who is tied for the team lead in points with four, will try to continue her hot streak this weekend when the Minutewomen face off against New Hampshire (3-3) and Maine (4-3).

Orlando had 46 goals and 45 assists during her three seasons at Manchester-Essex High School. She led the team to three Cape Ann League championships and was a three-time Cape Ann League All-Star.

UM struggles on the road

UMass' leading scorer, Oral Bullen, wasn't able to get UMass on the board on Tuesday.

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

WEST HARTFORD, Conn. — The Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-3-0) made the one-hour drive down Interstate 91 to Hartford (2-1-1) on Tuesday to face the Hawks - in their fourth game of the season — on Hartford's brand new Al-Marzook field.

It is just the beginning of Hartford's reconstruction of its athletic fields; the soccer field was amidst a plain of dirt and tractors that resembled the early signs of a new baseball and softball facility.

The Hawks did not downplay the significance of starting over in a new venue, as the pre-game ceremonies were glamorous and lengthy.

Many ex-Hartford soccer players were on hand for the christening of the new fields, as they were individually called out - each dribbling their own soccer ball to pass to the current Hartford players — to, literally and metaphorically, pass the field down to this year's team.

The Wethersfield, Conn. traveling soccer team of 10- to 12-year-old boys was in the middle of the field for the starting lineups, and as the Hartford players were announced they ran past the kids, arms extended, high-fiving them as they went by.

Other festivities of the game included free-raffle tickets, T-shirts being thrown into the crowd, and the First Company Connecticut Foot Guard — the longest serving military unit in the country — marching out to midfield for the national anthem.

It was a great atmosphere and a resounding success for the field's opening night, as over 500 people showed up to lend their support to the Hawks.

After Hartford's 1-0 victory, UMass coach Sam Koch wasn't eager to talk about the Hartford fans, but he did have a minor observation.

"All I know is that they didn't insult my mother," he said.

The night did not end well for the Minutemen, who have been saddled with two straight home openers for the opposing teams — Hartford and Maine — and Katrina victims to enter Mass.

By Glen Johnson

BOURNE - A week after Gov. Mitt Romney welcomed evacuees from the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast to a makeshift shelter on Cape Cod, he said several have already returned home, but about a third would likely make a permanent life in Massachusetts.

On a visit Thursday to Camp Edwards, a facility at the Otis Air National Guard Base where more than 200 refugees were brought in the aftermath of the storm, Romney said that of those in the initial airlift, some 16 have already gone back to the Gulf Coast. One woman, he said, was reunited with her family in Arlington, Texas.

Romney said he expects that many of the refugees —perhaps 60 to 70 — will end up remaining in Massachusetts permanently.

"I couldn't have found a better place. I tell everybody back home how nice it is," said Dwight Brown, 42, of Metairie, La. Brown, who worked at a Louisiana Burger King and arrived on the second flight to Massachusetts after being stranded on the roof of his home for nearly two days.

Another evacuee, 31-year-old Wendell Bernard, also of Metairie, said: "Nobody can say nothin' bad about this place because they're treating us very well. They're treating us like they know how it was. They didn't go through it, but they act like they did."

A third evacuee, Patricia Kelly, 41, of New Orleans, was relieved to be at Camp Edwards after spending four days trapped in the attic of her home. During that time she watched a neighbor's dog drown just out of her reach before police rescued her through an attic vent.

"I just prayed and said, 'Thank you Jesus for not letting me drown,'" she said.

Kelly said she doesn't plan to return to New Orleans and instead hopes to find low-cost public housing in Massachusetts.

'Bring Them Home Now' hits Amherst

By Brian Castro
Collegian Staff

Military families and Iraq veterans spoke out against the war yesterday at the Bring Them Home Now Tour event at the Amherst Common.

"We're at a turning point with the media and families and veterans are coming to the forefront," said Noah Charney, who helped organize the event. "This is a chance to get the message out there."

Representatives from four groups, Gold Star Families for Peace, Military Families Speak Out, Iraq Veterans Against the War and Veterans for Peace spoke at the event.

The tour started three weeks ago in Crawford, Texas where Cindy Sheehan set up camp outside of George W. Bush's ranch. Three busses full of military families and veterans left Crawford to bring their message to 51 cities in 28 states. The tour will converge at an anti-war rally in Washington, D.C. on Sept. 24.

The tour set up displays and tents. One display had 39 boots representing Army and National Guard soldiers killed in Iraq. They also have shoes representing dead Iraqi civilians, which will be donated to Hurricane Katrina victims.

The tour held the event at Grace Episcopal Church and the Amherst Common. Tour members also visited a peace studies class at Greenfield Community College.

Several veterans told their stories.

Eric Wasileski served in the Gulf during Operation Desert Fox in 1998, when President Clinton ordered a missile strike on Saddam Hussein. He was discharged in 1998 and attended the University of Massachusetts Amherst until fall 2003. Wasileski left UMass with 50 credits to graduate in order to protest the war.

I couldn't physically be in a classroom while President Bush promoted the war," he said. "I had to be out in the world speaking against this."

"When Sheehan first started, I felt she was an Atlas with the world on her shoulders," said Wasileski.

Wasileski had joined what he thought was a peacetime army. His main job while in the Gulf was to board ships entering and leaving Iraq when the country still had trade sanctions. He stood as an armed guard over civilians.

"Seeing the animosity in their eyes was a sobering feeling," he said. "By then I realized we were not Boy Scouts."

He is from a service family; his grandfather served in World War II and his father in Vietnam. His brother, Curt, is currently an Air Force captain.

"With the Lewinsky scandal going back home and what I saw, I didn't see what I did as honorable," said Wasileski.

The Greenfield native decided to speak out, starting the local chapter of Veterans for Peace.

Mayor says French Quarter will reopen in week and a half

By Brett Martel
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS, La. –
Mayor Ray Nagin announced Thursday that large sections of the city will reopen next week, and the historic French Quarter the week after that. "The city of New Orleans ... will start to breathe again," he said. The announcement came amid progress in restoring electricity and water service and the day after the release of government tests showing that the floodwaters contain dangerous bacteria and industrial chemicals but that the air is safe to breathe.

The first section to reopen to residents will be Algiers, across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, on Monday, the mayor said. The city's Uptown area will be reopened in stages next Wednesday and Friday, he said.

The French Quarter will follow on Sept. 26.

"The French Quarter is high and dry, and we feel as though it has good electricity capabilities," said Nagin, "but since it's so historic, we want to double and triple-check before we fire up all electricity in there to make sure that, because every building is so close, that if a fire breaks out, we won't lose a significant amount of what we cherish in this city."

The mayor also said business people will be allowed into the central business district on Saturday and Sunday, but he did not address whether that section would be reopened.

The reopened areas generally suffered little or no flooding and were among the least-damaged parts of New Orleans. They represent 182,000 residents out of a city of nearly half a million.

"We will have life. We will have commerce. We will have people getting into their normal modes of operations, and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans that is so unique," the mayor said. He added: "It's a good day in New Orleans. The sun is shining. ... We're going to bring this city back."

Nagin said there should be power in most areas where people will be allowed back, but the water in some places will be good only for flushing toilets, not for drinking and bathing.

The mayor said major retailers will use the city's Convention Center to supply returning residents with food, wood and other things they will need.

The return of New Orleans' residents next week will mark the start of what the mayor said will probably be the biggest urban reconstruction project in U.S. history.

"My gut feeling right now is that we'll settle in at 250,000 people over the next three to six months, and then we'll start to ramp up over time to the half-million we had before and maybe exceed," he said. "I imagine building a city so original, so unique, that everybody's going to want to come."

The death toll in Louisiana climbed to 474 on Wednesday, and is expected to rise further as state and federal officials go about the monumental task of collecting the bloated and decayed corpses and identifying them through DNA. The overall death toll in five states reached 710.

Government tests released Wednesday found dangerous amounts of sewage-related bacteria in the floodwaters, along with lead from unknown sources and high levels of industrial chemicals such as arsenic. Tests of the city's foul-smelling air found no significant health risks. In the hard-hit Ninth Ward, National Guard Col. Michael Thompson said his troops have also seen the bodies of several people who had been murdered.

"I've got a lot of police officers on my staff and they recognize the signs of it. You'd see the entry wound of the bullet and the exit wound," Thompson said. "So it was obvious that something had taken place other than natural death."

He said the two biggest challenges facing his troops were aggressive dogs and poor sanitation. He said pit bulls left behind by evacuating residents have formed packs and were attacking soldiers. According to him, one soldier was forced to shoot a dog that attacked him.

The Army Corps of Engineers said Thursday it is getting water pumped out of eastern New Orleans and nearby parishes faster than expected, and most of the area should be dry by the end of this month, or about a week earlier than previously estimated.

Col. Duane Gapinski, commander of the project to drain the city, said the Corps is still estimating Oct. 2 as the date the rest of New Orleans will be dry. "There are a couple of key pump stations that we're not able to get online," he said.

The deepest water remaining in New Orleans is along Lake Pontchartrain, at 6 to 8 feet in places, down from 10 to 16 feet after the levees gave way, he said. About 40 percent to 50 percent of the city was still flooded, down from 80 percent after Katrina hit, as pumps worked to siphon off 8 billion gallons a day.

'Paystations' invade UMass lots

By John Fenuccio
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Parking Services recently introduced a new method to pay for parking at various lots throughout campus in an effort to better serve the community.

In an attempt to keep up with the times, Parking Services implemented a new parking system for some of the lots across campus, substituting the former parking meters for a single "paystation."

"These machines are the wave of the future," said Robert Hendry of Parking Services.

After selecting the time and entering the appropriate money, a receipt showing your purchase is printed. In addition to paying with change, the paystation also accepts credit cards. This gives those who don't have enough change a new option. Hendry explained the decision Parking Services faced before making the switch.

"Basically the meters were getting so old that they weren't selling any parts necessary for upgrading. We could have either kept replacing the old meters or order the new pay machines," said Hendry.

Due to common problems such as coin-jamming and other basic malfunctions, Hendry felt as though a change had to be made.

"Most cities and towns are now using these and we're trying to

Iraq war veteran Michael Hoffman, founding member of Iraq Veterans Against the War, talked about the Iraqi invasion. Hoffman said he didn't have the grades or the money to go to college. The native of Allentown, Pa. saw business and factories leave.

"Like all my friends who are not heading to college we got dead end jobs," he said.

More than a year later a recruiter told Hoffman he would have a salary, insurance and benefits. Like Wasileski, he thought he would head out on peace missions. "I thought I would go to the Balkans and help end genocide."

Hoffman served his four years and at the end of 2002 was supposed to be discharged. Instead, the army extended his service and sent him to Kuwait and then to Iraq as part of an artillery unit during the main invasion.

"I've seen things no human being should ever be a part of."

"While pushing forward, I saw bodies on the ground and American vehicles with blood covering the seats ... and I found out what a charred body smelled like," he said. "I've spoken to veterans who went to concentration camps and they described to me the same thing I smelled."

"I don't want my children to have to go back there in 30 years to fix what we started."

"We are all afraid of terrorism, buy plastic wrap and duct tape to protect ourselves and then we end up having a disaster like Katrina."

lift of refugees, although others may continue to trickle into Massachusetts on their own as word spreads through the displaced community about the quality treatment being provided here, Romney said.

"The village is running smoothly and people are continuing to build relationships with one another, friendships across lines," said the Rev. Jeffrey Brown, a Cambridge minister who is assisting the refugee community and serving as its unofficial "mayor."

Local employers are planning job fairs Friday and next Wednesday to help them find jobs. Local churches are also assisting with housing and support once evacuees are settled more permanently. Some 19 children have entered Cape-area schools.

Among the evacuees, one is a pregnant woman about to deliver a baby girl. The governor revealed she plans to name her child "Cape."

Before meeting with the residents and touring their Camp Edwards facility, the governor said the state is carefully screening the evacuees, and already has found two who would have had to register as sex offenders if they decided to stay.

Instead, those two, whom were not identified, decided to leave Massachusetts rather than register. A third refugee was arrested for an outstanding criminal warrant for a rape charge in Louisiana, said Barnstable County District Attorney Michael O'Keefe.

Recent terror threats being downplayed by news media

By Danielle Novy
University Daily (Texas Tech)

LUBBOCK, Texas – Four years after the 9/11 attacks shook the nation, terrorist threats still are being vocalized against the West. The difference now is they rarely come with a conspicuous front-page headline.

The most recent stab at American society came via a videotape broadcast Sunday by ABC News which featured a masked man delivering threatening words of upcoming terrorist attacks toward Los Angeles and Melbourne, the capital city of the state of Victoria, Australia. "Yesterday London and Madrid, tomorrow Los Angeles and Melbourne," he said in the video aired on ABC.

The masked man was reportedly believed to be Adam Yahiye Gadahn, a man from southern California.

Brandon Prins, assistant professor of political science, attributes the lack of attention on such a threat to a nation whose focus is already secured on other topics.

"The news has changed a little bit lately," Prins said. "Whether the media is going out of their way to downplay Iraq and terrorism, I suspect not. Clearly, the American public is focused on other issues, like (Hurricane) Katrina and John Roberts."

Christine Richardson, a junior political science major from Atlanta, Ga., said she completely missed the footage.

"All they seem to talk about now is Katrina and how Bush handled it badly," Richardson said. "When they do talk about terrorism, they are reporting it more skewed than how it actually happened."

Josh Gaines, a teaching assistant in the department of political science, said the media's labeling of the incident as a terrorist attack was hasty.

"I think that they jumped the gun by even saying it was a terrorist," Gaines said. "They say the word 'terrorist' because it gets ratings."

Scott Sosebee, a visiting assistant professor in the department of history, said he believes the media has been allotting a decent amount of time to Iraq, terrorism and other related affairs.

"They've been handling it fairly," he said. "You hear all kinds of arguments on both sides. You hear that if you give (terrorists) too much media coverage, it emboldens them. Then, if you don't give them enough coverage, the American people are not informed."

John Barkdull, associate professor of political science, said in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, many raw facts about the way the nation handles disasters have come to light.

"Katrina did reveal some of the shortcomings of our country with dealing with disasters," he said. "Katrina is going to generate questions as to if the U.S. can withstand a terrorist attack on our soil."

Barkdull said the hurricane left the United States in a vulnerable state, and Bush's handling of the situation left the country in a dangerous position.

"There are other fronts (than just the short-range impact) that you have to pay attention to when you have to deal with a catastrophe like Katrina," Barkdull said. "If I were part of al Qaeda, I could hardly think of a better time to execute a terrorist attack that's been on the shelf than when Katrina struck."

Pay lines an issue

offer the best product for everyone," said Hendry.

Standing in place of the old meters in lots 34 and 40 are now signs advertising that specific space's number. In addition to the UMass campus, the Boltwood walkway in Amherst center uses them, as well as other lots throughout Hadley.

By having one central station, assessing the parking situation has been simplified tremendously. Instead of checking each car for the receipt, the information is stored within the paystation, eliminating the paper-trail problem. Instead of manually checking each meter, the parking enforcement officer will now enter their identification code and receive a printed report showing whether or not spaces have been paid for.

While the idea of the paystation is a conceptual advancement from its archaic counterpart, some students haven't fully accepted them. Jeff Baril, a student of UMass' Stockbridge School of Agriculture, supports the idea of the paystations.

"I like the idea of the new parking system, but they need to insert multiple paystations per lot so that as class starts, we're not waiting in line," said Baril.

The new method has not been received warmly by the UMass community overall because of the lines. UMass sophomore Adam Maroney is one of those students that shares frustration with the new method.

"The paystation's garbage," said Maroney.

Maroney believes that in order to keep the UMass community satisfied, multiple paystations will be needed in the busier lots on campus.

The idea of the single paystation controlling all of the lot's business, forcing everyone to go to the one station, has created longer lines and frustration not only for those who are already running late, but those who even arrive on time.

"There's nothing planned as of right now regarding adding multiple paystations but it sounds like a good idea if there are long lines."

Bush's actions not forgivable

John Gruenenfelder

Two weeks ago marked the first time I have ever been affected by a hurricane, even if only in the most superficial way. I was driving from Tucson, Ariz. to Amherst, having just transferred in. Though the trip hadn't been planned with the storm in mind, my mother and I would fortunately miss it by a day.

The car had other plans, though, and died in Albuquerque. A day and a half later we resumed our trip and by Illinois we were right beneath the hurricane's still potent remnants. Then came two days of driving through heavy rain. In the evenings in hotels and on the road during times of decent radio reception, I could listen to the unfolding tragedy. I listened as it approached. I listened to weather "reporters" stand in the rain and discuss the wind speed. Then the storm hit and all hell broke loose.

There are precious few private disaster aid agencies in this country and, by and large, we rarely need them on any large scale. This country experiences more than its fair share of disasters, natural or otherwise, and we manage. That we manage so well is a strong testament to the effectiveness of our government. But not this time.

Where were the plans? Where were the contingencies? Where was the help? While certainly not alone in responsibility, President Bush has failed the country in a major way and deserves a big share of the blame.

Hurricane Katrina will have a lasting effect on citizens' confidence in the government and with good cause: the local, state and especially federal governments completely dropped the ball. Where were the plans? Where were the contingencies? Where was the help? While certainly not alone in responsibility, President Bush has failed the country in a major way and deserves a big share of the blame.

Our first line of defense for domestic calamities is the National Guard. Thanks to the President's elective war in Iraq, about half of Louisiana's troops are abroad. And it's not just the people who are desperately needed to rescue people, keep order and deliver aid, but their transportation equipment, too. Unfortunately, much of that is in Iraq. With the current situation, guard troops from distant states had to be called in, further delaying the response.

Adding to the problem is the President's repeated cronyism. Michael "Brownie" Brown has been woefully ineffectual. This should have come as no surprise, though, for when you look at his resume there is no previous disaster management experience save what he has gained while on the job. Fortunately for all concerned, the newly appointed FEMA head, R. David Paulison, looks to have quite a bit of experience with actual disaster management.

Perhaps most troubling, however, was the President's initial inaction when the hurricane hit. Days before the levees broke, it was apparent to anybody with access to a newspaper or television that this was going to be a strong and very devastating storm, yet the President's only reaction was to preemptively declare the area a disaster zone. After the storm hit, little was heard from our leader. Finally, a few days after the storm, the President reluctantly cut his vacation short.

This is not entirely unlike his response when the World Trade Center was attacked. While some people (e.g. Bill Maher) rail against the President for his brief delay in that instance, I do not feel the same way. I can genuinely imagine his shock to hear such a thing while reading to children. This delay cannot be so easily forgiven. There was ample warning and ample discussion before the storm hit. The New York Times on Wednesday ran a story describing the near Herculean efforts required by Bush's aides to get him to acknowledge the mounting disaster. And the President's first post disaster action? He very briefly flew over the area in Air Force One on his way back to Washington.

As recent polls show, the public has not been asleep. The President's approval rating has slipped to a stunning 38 percent according to Newsweek. The damage, in more ways than one, has been done. Despite the White House's mighty PR machine, the public is visibly disturbed. At one press conference after another, the President says all the right words, but in this case actions (or inactions) speak so much more loudly. Much to his party's woe, this may be one mistake too many.

Don't count on Bush to admit as much, though. On Tuesday, he said that he accepted responsibility for the problems. This is a big step for the President and shows just how bad a problem must become for him to make any such claim. At the same time, it is very important to realize that he has not actually admitted that he, his administration, or anybody else has made any mistakes. No matter how dire a situation becomes, some things just don't change.

The return of the adversarial press corps

Gil Jenkins

Many of us have been glued to our televisions the past few weeks as the events and aftermath of Hurricane Katrina unfolded. Though it's difficult to point to any silver lining in such a tremendous tragedy, there was something being echoed across the airwaves that was not only surprising but, frankly, encouraging. From conservative pundits like Joe Scarborough and Bill O'Reilly to middle of the road reporters like Anderson Cooper and Shepard Smith (though he works for FOX), there seemed to be a common stream of outrage and concerted aggressive questioning towards our government officials.

In fact, the line of questioning was downright hostile at times. Was I dreaming? Was this the same press corps that swallowed the Bush propaganda machine before the Iraq War? Had the mainstream media finally grown some metaphorical balls? The answer to me was a resounding, yes. Reporters finally were not letting government officials snake out of responsibility. Michael Chertoff, Mike Brown and many others were shredded to their face and otherwise for the lackluster responses. Besides asking the tough questions, reporters keenly juxtaposed images of total disaster and people living like animals against politicians' glad handing and posturing. All the right questions were finally being raised.

Now I understand many on the left and right, and even some in these editorial pages have argued that the reporting wasn't hard enough, that it was too graphic or that the media was racist in its depiction of the looting. However, to ignore the obvious overriding positives of a new adversarial media is simply self-defeating if you're concerned about making the first steps towards positive change in media responsibility and ethics. We need to encourage our return to a post-Watergate press cynicism of government, while recognizing that in order for it to be sustained we need to tune in.

Though we need to continue to be critical, we should be more concerned with capitalizing on something positive when it happens. In bringing us these horrific images and heartwrenching stories, mainstream media, namely television, created the outrage among Americans that finally got the necessary help in, while simultaneously demanding accountability and the rolling of heads.

Look no farther than what happened the other day with Mike Brown being dropped from FEMA and Bush (gasp) apologizing and taking responsibility for something. Nitpick all you want, but have the bloggers forced the President to finally eat crow? No, they haven't and that's why I believe there is still an important place for our embattled mainstream media. Yes, I say, much to the dismay of some politicians; Americans and our press corps can be ambidextrous. We can be critical of something yet also applaud it on the other hand, just like we can be critical of the government's response, while continuing to support and focus on recovery and rebuilding efforts for the people of the Gulf Coast.

We need to encourage our return to a post-Watergate press cynicism of government, while recognizing that in order for it to be sustained we need to tune in.

Though I am hopeful, current trends don't bode well for the lasting stay of such an adversarial press corps. Media conglomeration, and the 24-hour cable news cycle has limited the perspective and filled the remaining area with garbage. Salacious stories like kidnappings and murders of pretty blond women, serial killers, runaway brides and who's dating who in Hollywood reign supreme. Public policy and, sadly, foreign policy will never get the attention it deserves on mainstream media unless we keep our focus there and continue to draw the connections that are starting to be made.

Among the many connections, the coverage of this disaster has shown us the connection between our inexcusable domestic policies towards the plight of the poor in this country. Additionally, it has shown us a connection of the religious hypocrisy of a Bible thumping administration ignoring the tending of its own flock. Moreover, it has also connected for us the environmental challenges we face with global warming, which will make storms like Katrina commonplace. Lastly, it has reminded us as a country of how thinly stretched and vulnerable we would be to a terrorist attack nearly four years into the never-ending, costly war on terror.

Somewhere, in the highest realms of the major media companies, a light has been turned on. Perhaps they now see the error of their previous ways. Now, finally, they recognize the role of the press as it was envisioned, as a fourth estate, an estate that will watch for fallacies and wrongdoings in the other three. Perhaps they now realize that a confrontational approach is not only right, but that they can still make a profit in doing so. Ultimately, a continued awakening of a combative mainstream press will strengthen our democracy. However, only time will tell whether that comes to fruition or not. Until then, I'm done speculating.

One of the television shows that I watch on HBO is "Real Time with Bill Maher." On his show, Maher interviews and hosts a panel of actors, writers, journalists and television personalities - basically anyone with an opinion - who are not afraid to hash it out on live TV. My favorite part of the program is at the end, when Maher breaks up the tension by introducing his "New Rules" segment. In this portion, Maher comprises a list of "New Rules" that he believes should be enforced, whether political or purely for entertainment. Inspired by Maher's wit and wisdom, I have decided to make a few "New Rules" of my own, but catering to the students on and off the UMass campus. Here goes.

NEW RULE: DO SOMETHING ABOUT THE BUS SYSTEM AROUND AMHERST.

I'm sorry, but cramming my body onto an already over-populated bus, having to put my butt in someone's face while holding on to dear life for fear of falling out of the door whenever the bus takes a turn is not my definition of a convenient way to travel. UMass might not have the funds to incorporate more buses into the system, but perhaps they could come up with some sort of alternate transportation? Heck, I'd rent a pair of rollerblades and a sweet helmet if it meant I didn't have to stand at a bus stop for over 20 minutes, only to get the doors closed in my face because the bus was, once again, too full.

NEW RULE: (I AM GUILTY OF THIS, SO I PLEDGE I WILL STOP AS WELL) NO MORE IPODS ON CAMPUS.

Talk about a lack of communication. Everywhere you look, people have the telltale white wires coming out of their ears. The other day on the bus I looked around, and of the ten people near me, seven, including myself, had iPod wires protruding from either side of our craniums. No friendly conversation, no getting to know anyone else, just 10 strangers sitting uncomfortably on the bus, lost in their choice of music. iPods are great for people who don't like to communicate. I guess, but since when did talking get to be such a chore? And is it really that imperative to listen to music 24/7 when you're not in a classroom or at your home? I don't think so. We need to unplug these wires and actually have normal conversations with one another.

NEW RULE: FIX ON-CAMPUS PARKING.

All of our professors encourage us to study and learn, but it's hard to achieve that when you can't find a place to park at the library. And before 5 p.m.? You have a better chance of squishing yourself onto a bus. Or how about when you are running late to class in Tobin or Bartlett, and pull into the Boyden parking lot hoping for an empty spot? Too bad, they are all taken, and the ones that aren't have broken meters. By now you are already late, so you decide to just skip class and try to go to the library later to catch up, but you end up running into the same problem. Does there seem to be a pattern here?

NEW RULE: NO MORE KAMIKAZE STUDENTS.

I know that we have all done this from time to time, but lately it is getting ridiculous. I am referring to a time when you are driving home from class, tired and ready to end your day, but are forced to slam on your brakes because someone runs in front of your car and they are not in the crosswalk. If they are in the crosswalk, it is neutral territory: they are obeying the law. But seriously, if you aren't in the crosswalk and you are freestyle walking your way across the street causing cars to screech to a halt, don't give the driver a dirty look. You should look at your reflection in the car's window and be ashamed at what you see. Because of your ignorance and lust for living on the wild side, you almost caused an accident. Next time, walk the few extra feet to the crosswalk, and use them accordingly. They weren't painted there for looks.

So folks, those are my "New Rules" that I think should be enforced on and around the UMass campus immediately. Remember for next time, take your iPods out of your ears while crossing the road in a properly marked area, avoiding the bus and getting into your car that is conveniently parked on campus. Here's to wishful thinking.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

MISCONCEPTIONS IN POP CULTURE

I must admit that Jackie Ronin, who wrote the article entitled, "Pop Culture: top five things that need to go," was very correct and if I knew Jackie as a person we would probably be very good friends. However, I am going to respectfully propose to Jackie a couple corrections and maybe even some "Remember next time to ..." pointers about the opinion of the article.

#5 PEOPLE WHO WERE BORN IN THE '80S THAT WEAR "KNOW YOUR ROOTS" NINTENDO SHIRTS:

Well, first off, I am a freshman, and I was definitely born in 1986, as were about half of the freshman here. You are a little too quick to label us as "too young" to know what NES was. The fact of the matter is, we do know; we played it and "Duck Hunt" was the best game on it, which didn't even use the Square controller but instead the Nintendo Zapper, which I still use and treasure to this day. Telling people born in 1987 to stop wearing shirts that advertise something that came out in 1985 is like saying someone born in 1984 should not wear a Led Zeppelin shirt (which came out in the late '60s, in case you didn't know). If the world ran the way you would like it, all Zep fans would be in their 40s and all NES fans would be about 22. Is this fair? I think not.

#4 MOVIES WITH PLANES IN THEM:

Okay, so a lot of movies have planes in them, big deal. Haven't you noticed that movies cost something like $8 or $10 to go to nowadays? With popcorn and a drink, now a $20 bill is enough to go to the movies alone. No movie is worth that kind of money. It's better to just wait for it to come out on video or DVD or be downloaded from the pirates of the Internet. Plus, one more great thing about this country is that if a work of art, such as a movie, is being released to the public, members of the public have the right not to see it. If you don't think you'll like it, then don't see it.

#3 UPTURNED COLLARS:

While it is a bad fashion statement, you even said yourself that poor taste has gone on since the '80s. This really shouldn't bother you to the extent that it seems to.

#2 EMO HAIR:

Hey, you know what? I have long hair. If someone wants to go through the long and annoying process of growing out his or her hair, let them do it. I think your grievance is not with the hair, but with Emo itself. Get your argument straight next time.

#1 NAPOLEON DYNAMITE SATURATION

Hey, I didn't like the movie very much, but it was original. It is a fad. As with all fads before it ("Pokemon," Pogs, Furbies, "Austin Powers" quotes and Beanie babies, to name a few) they all had one thing in common: they ended. Just wait until you graduate, nobody will even be able to recall the days of the "Vote for Pedro" craze.

But as a final message, my last words to you will be to ignore it. I bet you have some fashion that is objectionable to somebody as well, or are you just the god of being original and independent?

'That's the greatest thing about the Big E; it can be whatever you want it to be.'

By Nick Brown
Collegian Staff

The Big E stands for the big exposition, but we all know that E can be whatever you want it to be. The Big Excitement, maybe. Or possibly the Big Exploration. Maybe even Big Entertainment. That's the great thing about the Big E; it can be whatever you want it to be. With craft fairs, livestock, fun, games and everything in between, the Big E clearly has the intention of entertaining.

As with every year, the Big E will roll through West Springfield with style. For 17 fun filled days, you can eat, dance, shop and experience every aspect of New England life and then some. But it might take you more than one day to appreciate the scope of such an undertaking. It would be an understatement to say that The Big E has something for everyone; the Big E has everything for everyone.

If you consider yourself musically inclined and feel the need to bust a move, the Big E has got you covered. Country's "Redneck Woman" Gretchen Wilson will be performing on Sept. 18 at 7 p.m. If country music "ain't your thang," you might find yourself more inclined towards the rollicking sounds of Collective Soul, who will play on Sept. 25 at 7 p.m. And if that doesn't do it for you, you might be more interested in the sound of Grammy-winners, Los Lonely Boys, who will be gracing the Big E with their unique blend of Tex-Mex rock and sensual Latin rhythms. Los Lonely Boys will be headlining the fair with a performance on Sunday, Oct. 2 at 7 p.m.

If for some reason such a diverse array of musical talent leaves you wanting more, there's plenty to satisfy all tastes. For those who love the traditional European-style circus, there will be three shows daily by such groups as The Wallenda 7-Man Pyramid, The Svensons Comedy Bareback Riders, as well as the Mongolian Angles Double Trapeze.

In between such excitement it's important to find a few moments to eat. Thankfully, the Big E has such a setup that you might want to take an entire afternoon exploring the variety of culinary delights. For those who can't be bothered with the finer points of cooking, there's the Big E Cream Puff and Big ...clair at the Cream Puff bakery. There's even a Sam Adams Brew Garden for those of us who enjoy a tasty brew under the cool fall sky.

For those who do enjoy the finer points of cooking, there's the Harvest New England Kitchen Theater. Celebrity chefs Giada De Laurentiis and Tyler Florence, both of Food Network fame, will be offering separate workshops on how to master any kitchen.

For serious thrill seekers there will be daily Mardi Gras style parades complete with floats, music, dancing and beads galore. There's even an amusement park, "The North American Midway," to satisfy all of your thrill seeking needs. From the Power Surge to the Wave Swinger, you need look no further than the Big E.

For animal lovers there are a host of opportunities to get to know our furry friends. The Commerford Petting Zoo will be at hand to familiarize youngsters with Mother Nature's smaller but no less important creatures. Horse lovers rejoice, as the Eastern States Exposition Horse Show will be held periodically throughout the entire event.

For those seeking a little cultural diversity there's the International Plaza, featuring crafts and such from far away lands including Italy, South America, Austria, Mexico and Ireland. There's even a Guinness Pub, offering their world class stout as well as hearty stew and various Guinness products.

Such a smorgasbord of fun filled delights should be ample reason to make your way out to this one of a kind fair. But the events listed above only hint at the plethora of experiences to be had. This year's theme is "Your Own Little E," meaning that every individual experience, every little aspect of your greater experience, adds up to much more than the sum of its parts. It's up to you to make of it what you will. Anyway you have it, you'd have to try pretty hard not to have a good time.

Robert Wise, director of 'West Side Story,' 'Sound of Music,' dead at 91

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES, Calif. — During his half-century career, Robert Wise was nominated for seven Academy Awards, had hits in a variety of genres and worked with Orson Welles on "Citizen Kane."

But he gained his greatest acclaim, and four Oscars with the big-budget productions of "West Side Story" and "The Sound of Music," two of the most popular musicals of all time.

Wise died Wednesday of heart failure. He was 91.

In all, Wise directed 39 films, ranging from science fiction ("The Day the Earth Stood Still") to drama ("I Want to Live!") to war stories ("Run Silent Run Deep") to Westerns ("Tribute to a Bad Man").

He also was nominated for an Oscar for editing "Citizen Kane."

"I'd rather do my own thing, which has been to choose projects that take me into all different kinds of genres," he once told The Associated Press. "I don't have a favorite kind of film to make. I just look for the best material I can find."

Wise died after falling ill and being rushed to the University of California, Los Angeles Medical Center, family friend and longtime entertainment agent Lawrence Mirisch told The Associated Press.

The director had appeared to be in good health Saturday when he celebrated his 91st birthday with friends, Mirisch said.

Wise's wife, Millicent, learned of her husband's death while in Spain for the inauguration ceremony of the San Sebastian Film Festival, which was featuring a retrospective of his work.

While many of his films were classics of their genre, his two revered musicals towered over all of them.

Wise won the best director Oscar for 1961's "West Side Story" (shared with Jerome Robbins) and for 1965's "The Sound of Music." He also received producer Oscars for each film for winning best picture.

"West Side Story" was the tale of "Romeo and Juliet" set in the New York City tenement slums. Co-directed by Wise and Jerome Robbins, with music by Leonard Bernstein, it won 10 Academy Awards.

"The Sound of Music," which told the story of the singing von Trapp family's escape from Nazi-ruled Austria, won five Oscars. It was for many years the top-grossing film of all time.

Wise gave much of the credit for the film's success to its stars, Julie Andrews and Christopher Plummer.

"A big part of a director's job is done if he gets the right actors in the right roles," he once said. "That doesn't mean you don't help actors, but once we thought about Julie and Chris, we didn't seriously consider anyone else."

He also credited Welles, for

800 years of Russian grandeur and tumult on view in art show

By DAVID MINTHORN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK, N.Y. — From 13th-century icons to 20th-century iconoclasts, Russian art depicts the mysticism, ferment, yearnings and grandeur of a vast land and tumultuous society.

Great Russian art has been largely out of the reach of Westerners, rarely if ever loaned abroad, shown only in museums of Moscow, St. Petersburg and other Russian cities or cautiously guarded in private collections.

Now a trove of 275 paintings and sculptures spanning 800 years is going on view at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, billed as the most comprehensive exhibition of Russian art ever shown in the United States. "Russia!" opens Friday and lasts through Jan. 11, 2006.

The works encompass Russia's "greatest treasures" and capture "the soul ... the essence" of the nation, Russian President Vladimir Putin said at the show's unveiling Wednesday night.

Putin said that close ties between the Guggenheim and Russia allowed the art treasures to be brought to New York. He also attended the opening of a Russian avant-garde show here in 2002.

Highlights of the Guggenheim exhibition include biblical scenes by Russia's most renowned icon painters: Andrei Rublev, 15th century, and Dionysii, 16th century; Ivan Aivazovsky's awesome seascape, "The Ninth Wave" (1850); Vasily Perov's portrait of a pensive Fyodor Dostoyevsky (1872); Ilya Repin's shocking "Bargehaulers on the Volga" (1870-73); Mikhail Vrubel's symbolist portrait, "Lilacs" (1900); and Kazimir Malevich's supremacist "Black Square" (ca. 1930).

The works were selected by a team of nine international curators from collections of the Kremlin Museum, State Russian Museum and the State Tretyakov Gallery of Moscow and the State Hermitage Museum of St. Petersburg. Some regional galleries and private collections in and outside Russia also loaned works for the show.

"Undoubtedly, an exhibition of this scope and reach will not be repeated in this generation," Guggenheim director Thomas Krens said.

This one-time show in the United States may also travel to the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, if organizational issues can be worked out, Guggenheim spokesman Anthony Calnek told The Associated Press.

With paintings and sculptures arrayed along the circular ramp of the museum's soaring cupola, "Russia!" unscrolls in an eight-stage chronology, beginning with medieval icons in a grotto-like side hall. Then come secular works created under the patronage of Peter the Great, founder of St. Petersburg, and Catherine the Great, along with art purchased from the West to decorate their palaces.

The survey continues with prophetic portraits of 19th century aristocrats and the downtrodden peasantry by Ilya Repin, Ivan Kramskoi, Nikolai Ge, and stirring landscapes by Isaac Levitan and Ivan Shishkin.

Reflecting the arrival of modernist ideas from the West, the exhibit turns to boundary breaking works by Russia's avant-garde, led by Malevich, Natalia Goncharova and Mikhail Larionov, as well as emigres such as Marc Chagall.

A side gallery shows influential works by Picasso, Matisse and other French artists, from the collections gathered by Russian merchants in the early 20th century.

The Bolshevik revolution of 1917 initially spurred artistic experimentation, including graphic works celebrating the violent overthrow of Czar Nicholas II. But by the 1930s, Soviet authorities had imposed socialist realism on the arts - idealized scenes that glorified the new industrialized society, suppressing any hints of Stalinist purges and secret police brutalities.

Yet some of these works have high artistic merit, such as Yuri Pimenov's "New Moscow" (1937), showing a young woman at the wheel of a convertible, against a backdrop of soaring buildings.

COURTESY WEB MUSEUM

The Guggenheim Museum in New York City is now housing some of Russia's greatest masterpieces.

Patriotic themes dominated Russian painting during World War II. Much of it is Stalinist propaganda, but memorable works are shown, such as Gely Korzhev's expressionist portrait of a soldier who lost an eye in the conflict.

The last section shows Russian art from Stalin's death in 1953 to the end of the Cold War in 1989 and present day works - a tormented time marked by cycles of artistic experimentation against state norms and severe repressions even as the Soviet Union registered international triumphs, and ultimately adopted democracy.

These paradoxes are captured in Ilya Kabkov's brilliant conceptual installation, "The Man Who Flew into Space," (1981-88).

Book mingles 'Napoleon Dynamite' with Christian values

By NATALIE PEZZENTI
THE POST (OHIO U.)

ATHENS, Ohio - It's not every day that one compares scenes and quotes from a low-budget comedy such as "Napoleon Dynamite" to strong Christian parables and ideals. But in the last chapter of Jeff Dunn and Adam Palmer's book, "Taming a Liger: Unexpected Spiritual Lessons from Napoleon Dynamite," the purpose of the creative and unique comparisons is easily explained: "'Napoleon Dynamite' did not win any Oscars. It will never be considered one of the great movies like 'Casablanca,' 'It's a Wonderful Life' or 'Gone with the Wind.' 'Napoleon Dynamite' is more than that. It is a celebration of the ordinary. It is a statement that average, everyday life can be an adventure you will never forget."

Throughout this short, 24-chapter book, the authors take bits of the now-cult-classic movie "Napoleon Dynamite" and infuse their own thoughts, humor and links to the Bible. At first, one might be skeptical that this fun-loving comedy can even be related to deep-rooted Christian principles. "We have not tried to overspiritualize what is meant to be only a fun movie. But we have taken hold of the fun and tried to apply it in a way that will enrich your life," Dunn and Palmer wrote.

The movie, they write, is "based on truth in everyday life," and they "attempted to reach deeper into the movie, using some of its most quotable lines and applying those themes to life in general."

With names of chapters like, "Whatever I feel like I wanna do, gosh!" or "Worst day of my life, what do you think?" readers can instantly recall the tone of the character and the exact moment of delivery in the movie. These simple links help keep the book connected to the movie - and not just a sampling from it. It should be obvious at this point, but the authors intended the book to be for those who have seen the movie - if not, readers will be quite confused.

In one chapter, entitled "You know, like bow-hunting skills, numchuck skills, computer-hacking skills. Girls only want boyfriends who have great skills!" Dunn and Palmer discuss Napoleon's lack of self-esteem and desperate need for a date. Viewers will remember Napoleon's sad expression after finding out Deb accepted Pedro's request to go to the dance. He lost all hope of finding anyone else and felt that he had nothing (no skills) to offer a girl. Dunn and Palmer discuss how Napoleon felt as if he didn't matter and how God says quite the opposite. "We all have something we're good at; God set it up that way," they write.

They go on to talk about how although Napoleon might not be the best artist in the world, he knows what he likes, "knows his way around the pencil and paper well enough to be dangerous with it. ... He finally saw his value, though it had been there all along."

Other chapters include stories about Pedro's qualifications as class president and how it compares to gifts God gives each person, how while Napoleon offers to be Pedro's bodyguard, God is the ultimate bodyguard, and how Kip and LaFawnduh's relationship compares to the need to find a soul mate without changing the person into something he or she is not.

The book includes a glossary for common "Napoleon-isms," recipes from Napoleon's kitchen and discussion questions for each chapter that only add to the humor and enjoyment of the reading.

"Taming a Liger" looks at life through the eyes of Napoleon, Pedro, Kip, Deb and Uncle Rico. The authors stress how the movie is not just actors playing people we could never be, but is a clip from our everyday, real-life experiences.

So kick off your moon boots, cook up a quesa-dilluh and read an amusing book about faith and Napoleon. Like the movie, the experience will be unforgettable.

whom he edited "The Magnificent Ambersons" as well as "Citizen Kane," as a major influence, adding that the actor-director-writer was "as close to a genius as anyone I have ever met."

"Citizen Kane" was "a marvelous film to work on, well-planned and well-shot," Wise once said. It has topped many polls over the years as the best film ever made.

More recently, he served as president of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences and the Directors Guild of America.

Born Sept. 10, 1914, in Winchester, Ind., Wise dropped out of college during the Depression after his brother, an accountant at RKO, helped get him a job at the studio.

He worked his way up to film editor or co-editor on such movies as "The Story of Vernon and Irene Castle," "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" and "The Devil and Daniel Webster."

He got his chance at directing almost by accident when he was assigned to finish the 1944 film "The Curse of the Cat People" after the original director fell too far behind schedule.

Pleased with his work, horror film producer Val Lewton assigned Wise to direct the Boris Karloff film "The Body Snatcher" the following year.

In addition to his four Oscars, Wise was awarded the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences' Irving G. Thalberg Memorial Award, a special Oscar for sustained achievement, in 1966. He also received the Directors Guild of America's highest honor, the D.W. Griffith Award, in 1988.

His last film, 1989's "Rooftops," was another try at an urban musical like "West Side Story" but with modern-day pop music and rough language. It wasn't successful but many critics praised Wise's effort.

'Psychonauts' will send you on many bizarre adventures

Carlos Cruz

Imagine a gigantic box. Good. Now imagine a guy standing about 93 million miles away from it. That guy's name is Tim Schafer and the box represents almost every other non-Japanese video game out there. If the name isn't familiar to you, perhaps his games are. Schafer got his start at Lucasarts by making some very original adventure games like the "Monkey Island" games, "Full Throttle" and "Grim Fandango." All games were big cult hits in the gaming world and were characterized by being very original and witty in the humor department.

After Schafer made "Grim Fandango," he left Lucasarts to form his own game developing company known as Double Fine. Double Fine made a deal with Microsoft to release their latest game as an Xbox exclusive, but later on Microsoft decided that they wanted to go in a more edgy "extreme" direction with the Xbox and ditched the Double Fine project. For a long time, the game was without a publisher but development still went forward. After a while, Majesco picked up the rights to publish the game; and that game was "Psychonauts." Just another example as to why Microsoft has no idea what they are doing in the gaming world. Now, on to the review.

"Psychonauts" was released on the Xbox first at the beginning of the summer but the PS2 and PC versions were released later. This is a review of the PS2 version.

I'll start by pointing out the bad things in the game. The first thing you'll notice is that the graphics aren't as great on the Playstation as they are on the Xbox and PC; this drawback is quickly forgotten when you get to the game play, but more on that later. Another negative of the game is, well, nothing else. This game is freakin' cool. Sorry about that, folks; I geeked out a little there. I'm all business now.

'Psychonauts'
PS2

Action

You play as a kid named Raz, a circus performer that runs away from home to go to a psychonaut training summer camp which trains kids to be mental police that help save the world by using their special ESP powers. At the camp, you uncover a secret plot to steal the brains of the psychonaut trainees and it is up to you to get everyone's brains back and defeat the shadowy figures behind the brain kidnappings. During your quest, you come across a bunch of unique characters that have certain mental problems. As a psychonaut, you must enter each of these people's minds and help solve their mental issues.

One such person is Fred Bonaparte, the latest descendant of Napoleon Bonaparte. Fred's problem is that his famous ancestor is embarrassed that Fred is a lazy orderly at an asylum and has lost the great fighting spirit that his family is known for. As a result, Napoleon is trying to take over Fred's personality. In order to stop Napoleon from taking over, Fred must defeat Napoleon in a mental game resembling "Risk." The problem is that Fred isn't exactly the great tactician that Napoleon was and has lost every round of the game.

Raz helps Fred by jumping into his brain where Fred and Napoleon are sitting at opposite ends of a game board. Raz later shrinks himself to be able to jump into the actual game and control the individual game pieces. This isn't exactly done by just moving the figures on the board because the pieces have feelings and they won't fight Napoleon's army unless you convince them to do so. This is done by getting them food, making Fred pay them more and at one point fetching weapons for them.

These are the kind of game play elements that set the Schafer games apart from the rest. You see, you can categorize "Psychonauts" as an action platformer, but with every level being basically a different gaming experience, there is no one genre for the game. The greatest challenge the game presents the player with is that of having to adapt to different environments for each level. Couple this with some mind-bending puzzles along the way and lots and lots of action and you get a game that stands out from the crowd.

You play as Raz, the goggle-wearing boy, who has left his life at the circus, and now hopes to be a psychonaut.

The visual style of the game is unique, too. Every area of the game is a surreal visual treat that makes you want to stop and look around. People tend to forget that games aren't made by a bunch of nerdy programmers writing code. The game creation process is also made of many talented level designers and artists who spend most of their time coming up with great ideas and worlds that then need to be created by the programmers. In "Psychonauts," unlike other games, you really notice this and realize that this is something very special. When you reach Lungfishopolis and Black Velvetopia, you'll see what I mean.

There's nothing else I can really say about this game. This is one title you need to see and play to believe. Go buy this so that more rich games like this one can be made.

Classic East meets Gospel West, Shu performs on Chinese erhu with a twist

By JEROME YUAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon's" theme music is typified by the sounds of a melancholy stringed instrument. Without hearing it before, you might think the music was a special type of Chinese-sounding violin, but the instrument you hear isn't a violin at all: it's an erhu. Erhu (pronounced ER-WHO) is one of China's most well-known classical instruments. Often called the Chinese violin (but more closely related to a fiddle,) the Erhu is a two-stringed bowed instrument with a snake skin covered sound box where the emanating vibrations give the erhu its distinct Chinese sound.

Originating in China in the 13th century, it evolved from foreign instruments introduced through cultural exchange and trade with the Middle East. It is capable of mimicking a range of sounds from birds to horses (one of the most well-known Erhu songs is called "saima" or "horse racing") and is one of the main instruments played in a Chinese musical orchestra along with dulcimer, zither, Chinese flute and bamboo flute. Renowned for its ability to play mellow and somber melodies, the erhu is featured throughout Chinese cinema such as Jet Li's "Once Upon A Time in China" series.

Suzanne Shu
Sat., Sept. 17
Bowker Auditorium
UMass
Free

This Saturday, the public will be able to hear this instrument with a slight western twist. On Sept. 17th, UMass Amherst will host accomplished erhu musician Suzanne Shu at the Bowker Auditorium. Born in Beijing, but now residing in the states, Suzanne Shu has been awarded multiple honors in the musical world for her performances on the erhu and has released many albums of erhu music. She's performed all over the world, from Europe to Brazil, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has given over 700 solo concerts in the past five years alone. She has even been approached by Hollywood producers to record tracks for movies.

To say she's busy is a bit of an understatement, as she's also released multiple solo albums and, most interestingly, she's released gospel tracks on many of them. As a devout Christian, she is greatly influenced by her religious beliefs and even includes "Amazing Grace" in many of her shows and as a track on her albums. At performances in Japan and Taiwan, she was told that her gospel music was even more enjoyable than the classical Chinese songs, so much so that parents have told her they would encourage their children to study her musical pieces.

Erhu seems to be gaining more of an audience throughout the United States. Whereas erhu might once have been considered just a novelty instrument, Shu and other erhu musicians have noticed larger and larger audiences at their shows, as well as an increase in students who seek to learn to play the instrument. Perhaps the most telling example of erhu's larger recognition comes from Shu's airport check-in experiences; before she used to have to explain what the instrument was to security, but now she no longer finds that a common occurrence. As the instrument she plays continues to garner acceptance, the audience this Saturday will have the chance to hear her play classical Chinese songs as well as her special blend of western and eastern musical influences.

The erhu is a Chinese violin with two strings. Its origin is said to be during the Tang Dynasty (618-907).

Busy weekend for UM

man forward Vanessa Patry.

Vermont, on the contrary, will have a more direct approach to the Maroon and White defense when the Minutewomen return home on Sunday to face the Catamounts (2-4-0).

UVM plays a more direct game of soccer, rarely making three or four passes before pushing the ball long up field. The Catamounts' direct approach, coupled with very flat play in the back hasn't always paid off, though. Earlier this year they lost to Notre Dame, Villanova and Duquesne by a combined score of 20-1.

Putting things into perspective, Notre Dame is the No. 1 team in the nation and will continue to be the prestigious, Final Four houseguest Fighting Irish. Vermont still poses problems in its own right.

One of those problems will be taking care of senior forward Nikkie Hessney, who, after a medical redshirt last season, is back into full swing. Currently tied for first in UVM's point standings with four goals and one assist for nine points, she carries a tremendous work ethic and is very sophisticated with the ball.

She's also very good on corners and a very effective scorer, which, when coupled with Vermont's pressurized, direct attack, could spell trouble for UMass if it isn't technically sound.

Rudy has been working on cleaning up his players' technique in practice this week, a difficult task in and of itself with the uncharacteristically humid September air.

"They suffered today," Rudy said following practice on Wednesday, when temperatures reached 90 degrees. "We've got the next four games coming over nine days, so they have to be ready."

NOTE: Coach Rudy is currently looking for students to be part of a drum group that would be played at women's soccer home games at Rudd Field. The intent of the group is to help give the games an "international soccer atmosphere" which was seen at games when the Minutewomen played at Garber Field years ago. Anyone interested in participating should contact Chris Monteiro at (413) 545-5477.

Sophomore forward Britt Canfield is second on the second leading scorer for the Minutewomen this season, with four points on a goal and two assists. Canfield led UMass in scoring last year.

Midshipmen, as he leads the team with three assists to go along with two goals.

Those stats are just enough to keep Koch from looking past Cornell.

"[Navy] has a game Friday, and I wish them luck," Koch said. "We're not thinking about them right now."

The story of the game for UMass on Tuesday was that of missed opportunities. Koch knows that in order for his team to come out of the weekend successful, they have to capitalize on what they're given.

"We've got to finish our opportunities," Koch said. "We've had some good opportunities we haven't finished, and it's cost us these past two games. We put those away [this weekend], and I think we'll be fine."

As UMass approaches conference play, Koch also understands what these games mean to his team in the long run.

"Every game we play right now is a stepping stone," Koch said. "We've got to learn from each game and re-learn about each other each time we step out there. Yeah, [these games] are vital."

Grieving Clemens gets win

By Stephen Hawkins
Associated Press

HOUSTON - In the final hours of her life, Roger Clemens' mother was talking about baseball.

"This is momma, she was thinking baseball. She came to and asked if we were in the playoffs yet," Clemens said. "Out of nowhere came, she mentioned Shoeless Joe Jackson. It was unbelievable. ... I asked her if she was in the fields, and she said, 'I think I am.' She just loves the game."

Clemens was with his mother, Bess, early Wednesday when she died. Later that night, he was on the mound making his scheduled start for the Houston Astros, just as his mother expected him to do.

With a gutsy performance that would have made his mother proud, the Rocket allowed just one run in six 1-3 innings to lead the Astros to a 10-2 victory over Florida that moved them within a half-game of the Marlins for the NL wild-card lead.

"I get my determination from her," Clemens said. "She told me to go to work."

Bess Clemens died in Georgetown, Texas, because of complications from emphysema. She was 75.

Clemens often shared his affection for his mother, saying her health was an important factor as he weighed retirement the past two offseasons. His stepfather died when he was young, and his mother was an inspiration.

"She was my strength. She's always my will. She gave me so much," said Clemens, now 43. "I'm just very thankful that she's at peace now. She worked so hard, she was really my mother and my father. She played both roles. ... I've lost a little bit of my fire. I don't want to say I lost any of my passion, because I want to pass that on to the kids."

Just after the final out Wednesday night, a tribute to Clemens' mother was shown on the giant video screen. Astros players stood in the infield and watched, while Clemens saw it on a monitor in the clubhouse. There were clips of Clemens talking about his mother at previous news conferences, his mother talking about him and video of them together on a baseball field.

COURTESY CHRIS LEIST/ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Roger Clemens pitched 6.1 innings on Wednesday night, allowing only one run in a 10-2 victory over Florida. Clemens' mother died early Wednesday.

"It was great to see her look so pretty like I remember," he said with tears in his eyes.

"His mother was a very special person in his life. I can see the two of them together, Roger was still a little boy around her," New York Yankees manager Joe Torre said in St. Petersburg, Fla. "She's been fighting this thing for a long period of time. Hopefully she's at peace and Roger is also."

Clemens (12-7) lowered his major league-best ERA to 1.77 while winning for the first time in seven starts. It was his 340th victory, the most among active pitchers, and he had four strikeouts to increase his career total to 4,492.

"He showed what a true champion he was today," manager Phil Garner said.

Clemens had a tough first inning, with two four-pitch walks - including leadoff hitter Luis Castillo before Jeff Conine singled. Florida took the lead on grounder.

"As soon as I climbed on the mound, I was lost a little bit," Clemens said.

But after that, the Marlins didn't score another run off the seven-time Cy Young Award winner, he didn't walk another batter and Houston stopped a three-game losing streak.

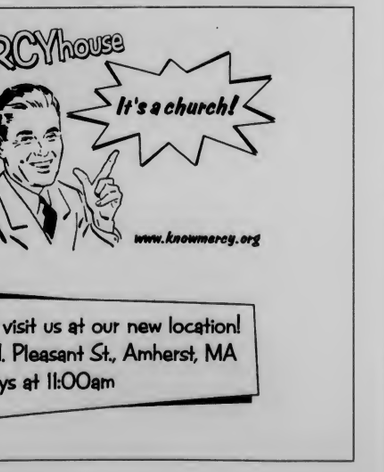
"I didn't even know what happened until after the game," said Florida's A.J. Burnett, who lost his fifth straight start. "To go out and battle like he did under those circumstances, you have to give him a lot of credit. You hear a lot about Roger Clemens being a warrior. Well, you saw it tonight."

Clemens had retired 17 of 19 batters, allowing only a pair of singles, before Damion Easley and Juan Pierre had consecutive one-out singles in the seventh with the Astros up 3-1.

After Pierre reached base, catcher Brad Ausmus went out to the mound for a lengthy conversation with Clemens. Garner then came out, and after speaking briefly with Clemens, changed pitchers.

Clemens got a standing ovation as he walked from the mound, and shared high-fives with his teammates who swarmed around him when he got to the dugout. Reliever Chad Qualls got the first batter he faced to ground into an inning-ending double play.

"It was just Rocket being Rocket. He was just adding to his legendary status," Craig Biggio said.



"He did what he always does," Lance Berkman said. "It's amazing that on a day like this that he was able to focus and perform."

After Houston loaded the bases on a walk and two singles in the second, Burnett (12-11) walked consecutive batters - Clemens was the second - to give the Astros a 2-1 lead. Biggio followed with an RBI single.

Clemens has talked about how much he hoped his mother would be able to attend his Hall of Fame induction.

"I wanted her to hang on so I could thank her properly at the Hall of Fame," he said. "I said that so many times, and I keep playing this silly game, and I love it. And I just hope, and I know, she enjoyed some of the games.

Derosa leads UMass

happy with the team's fitness early on in the season.

"It's a real nice match for a successful fall," O'Brien said. "It was real fun taking a look at the team last week and will be more fun this week."

As for the Minutewomen, they finished fifth out of a nine-team field at the Dartmouth Invitational, one spot behind Vermont.

They were led once again by sophomore Christina Derosa, who finished 14th (20:29.30) overall.

Minutewoman coach Julie LaFreniere is optimistic about this week's track.

"This course isn't as tough [as last week's]; some tough spots, honest course, not as many hard hills."

If it rains, like the forecast is predicting, it will put a whole different spin on things, says LaFreniere.

"We will have to be gutsy and run through muck," she said.

Vermont has gone up a couple of notches from last year, as it had six runners finish last week before UMass had two, and Maine has a couple of dangerous runners the Minutewomen are worried about, too.

UMass sophomore Ashley Davidson, who was the team's fifth member to cross the line last week, was sore after the race due to a pair of new shoes, but she is expected to be in the lineup tomorrow.

The Minutewomen's lineup will look a little different this week though, as Amber Sayer will be resting because she twisted her ankle during a fall last week and also due to the rain forecasted for this weekend's meet.

Suzanne Simmons will be returning to action after she was out last week due to an iron deficiency.

Derosa feels it will be advantageous for UMass to be able to practice on tomorrow's course during the week, as opposed to UVM and Maine, which will both be seeing the track for the first time. Knowing when to really push and where the hills are will give them an edge tomorrow.

In comparison to last year, Derosa said the team has definitely improved.

"We have a good pack," Derosa said. "We could really do a lot with that, so I think our team is going to be a lot better this year, a lot stronger."

Graffanino's long home run trot

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON - Tony Graffanino's first instinct was to help his injured teammate. That would have been the worst thing for him to do.

"I knew I couldn't pass him, but at the same time I was worried for him," he said Thursday, a day after Gabe Kapler tore his Achilles' tendon circling the bases on Graffanino's homer. "I just had to freeze and wait, 10 feet away. I've never seen it before."

Few have.

Kapler was on first base when Graffanino homered in the fifth inning of Boston's 5-3 victory over Toronto on Wednesday night. Unsure that the ball would clear the wall, Kapler was running full-speed around second base when he crumpled to the ground.

Graffanino stopped before passing him, the umpires called time and the trainers came out to look at Kapler. According to baseball rule 5.10 (c) (1), the Red Sox were allowed to insert a pinch-runner, mid-play.

That brought Alejandro Machado, a 23-year-old September call-up who had never been on base in the majors before, off the bench to score his first big-league run. He wishes it could have been under better circumstances.

"It was exciting, but we were worried about Kapler," he said at his temporary locker in the middle of the Red Sox clubhouse on Thursday. "I never imagined my first run was going to be like this."

Kapler was in the clubhouse with a cast covering his left leg to the knee as his teammates lined up to console him; he will miss the rest of the season.

"I think you could tell by the looks on the players' faces he's a huge loss to this team," general manager Theo Epstein said. "He got hurt doing what he does best, which is hustling. His effort will not go unnoticed by the other players."

The Red Sox were one of a handful of teams getting a spring training lecture called "Ruleball," in which author and consultant Rich Marazzi helps teams prepare for unconventional situations that can come up in games.

"It's different situations where you could use the rules to your advantage if you know the rules better than the umpires," Epstein said.

The examples covered players falling into the stands or running into the dugouts. One situation was a play in the 2003 AL playoffs, when Oakland's Miguel Tejada was called out after thinking he could take a free base following an obstruction call.

Boston manager Terry Francona was an A's coach at the time - in charge of baserunning - so he wasn't too eager to relive the moment.

"After being out in the hot sun all day, some of it was more interesting than others," he said.

Francona said he already knew the rule involved in Wednesday's play. But Graffanino was stumped.

"I wasn't sure what I was supposed to do," he said.

Kapler's injury came at a bad time for the AL East-leading Red Sox. He was in the lineup in place of center fielder Johnny Damon, who had missed three straight games with a sore left shoulder.

But an MRI showed no damage in Damon's shoulder and he tested his arm before Thursday's game. Francona had planned to use Damon sparingly, but things went well enough for him to get back in the lineup at his customary leadoff spot.

"He went out and did what he's supposed to do, and he did it so convincingly that the medical people were on board," Francona said. "It's the time of year when if you can play, you do play, and the good news is Johnny feels ready to be productive."

Sculptor honors Ted Williams

By Verena Dobnik
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Ted Williams, decapitated and frozen in Arizona. And sculptor Daniel Edwards, protesting the state of the late baseball great with what he calls "a little shrine to his head" - an exhibit at First Street Gallery.

"The fact is, he was decapitated and stored in the middle of Arizona - it's an atrocious thing," Edwards said about the cryogenic process that resulted in the Hall of Famer's head being surgically removed and frozen at Scottsdale's Alcor Life Extension Foundation. The rest of Williams' body is stored in a separate tank there.

Alcor is preserving Williams and more than 60 other "patients" in hopes that medical science one day will be so advanced that they can be revived.

"They should free his remains," said Edwards as he put finishing touches to his show, which opened last week and runs through Oct. 1. "I'm a huge fan of Ted Williams. When I was a kid, the first bat I got was a Ted Williams model."

Edwards set up his show as a kind of sports collectibles exhibit, with a sculpture of Williams' frozen head as the centerpiece. The sculptor said he never saw Williams' actual head or a photograph of it; he worked off photographs of the living man to form a "faithful portrait" of him in his later years.

The bust of the Boston Red Sox great rests alone in a glass case, his head leaning back, eyes partly closed.

The exhibit includes three copies of the sculpture, each in a glass case surrounded by memorabilia such as a 1954 Life magazine cover featuring Williams.

Alcor said in a statement that the company had nothing to do with the work of the 40-year-old artist, who specializes in sculpted portraits of great Americans.

Black Bears in Orono on Sunday. It is one of only four Maine home games this season at Morse Field at Alfond Stadium.

Maine is coming off a 6-0 loss to Ohio State on Sunday. The Black Bears are currently in second place in the America East Conference and are led by forward Kasey Spencer. The senior leads the Black Bears in points with seven this season.

Maine is a young team, and it shows, with five of its 13 goals this season coming from rookies.

Shea knows this, and is prepared to go after her opposition's rookie mistakes.

"Maine is young, but they do have some experience in some key players and some key areas," Shea said. "We have to stay away from those experienced players and exploit their youth."

The Minutewomen will go into this weekend looking to come out with a four-game winning streak, and senior Katelyn Woolfrey likes their chances.

"If we all come together strong, we will have a really good matchup," Woolfrey said.

Both games this weekend will be tough ones, but Shea knows what she is up against and is fully prepared.

"It's a possession game," Shea said. "Both teams play in spurts. They both like to pressure you, challenge you, get you to make mistakes and then explode off your mistakes. We have to play well. They are two regional schools. It's two great rivalries that we have."

Sophomore Erin O'Brien and the Minutewomen will look to continue their two game winning-streak this weekend when they play two games.

Dillon to get more involved

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. (AP) — Corey Dillon's New England Patriots encore began on a sour note.

In last week's opening game against Oakland, he managed 63 yards on 23 carries compared with last season, when he had a career-high nine 100-yard games to tie the Patriots' single-season record.

It was Dillon's lowest output as a Patriot. Last season, he rushed for a franchise-record 1,635 yards after the Patriots acquired him in an offseason trade with Cincinnati.

New England, which prides itself on offensive balance, rode Tom Brady's 306 passing yards to a 30-20 win over the Raiders.

When the Patriots visit the Carolina Panthers on Sunday, they want to be more of a threat on the ground.

"We really want to get Corey going," Patriots left tackle Matt Light said. "Good things always happen to us when he's out there running the ball well. That's what we're going to try to get done this week."

Carolina will be without two-time Pro Bowl defensive tackle Kris Jenkins, who suffered a season-ending knee injury in Sunday's 23-20 loss to New Orleans.

However, the Panthers still have game-changing defensive end Julius Peppers as well as middle linebacker Dan Morgan.

When New England beat Carolina in Super Bowl XXXVIII two years ago, Morgan was credited with a franchise-record 25 tackles.

"He does a good job of slipping blockers and beating blockers," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "He's very instinctive. A lot of times, he kind of has a step on those linemen in terms of getting to the hole. He gets a good jump on a lot of plays."

The Panthers limited New Orleans' Deuce McAllister to 64 yards on 26 carries, but the Saints pulled off a 23-20 upset on John Carney's 47-yard field goal with three seconds left.

Corey Dillon will look to improve on the 63 yards he rushed for on 23 carries in New England's season-opening win against Oakland.

Minutewomen play pair

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Last March, the College of the Holy Cross approved construction of a brand new, $3 million, 1,350-seat facility for its men's and women's soccer teams that is, simply put, state of the art.

When finished, it will certainly be a nice counterpart to its baseball field, recently renovated to accommodate the Worcester Tornadoes Independent League baseball team, and will give the Crusaders a leg up in recruiting. But for now they will have to settle for something with a minute amount of bells and whistles.

For the UMass women's soccer team, that could potentially create some problems.

The Minutewomen play on luxurious Rudd Field, with its clean playing surface and a field that stretches 75 feet wide from the far end to the near end. Compare that with HC's current field, only 64 feet from far to near, and it's as if the hockey team moved its home game from the Mullins Center to the practice rink.

Not to be forgotten either is the notion that the Crusaders are off to one of their best starts in recent years (2-4-0) and, given the importance of midfield play in small dimensions, employ five midfielders.

The midfield was a problem for UMass when it faced UConn a week ago. UConn, however, will be the blue-chipped UConn it always is. But in that perspective, Holy Cross will be Holy Cross, too.

"Holy Cross will not be a UConn, but they'll provide their own set of difficulties for us," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior captain Lindsey Bellini will lead the Minutewomen in a pair of games this weekend. UMass travels to Holy Cross today at 4 p.m. and hosts Vermont Sunday at 2:15 p.m.

The Crusaders like to make a lot of substitutions in the game, but posing the biggest threat for the Minutewomen might be junior midfielder Lauren Pereira. The daughter of local legend Freddy Pereira, who went on to play for the New York Cosmos in the now-defunct North American Soccer League, is currently tied for the team lead in goals with two. Both goals came in one-goal thrillers over Iona and Siena in roughly a one-week span.

Alison Hayes is another potential threat in the midfield. A senior who has steadily improved during her tenure, she is the other team leader in goals, and was the only Crusader to score on the Minutewomen in last year's affair at Rudd.

Regardless of what they do with their midfielders and substitutions, they had better key on lightning-quick sophomore Britt Canfield. She continues to stretch defenses with her speed that is upper-tier in the Atlantic 10, and is becoming a favorite target of up-and-coming fresh-

When the Massachusetts women's soccer team takes the field this weekend in a pair of games, at Holy Cross on Friday and at home against Vermont on Sunday, half of the starting lineup will be comprised of freshmen and sophomores.

For most teams, a lineup featuring five underclassmen would signal a rebuilding year, but for the Minutewomen (2-2-1), the group is actually quite experienced.

The four sophomores in the starting lineup: Britt Canfield, Jenny Roehrig, Tina Rodriguez and Kaelyn Caldwell all saw a lot of action last year as freshmen. And the lone freshman to crack the lineup thus far, Vanessa Parry, has shown that she is more than capable of making the transition to the college game, as she is the team's leading scorer.

One way that UMass coach Jim Rudy believes his young players will gain experience is by playing against top competition. Last weekend certainly provided tough opponents as the Minutewomen played two Big East teams, losing 4-0 to UConn and tying St. John's 1-1.

Rudy believes that his younger players learned a great deal from the UConn game, despite the lopsided final score.

"They certainly got experience and education," Rudy said. "They got to see the speed of a high-level Division I game against UConn. The speed of the players and the physicality poses a challenge."

The aspect of UConn's game that Rudy hopes his team will learn from and use is the way the Huskies played at a high rate of speed while maintaining skill. After seeing a team play at that level, Rudy feels that his players came to the realization that that is how they will need to play if they want to be a top team.

While playing against UConn and St. John's last weekend should help his team play better against tough competition, Rudy knows that the best way for his players to improve is simply through getting playing time.

"Last year a lot of the sophomores got serious playing time," Rudy said. "And then in the winter and spring, they got more work in and a better understanding of the expectations I have for them. We definitely have a strong base for the future. There's been a step from last year to this, and it should get even better next year when they begin to take on leadership roles. Right now they are making progress."

Of course, with such a young team, Rudy must have older, more experienced players to lead their teammates. Rudy certainly has a strong core of upperclassmen, with senior co-captains Lindsey Bellini and Amy Maffucci, joined by senior Tiffany Hamill, and juniors Nadia Villarroel, Stephanie Barrett and Kristin Walker.

"This team has very strong captains with Maffucci and Bellini," Rudy said. "There are very few agendas as opposed to past years. The focus is the team, not the individual. All of the seniors and juniors are acting with maturity and leadership.

"It's enjoyable to listen to them during halftime before I come over to talk to the team. They are already talking and trying to solve things on their own."

Home opener today for UMass

By Jon Pelland

It's finally time for the Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-3) to play its first game of the year at Rudd Field in Amherst. The Minutemen will be playing their home opener today against the Big Red of Cornell (0-2-1) before facing Navy (3-1) on Sunday.

UMass returns home after playing its first four games away from Amherst.

The latest game for the Minutemen was a tough 1-0 loss to Hartford on Tuesday night. In the matchup, Hartford was out-shot 13-5 by the Minutemen but was still able to squeak out the win.

Minuteman coach Sam Koch is assured that his players have put their recent misfortunes behind them and are prepared for the weekend.

"They're ready to play [today]," Koch said. "We haven't played at home yet, and we've certainly helped other teams with their openers, so I would say it should definitely be a positive."

One key for the Minutemen will be freshman goalie Zach Simmons. So far this season, Simmons has been stellar between the pipes. In four games, the rookie has made 24 saves for 1.50 goals against average and an .800 save percentage.

Entering 2005, Simmons wasn't slated to be the UMass everyday goalkeeper, but a separated shoulder suffered by junior Nick Billman over the summer catapulted Simmons into the spotlight.

Friday's game marks the beginning of a five-game road trip for Cornell that will also take them to Hartford, Wofford, Furman and Penn.

There haven't been many positives in the Big Red's 2005 campaign. Besides being winless, so far this season they have only been able to get one goal past the opposing goalie on 37 shots. That works out to a mere 0.31 goals scored average.

"You can't look at their record; they're a good team," Koch said. "They're going to be a tough team to play against. They're athletic, well organized and they have a good coach. We're going to have a battle on our hands."

There are only two games in the all-time series between UMass and Cornell, with the last occurring back in 1983. The result was a scoreless tie.

Navy, on the other hand, comes into the weekend wrapping up a four-game road swing when it plays Hartford today and the Maroon and White on Sunday.

The Midshipmen have enjoyed a lot of success up until now in the 2005 season with the offense being the key so far.

In four games this season, Navy has outscored its opponents 11-3. The Midshipmen have scored six second half goals this season while holding their opponents to only two.

The offensive outburst has been led by sophomore J.P. Murphy and junior Carter Stapleton.

Both are leading their team in points with seven. Murphy has posted his seven-spot by scoring a team-high three goals to go along with his one assist. Stapleton has proved to be the premier setup man for the

Ford lands another transfer

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team announced yesterday that swingman Gary Forbes has transferred from the University of Virginia of the high-profile Atlantic Coast Conference to UMass.

Forbes is the fifth transfer that first-year coach Travis Ford has brought to UMass since taking over for Steve Lappas in March.

Forbes will not be eligible to play until next season and will have two years of eligibility remaining at UMass. He joins redshirt freshman center Luke Bonner from West Virginia and junior forward Etienne Brower from Boston University as transfers Ford has added who will not be able to play this season. All three of these players will be able to practice with the team this year.

Since Ford has taken over, he has also added two transfers who will be eligible to play this season, junior guard/forward Brandon Thomas from Long Island University and junior guard James Life from Manatee Community College in Florida.

Of all of these transfers, Forbes comes in as the most highly touted player. Coming off the bench for the Cavaliers last season, Forbes averaged 9.4 points and 4.1 rebounds in 22.4 minutes played per game.

Ford was excited to announce the signing of Forbes, saying that he could have been "an All-ACC performer this year."

"We are thrilled to have Gary joining our basketball program," Ford said. "Gary is a proven player who performed in one of the best conferences in America. Gary gives us added depth and is a player that will have a great future at UMass. He is a complete player who can score, shoot, defend, score off the dribble and has good knowledge of the game."

Forbes had two of his best games last season against some of the top competition in the country. He scored a career-high 23 points and grabbed six rebounds in a loss at national champion North Carolina, and in a loss at Duke, Forbes recorded his first career double-double with 17 points and 10 rebounds.

UM hits the road for two games

By Danny Picard

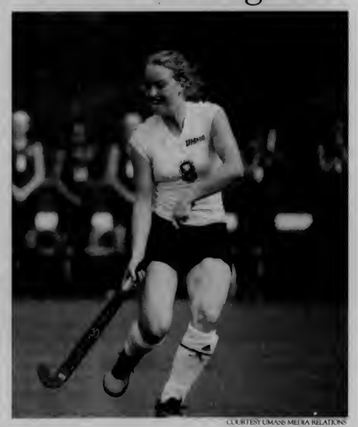
The Massachusetts field hockey team will head north this weekend to try to build on its two-game winning streak as it faces off against New Hampshire (3-4) and Maine (4-3).

The Minutewomen (2-4) will travel to Memorial Field in New Hampshire to take on UNH on Saturday. With both teams having losing records, Saturday's game against their America East rival will be one of the more meaningful of the season.



"I think every game is huge," coach Patty Shea said. "But these two games can bring you to .500."

New Hampshire is coming off an 8-0 loss to Connecticut on Wednesday, which moved the Wildcats to fourth place in the America East Conference. Although the Wildcats have yet to put together back-to-back wins this season, they still average the most number of points per game in the conference with 6.17.

The Wildcats are led by captain Katie White, who leads the team in points with nine this season. The senior from Glens Falls, N.Y. is fourth on New Hampshire's all-time goals list with 36 and is ninth in points with 75.

New Hampshire already has five multiple-goal scorers through seven games, which matches last year's final total. With that in mind, the Minutewomen will have to come up with a game plan to stop these goal scorers if they want to keep their momentum going and become a .500 team after losing their first four games of the season.

Shea believes the Minutewomen will be successful this weekend if they play their game and control the tempo.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Freshman forward Erin Parker has three points this season on one goal and one assist. Parker and UMass will face UNH and Maine this weekend.

"We have to stick to what makes us successful as a team," Shea said. "We have to execute our strengths. If we can possess the ball, if we can control the game and not give them the free chances, then we will be OK."

While Shea realizes that her team can get back on the winning track this weekend, she also knows that it is a long season, one that she hopes will take them to an Atlantic 10 Championship.

At this point in the season, Shea is more concerned with her team gaining confidence in their play, because that is where the Minutewomen will have to "control their own destiny."

"Our emphasis is not necessarily the outcome as much as it is our performance," Shea said. "Our goal is to get better with all these games that we play. That is where we play our way into a championship and to the NCAA Tournament."

Cross country runs Saturday

Tomorrow, the Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams will be hosting Maine and Vermont at 11:30. Due to construction on campus, the meet will be held at Amherst College.

This is the smallest meet of the season for both UMass teams.

Last week, the Minutemen finished in fourth place at the Dartmouth Invitational, two spots ahead of Vermont in the nine-team field. Sophomore Nils Fischer led the UMass men's team with a 10th place finish (25:53.20).

"He is a good runner with a lot to grow on, and has a lot of potential under his belt," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said. He also added that Fischer was hurt with injuries last season, especially his Achilles tendon injury.

O'Brien doesn't see his team having real home field advantage this weekend, despite the race being held at Amherst College.

"Amherst is a fair course [to run on], and if you haven't run on it, then you aren't too far behind," O'Brien said. "We might have a slight edge on a couple of runners."

Maine won last week's Binghamton University Invitational. Last year, the Black Bears defeated the Maroon and White in Amherst, 29-32.

Freshman Jesse Regnier also had a good race last weekend, finishing fourth among UMass runners and 31st overall in his first collegiate meet. The Hampden native finished fourth in the state meet last year as a senior at Ludlow High School.

"It's a lot to ask of a freshman, having to run almost twice as long as he used to in high school," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen have a large senior class, and O'Brien is happy with the way the veterans are helping their younger teammates and balancing team chemistry.

"The guys returning have done an improved job of getting themselves ready this year," O'Brien said. "And [they] also are communicating higher expectations to the younger guys."

O'Brien also said that he is

Students disagree with Gargano's CSD plan

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

In the wake of student protests over new RSO advisor policies, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano says that the new Center for Student Development is designed to create opportunities for students. However, members of student organizations say Gargano does not understand their needs or value their experiences.

The mandated reassignment of RSO advisors was an initial step in a broader vision to transform extracurricular life and student affairs at the University, Gargano said.

The CSD, which has replaced the Student Activities Center as part of the Campus Action Plan formulated last spring, aims to retain the Student Activities Center's commitment to RSO support while consolidating administrative support and increasing collaboration with event planning and academic affairs to make events highly efficient and more rewarding.

The mandated reassignment of RSO advisors was an initial step in a broader vision to transform student affairs at the University, Gargano said.

The CSD is also designed to create more opportunities for students to explore choices and form decisions, and to prepare for careers, leadership, civic engagement and civic responsibility.

"The real impetus behind the Center for Student Development is that there's real intent and purpose behind what we do," Gargano said.

He felt that the current system needed revitalization and change. "RSO student leaders should walk away with a certain set of skills," Gargano said, such as marketing and time management. "I didn't sense that that was actually happening."

Sophomore Danny Green, who was the vocal director of the Theater Guild's production of "Seussical" last semester, said nothing could be further from the truth.

"That was probably one of the most rewarding learning experiences I've ever had in my life," Green said. "If that doesn't teach you something about people and how to lead people, nothing will."

Student Government Association Speaker Sean Bliss said Gargano's remarks imply that RSO members' current work is without purpose and shows how out of touch he is with student organizations.

"If he stood up in an auditorium in front of student leaders and said that [student leaders aren't gaining skill sets], I think he would be chased off campus," Bliss said. "That makes me wonder how connected he is to student life. We don't see him much in the student union. I don't know where he's getting these opinions."

Bliss fears that, on the contrary, students will no longer develop skill sets if Gargano decreases student autonomy in planning events.

"If our students are going to learn responsibility and gain certain skill sets, those skill sets are going to come from the pressure of having to sustain an RSO, not from having someone from the CSD hold their hand and walk them through the entire process," Bliss said.

"I think indirectly he's showing contempt, almost, for the ability of students on this campus to run their own student activities."

Another goal of the CSD is to create more RSOs on campus.

"On a campus this size, we should have 400 RSOs," Gargano said. "The Center for Student Development has to reach out to more students. What's happening in this formula is we end up working with only a small percentage of the registered student groups."

In the long term, Gargano also hopes to create more collaboration between student activities and academic affairs in order to "support co-curricular programs and experiential learning."

As an example, he cited his hope to bring the International Film Festival held through the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences and sponsored by Student Affairs, the International Programs Office's film festival, and the film festival organized through the Center for Student Development all into the realm of academic affairs to deliver at a higher level.

"It would seem to me that everyone has the same interest, that there's some natural collaboration there," Gargano said.

Further, he hopes to expand and diversify the pool of advisors available to work with RSOs.

Advisors to stay in RSOs

By Katie Huston
Collegian Staff

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano decided Thursday not to transfer a professional Registered Student Organization advisor to another department after RSO members filed petitions against the change. However, the similarly protested reassignment of advisors to new organizations is still in effect.

Gargano said that petitions filed by concerned RSO members last Wednesday influenced his decision to keep four full-time professional advisors, although he had already been considering the idea.

"I had honestly been tossing and turning," Gargano said of the decision. "After listening to what the students had to say, we decided it was best that we keep stability."

Student Affairs has also hired four new graduate student advisors, Gargano said.

However, despite RSO members' requests, the recently mandated reassignment of RSO advisors to new organizations will not be changed.

"I'll give the advisors some fresh outlook, give them the chance to work with some student leaders they haven't worked with before," Gargano said.

He also saw a need for more internal communica-

Paint contract is questioned

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

A number of top-ranking officials from the University of Massachusetts have been intensely questioned by the state's attorney general office concerning a number of curious financial reports involving the campus paint contractor.

The probe, conducted by the Bid Protest Unit of the attorney general's office, is questioning whether too much money was spent on a contract awarded in 2002 to Garland Construction Corp. of Chicopee for campus painting projects. The one-year contract was awarded with an estimated yearly value of $100,000, with the possibility of two single-year extensions.

In January 2004, Mass. Assistant Attorney General Joseph Ruccio rejected a bid protest by Cameron Painting Inc. of Amherst, one of two firms that had competed for the 2002 contract. The owner of Cameron Painting, Don Cameron, claimed the University had no right to extend the painting contract for a third year.

Ruccio said the contract "unambiguously provided for two additional one-year terms."

Unspecified complaints about spending levels under the current contract prompted Ruccio to launch a new inquiry into UMass' spending.

Ruccio discovered that Garland had exceeded the estimated $100,000 of painting work for UMass and that, in effect, represented a violation of public bidding laws. Ruccio then requested that the University respond with a summary of the payments made to Garland since its hiring.

According to recently revealed documents, payments to Garland Construction Corporation of Chicopee had reached at least $1.6 million by Oct. 27 of 2004. UMass Director of Procurement, John Martin, valued spending at just $982,926 in response to a query by Ruccio, nearly twice as less as the true amount.

Ruccio's spending investigation is only one of several legal inquiries into the campus painting contracts. In May, Ruccio voided a new $500,000-per year contract to Garland, after finding it failed to disclose that one of its project managers was married to the sister of an UMass manager associated with work the company had done.

In a response to Ruccio dated Oct. 27, Martin said the subcontracting work had been authorized under the contract, which did not restrict the amount of work that could be done. He claimed that the original estimate was based on what the Physical Plant Department felt would occur based on past experiences.

Martin said changes to the universities own painting staff forced it to rely heavily on the new contract. Four painters with the physical plant department accepted the state's offer of early retirement in the summer of 2002, and four more would be reassigned to another department the following year.

"The chancellor's initiative involved an ambitious campaign to seek funds to repaint interior and exterior portions of buildings he viewed as portraying poor images to prospective students," Martin wrote. "The chancellor was instrumental in finding new funding sources to accomplish this goal. As pockets of funding were secured, Garland Construction was issued orders for the individual projects."

These individual projects, in effect, changed the original meaning of the small, $100,000-per-year contract. The projects earned Garland Painting more than $1.9 million during the three-year period.

Recently obtained documents reveal that UMass officials, through a series of inter-office emails, agreed to alter the specifications of the publicly bid contract in 2003.

By altering the wording of Article 9, "Volume of Contract" from "Projects estimated to exceed $10,000 will be publicly bid," to "Projects estimated to exceed $10,000 may be publicly bid," the university enabled

New Orleans freshman survives hurricane

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, quite possibly the most devastating storm the United States has seen in over a century, stories of survival, human compassion and people banding together have begun to emerge.

Cody Siragusa, 19, was beginning his freshman year at the University of New Orleans when the powerful storm hit. The entire city of New Orleans was ordered to evacuate two days before the storm would strike.

Because Siragusa is from Los Angeles, Calif., he had nowhere to go. He chose to stay put. His father used to live on Cape Cod and supported his son's decision to stay, once being a seasoned New Englander himself.

Siragusa told the Daily Collegian of his harrowing experience by phone Saturday. He admits he had no idea the hurricane would be so catastrophic.

"I'd never been through a hurricane, I was kind of excited," Siragusa says. "I was thinking 'all right, this is pretty cool.'"

It was not until the last moments before the storm struck that Siragusa realized it was much bigger than he had expected. Being the only student remaining in his dormitory, he stayed on his cell phone with his girlfriend and parents until he lost phone service.

"When I did finally fall asleep around 7 a.m. Monday morning, I slept for about a half-hour to an hour. I dreamt about surfing because the building was rocking back and forth," he said of his eight-story dormitory built of cinderblock.

Ultimately, the swinging wakes him up, before he walks around the building to check out what damage the storm's fury had unleashed. A short time later, he saw a large window getting blown out.

After riding out the storm alone in his dorm for a few hours, Siragusa took a look through the windows to find any signs of life. He says he observed two men walking down the street, pulling a boat with two dogs on board.

"I see them outside and I say 'geez, I can't leave them there.'"

What first grew to three men and two dogs, eventually grew to 24 people and six dogs by week's end, all living on the forth floor of a dormitory.

By late Monday afternoon, Aug. 29, Siragusa and another man, "Ricky," ventured out into the flood waters to see if anyone needed assistance, or if they could retrieve any supplies. Siragusa describes the flood waters as "shoulder, to lower-neck" deep in the neighborhoods around the university.

Siragusa says he and Ricky "pulled the boat by grabbing power lines" because they had no oars. They rescued four people stranded in their houses and brought them to safer ground at the university.

The University of New Orleans campus is located on higher ground from the surrounding neighborhoods, which made it a good place for refugees to seek higher ground. However, he describes the flood waters on the campus at the time as "waist deep."

Hope appeared to arrive late Monday afternoon, as a group of firefighters stop off at the campus. Before they left, they took one of the refugees with them, Siragusa says, because she was "freaking out." The firefighters say they will return to the campus with food supplies.

But they return with more refugees - 13 in all. They ranged from an infant to the elderly. One of the women required a wheelchair.

Siragusa and Ricky then leave the dorm again to retrieve another refugee down the street.

By nightfall, the firefighters give the refugees permission to break into student's dorm rooms to take food. By Tuesday morning, they had broken into the vending machines as well.

"We were walking around tossing bags of chips, skittles, anything we could find in the dorm rooms."

Siragusa says despite the scary situation, the refugees in the dorm banded together and lived "like one big, happy family."

By Tuesday night, Siragusa and the others allow another family to stay in the dorms after they see a group of people pushing an air mattress down the street, through the water, with a dog, cat and other belongings on top.

Most of Tuesday night is spent trading stories, he says.

Wednesday is largely spent gathering supplies at nearby flooded out convenience stores. After acquiring a new boat the day before, Siragusa says he and three others rowed to the local Walgreens. Amazingly, the boat fit through a broken window, and the refugees collected as many supplies as they could carry. He describes the depth of the water as over one's head, and explains the only supplies they could carry were ones which floated on top of the water, such as bottles of water and rubbing alcohol.

Western Mass. mobilizes to Washington

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 200 local activists from diverse peace and justice groups throughout the Pioneer Valley will participate in the Sept. 24th march and demonstration in Washington, DC, calling for the end to the war in Iraq.

Local organizers discussed at a recent press conference at Sunderland Congregational Church what they see as pressing needs for this mobilization at this time. Topics included the strain on the national budget and the National Guard, the deceptions that led to war, the use of toxic and radioactive uranium weapons, and the impact of the war on soldiers, veterans, families here and in Iraq, students, and poor people.

The Western Mass. Citizens' mobilization, which is supported by the organizing efforts of about a dozen activist groups, approximately 200 community members that range in age between 18 years to retirement, will be based down to the nation's capital to support the nationwide anti-war movement. Nick Camerota, organizer of WMass Troops Out Now Coalition says, that four buses have already filled, and that they are still arranging carpool and van transportation.

Spokespersons for the D.C. rally organizers, ANSWER (Act Now to Stop War & End Racism), and United for Peace & Justice expect 100,000 protesters from across the U.S. to participate in what could be the largest anti-war protest since the beginning of the Iraq war. Other major protests are scheduled that day in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

The all day peace festival, designed to connect grass-roots activists with a wide array of organizations and campaigns will be held on Saturday, Sept. 24 at 10 a.m. on the Washington Monument grounds and the White House. According to a Washington Post news story, this is first time in more than a decade that demonstrators will be allowed to surround the White House.

Cindy Sheehan, an anti-war activist who attracted international attention for her extended demonstration at a peace camp outside President Bush's Texas ranch, is among those scheduled to speak at that day's rally.

"Too many American soldiers and too many Iraqis have been killed and wounded in this pointless and tragic war. We must make peace and care for the injured and grieving on both sides," as noted by Doug Rerick, SAGE Mobilization Representative in a recent Press Release. Camerota says the objective of the WMass mobilization includes, "the immediate withdrawal of all troops in Iraq, the removal of US and foreign bases left in Iraq, and reparations for the damages caused by the war."

He also stated that the continued occupation of Iraq costs the U.S. $186 million a day and $5.6 billion a month. This amount exceeds the average costs during the Vietnam War, and is the single most expensive, long term US operation in 60 years.

"This money should be used for education, housing, employment, job development, however, it is being used for other purposes," said Camerota.

Member organizations of the WMass Citizens' in past sent 27 buses for the Feb. 15, 2003 peace demonstration in New York, as well as donating $1,000 financial assistance so students could get a seat on the bus.

Camerota, who is also a representative of the Western Mass. Affiliate International Actions Center, says that they have participated in 21 mobilizations over a 48 month period.

Among the groups supporting the Western Mass. Citizens' Mobilization are the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), Arise for Social Justice, International Socialist Organization, (ISO), Northampton Committee to Stop the War.

iPods can offer note-taking alternatives

By Becca Garrison
Cavalier Daily (U. Virginia)

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. - The option for professors to record their lectures to iPods and upload them for student use is being tested in certain Texas universities as a pilot for a new program, called Coursecast, created by a company called Pick-A-Prof in collaboration with Apple.

Pick-A-Prof is a Web site that began at Texas A&M University and the University of Texas at Austin in April 2000. It started as a service that posted information regarding professors, including grading patterns and student reviews, edited and listed based on informative quality, said Karen Bragg, director of University Relations for Pick-A-Prof.

"We don't accept personal attacks or profanity in reviews," Bragg said. "We do have people reading them, not a computer."

Pick-A-Prof has extended its range to 116 universities nationally, though not yet U.Va., and includes a schedule planner, an option to chat with other students in a class and a textbook exchange.

"Coursecast is just one more academic tool," Bragg said.

According to Bragg, the Web site will be available to University students before registration for spring classes begins. While the resources will be available, Bragg said it might take until fall semester for professors to become involved with the Coursecast system.

Bragg said surveys of students before this small implementation showed that the top three reasons students were interested in the recordings were in case of missed class due to illness, as a study aid preceding exams and as a supplement to written notes.

"The majority said it would not encourage them to 'skip class,'" Bragg said. "Professors haven't seen a decrease in attendance."

Four professors from the two original Texas universities have implemented the use of the iPod Coursecast program in their classes. Gary B. Wilcox, professor of advertising at Austin, said he always has been involved in new technologies and has used the system in his past two weeks of class.

"It's pretty simple for my part," Wilcox said. "I turn it on when I start lecturing and turn it off when I finish. I don't know if anyone has used it yet or not."

Wilcox said he isn't worried students will stop attending class.

think you've got to be in the class to understand, but this could help somebody study," Wilcox said.

Other universities have their own programs that involve recording and streaming classes over the internet. Duke University has programs in which various participating professors can upload audio and video for their classes for no cost.

Pick-A-Prof has had a price of $5 per lecture to pay for equipment and implementation but hopes to make it free soon, Bragg said.

The University currently uses podcasting for guest speakers and public lectures.

"When people come to give talks, we will put it on a Web site so people can download it," University Director of Web Communications Nancy Tramontin said. "We have not done any faculty lectures, but we have addresses from President Casteen to new students and a couple different lecture series."

Bragg said the Pick-A-Prof will attempt to send a representative to speak during Faculty Senate meetings to make professors aware of the system.

"We will post the site first," Bragg said.

As of right now, all course lectures are available to any student within a University registered with Pick-A-Prof.

"You can restrict it to only students in the class," Bragg said. "But none of our professors wanted it to be restricted."

Crime alert set by UMPD

The University of Massachusetts Police Dept. released a crime alert last week after reports of unknown people entering dorm rooms around campus surfaced.

The UMPD has released surveillance pictures of a suspect from a Monday, Sept. 12 incident on their Web site, umass.edu/umpd. Police say the suspect unlawfully entered a Van Meter Hall dorm room in the Central Residential Area.

The suspect is a white male appearing of typical college age. He was holding a black back pack, wearing a blue t-shirt, long beige pants and glasses.

As the crime alert remains active, UMPD asks all students who live on campus to keep their doors locked at all times. In the meantime, UMPD says they have provided increased student security.

Police also encourage students to report any suspicious activity around their dorms.

UMPD asks anyone with information regarding this, or any other incidents, to call 413-545-0893 to speak with a detective, or 413-577-TIPS to reach the confidential police tip line.

Federal spending cuts in view

By Douglass K. Daniel
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - House Republicans are looking at delaying some federal spending, including money for a prescription drug benefit under Medicare and thousands of highway projects, to offset the cost of rebuilding the Gulf Coast, a leading GOP fiscal conservative said Sunday.

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., said there is a need for dramatic spending cuts in "big-ticket items."

However, Democrats appearing on Sunday news programs questioned how President Bush can trim the budget to pay for Katrina recovery and support tax cuts for the wealthy.

"Where is he going to find roughly half a trillion dollars over the next several years for Iraq and for Katrina?" Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., asked on "Late Edition" on CNN. "I think we're not leveling with the American people."

Raising taxes or not making permanent the president's tax cuts is not the answer now, said Pence, head of the Republican Study Group, the spearhead group for the GOP's most conservative members.

"We simply cannot break the bank of the federal budget," Pence told ABC's "This Week."

"We simply can't allow a catastrophe of nature to become a catastrophe of debt for our children and grandchildren," he said.

The drug benefit program, set to begin Jan. 1, is expected to cost $40 billion a year. Last month President Bush signed a $286.4 billion highway bill that has been criticized for including about 6,000 projects added by lawmakers to benefit their districts and states.

Setting aside all of those additional highway projects and delaying the drug benefit by a year are expected to be among the proposals House Republicans are preparing for "Operation Offset" this week, Pence said.

"We need to rebuild," he said. "We can find the cuts in Washington, D.C., to do that. I really believe that."

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said tax increases will not be a part of the recovery plan he intends to offer this week. Although cuts in spending and delays in spending already approved will not be in his proposal, Vitter said he is open to considering such actions.

Vitter said people should not take on faith that Republicans will make cuts in light of the high spending during the Bush administration.

"We haven't been disciplined enough over the last 10 years. We need to do that, and we needed to do that before Katrina. We still need to do that over the medium and long term," Vitter said.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said an across-the-board cut in spending, excluding defense spending, would be appropriate. He suggested lawmakers consider delaying the drug benefit and review the highway and energy bills passed this summer. The energy bill totaled $12.3 billion over 10 years.

"We're failing when it comes to controlling spending," Graham told "Fox News Sunday."

"The idea that this government of $2.4 trillion is efficiently being spent I disagree with," he said.

Former President Clinton said that Democrats should oppose policies that result in the government borrowing more money from other countries to pay for the costs of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, rebuilding the Gulf Coast and providing tax cuts to the wealthiest.

He said Democrats should make those policies an issue in next year's congressional elections.

"We depend on Japan, China, the United Kingdom, Saudi Arabia, and Korea primarily to basically loan us money every day of the year," Clinton said. "I don't think it makes any sense. I think it's wrong."

Biden and Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., appearing together, disagreed over whether the federal budget could be trimmed. Bush "just sent us a budget, presumably with nothing but necessary spending in it," Biden said.

Kyl, saying "there's a lot of fat in the current budget," proposed taking a fourth of the money allocated to the highway bill and redirecting it to the Gulf region.

Kyl cautioned against raising taxes, saying they slow the economy and thus diminish tax revenues. Biden, however, suggested forgoing further tax cuts for the wealthy and the elimination of the estate tax.

Calling talk among Republican senators of proceeding with a plan to repeal the estate tax "mind-boggling," Sen. Barak Obama, D-Ill., said the country could not fight a war in Iraq, rebuild the Gulf region and deal with other domestic needs while cutting taxes for the wealthy.

Stress injuries can disable

By Kate Stoughton
Brown Daily Herald

PROVIDENCE, R.I. - Five professors and graduate students in the Department of Computer Science have suffered disabling repetitive stress injuries in as many years. The situation prompted Guillaume Marceau GS to organize a lecture by Dr. Arnold-Peter Weiss about hand-related repetitive stress injuries from computer use and how to prevent them.

Repetitive stress injuries among computer users mostly result from poor typing form and can be life-disabling, Weiss, a professor of orthopaedics at Brown University Medical School and a surgeon at Rhode Island Hospital, told an audience in Barus and Holley 168 Thursday afternoon.

"Someone with a life-disabling injury cannot open doors on their own without pain moving up their arm," Marceau said. "They wouldn't be able to touch keyboards anymore. They might not even be able to wash their own hair."

RSIs are common, especially among Brown graduate students. About one in 30 or 40 working adults suffers frun some form of RSI, Weiss said.

Ultimately, Weiss said, computer users should maintain good typing posture and take plenty of breaks. Not much is known about RSI, and often, once it becomes severe, it is difficult if not impossible to treat.

RSIs are specific to soft tissue such as tendons, ligaments, muscles, nerves and blood vessels. Most people who suffer from RSI experience it in their necks, shoulders, arms, elbows, wrists, hands and fingers.

Marceau asked Vice President for Research and Professor of Computer Science Andries van Dam to host the lecture after hearing Weiss deliver a similar speech in February 2004. Van Dam invited Weiss, who has treated him for an ongoing wrist problem, to speak in September so new students could benefit from his information before injuring themselves.

Marceau, who suffers from RSI-related wrist problems, is part of a growing movement to discover the causes of, improve prevention of and create solutions for RSI. He and Elisabeta Marai GS are currently conducting a survey of all Brown graduate students who suffer from RSI.

Clinical studies have yet to determine the causes of RSI; Weiss told The Herald he believes that the causes of RSI may never be discovered.

"You need a homogenous pool to study. You can only find that in larger companies, who won't volunteer employees for studies, because they'd be subjecting themselves to lawsuits," he said.

Weiss also said he believes the cure to RSI may lie in technology like voice recognition software.

But van Dam, co-founder of the Department of Computer Science, believes such technology needs more development before it can become a practical aid. Dictation software makes various errors, he said, which require damaging repetitive action to correct, and if one has a foreign accent, the software may not work at all.

Symptoms of RSI, which may not occur until days after the injury, include tingling, numbness, pain, swelling and the loss of strength or dexterity.

Jenine Turner GS suffers from debilitating RSI-related tendonitis.

"It came on in a couple of days and I couldn't function for two months," she said. "One day it started hurting and within two days I was in a great deal of pain. I couldn't work at all. It's been very difficult. It's been four months, and I still can't type."

Turner injured herself at the end of the Spring 2005 semester and was barely able to finish one of her final exams, since she could only work for five minutes at a time. Her family typed her final paper for her, at her dictation.

To recover over the summer, Turner read papers and underwent physical therapy. This semester she is taking reading-intensive courses and avoiding programming while she tries to heal. However, Turner's insurance company refuses to pay for her physical therapy because she suffers from a stress-related injury. She has stopped receiving treatment.

Gargano sticks with his advising plan

tion between advisors, and said the reorganization would compel advisors to learn from one another.

Gargano dismissed student concerns that the institutional memory of an RSO will be lost with a new advisor.

"I don't think any of the historical information is lost with this," he said.

Further, he said that planning for events is largely the same, no matter which student group advisors are dealing with.

"These are folks who've done event planning for many, many years. Once you get past food, most event planning is fairly stable," he said.

Elvis Mendez, Vice President of AHORA, disagreed. "A lot of event planning is knowing the customs, at least for cultural RSOs," he said. "[Our old advisor] would be able to tell us who could make a true Dominican platter."

Gargano also said advisors were able to keep a large number of their old RSOs. "I don't think there's as dramatic of a shift here as some folks might want others to believe.

"It should be a seamless transition. The students shouldn't see any change to the services they've gotten in the past."

However, Danny Green, vocal director of the A Cappella group Vocal Suspects and a member of the UMass Theater Guild, said that the impact of an advisor shift has been huge, especially with the Theater Guild.

"Everyone loved Judy. She was our best friend," Green said of the Guild's former advisor. "The group has kind of been lost because we have to start all over with someone new who doesn't really understand the way we work. [With a new advisor] you're not going to have that same rapport right away."

Gargano also dismissed allegations that he purposely engineered the shift to take place during the summer to avoid student protest.

"It had to happen so [advisors] could prepare for September," he said.

RSO members have criticized Gargano for failing to sufficiently inform the student body of changes, leading to last week's demonstration and the filing of dozens of petitions.

"If you are working for students, it makes to talk with students," Mendez said. "You can't make changes that directly affect students with no time for discussion, no time for consideration. It's bound to get the student body a little upset."

Gargano agreed that more interaction was needed and could have prevented miscommunication and confusion.

"I think the communication on both sides needs to reach a much higher level," he said.

He hopes to reinstitute weekly or biweekly meetings with SGA members, and discussed the matter with SGA Speaker of the Senate Sean Bliss last Thursday.

Bliss supported the idea of regular meetings, but expressed reservations that regular audiences may be little more than lip service. "If we just have meetings, that's not going to accomplish anything," he said. "The meetings need to actually produce results."

Gargano said he appreciated concerned RSO members' method of voicing their concerns last week by silently delivering petitions.

"I thought the students were very respectful, and I'm very appreciative of their respect," he said. "I think they made very valid comments." Gargano said he read every petition filed.

Bliss had mixed feelings about last Wednesday's outcome.

"On one level, I commend the Vice Chancellor for responding to issues, but at the same time I'm also disappointed that we had to spend that much time just to get a little accountability and recognition on something that should've taken place in the very beginning," he said.

Changes in RSOs

"Rather than think in the context that all advising must occur only in the Center for Student Development, I am looking to expand it," Gargano said. For example, he envisions student A Cappella groups being matched with advisors from the music department.

However, for many RSOs, pairing them with related departmental staff would contradict their purpose, said Green, who is also the music director of the A Cappella group Vocal Suspects.

None of Vocal Suspects' members are voice majors. "People form an RSO because it's something they like to do, but it's not generally something they're looking to pursue as a career or take so seriously," Green said.

"If we were advised by someone who was closely related to the music department, I feel like for me it would probably take a lot of the fun out of it. We're just people who like to sing."

However, Gargano said these changes would not be forced upon RSOs. "It's just futuristic thinking," he said.

Student's story of hurricane survival

At a Shell across the street, Siragusa's friend kicked bottles of water out of a cooler with his feet, while he and a woman tossed the bottles into the boat.

"We could feel critters in the station, swimming by our feet," he said.

He claims he saw a frog floating on a can of Budweiser. A coincidence to the beer's mid-1990s advertising campaign.

"Even in a time of crisis, [the frog] is still loyal," he jokes.

Finally by late Wednesday afternoon, the firefighters return to the dorms and tell the refugees that another storm is expected in a few days. They are told to leave now.

The refugees spend Wednesday night and most of Thursday sitting around waiting for helicopters to take them to a nearby airport. The group eventually takes the three-mile walk there around sundown.

"It's dark, it's muddy, it's just ch... yucky," Siragusa says of the walk.

They arrive around 1 a.m. Friday and are forced to sleep on the tarmac.

By midday, the refugees are taken by helicopter to a larger airport, the Louis Armstrong International Airport. Upon arrival, they file into a triage unit and receive medical care, including tetanus shots.

The refugees are told they will be boarding a plane to Texas.

"We were just going to go wherever they put us," Siragusa says. "They could've said 'we're taking you to Canada,' and we'd say 'let's do it!'"

While waiting in line for the planes, Siragusa explains, "We get in line. It turns into this big mob and it's no longer a line. We couldn't get out of the mob because we'd never be able to get back in."

No one sleeps that evening.

While waiting in line, he explains, "we were moving two inches an hour - literally."

Eventually, Siragusa and the others board a plane to Austin, Tex. and stay at the city's convention center. Having "a little juice left" in his cell phone, he calls his father in Los Angeles, who instructs him to stay with a friend in Austin. He sleeps at the friend's house for an evening and boards a plane back to California the next day.

As Siragusa reflects on his experience, he mostly credits the Army, Air Force and "average Joe's" who helped him along the way.

"The Air Force that took us from New Orleans to Texas, they were great. Super friendly. They were saying 'We're so glad to help you guys. We're so happy to get you guys out of there.'

"One guy actually asked the serviceman to take a picture of us and he said 'no problem.' The Army and Air Force were really great and helpful," he said.

Amazingly, Siragusa says he and the other members of his makeshift family are planning to return to New Orleans one day.

"We all decided that when we get back, we're gonna have a nice, hot meal. We're all gonna keep in touch."

"Among his criticisms of the response effort, Siragusa says "they should have built a better levee."

He also cites President Bush's administration for not acting quickly enough in the wake of the hurricane.

"I found out an Air Force Base in Kentucky had everything it needed and was just waiting for an okay. They had helicopters and troops.

"If it wasn't for us chasing a stupid war in Iraq, we'd have had the troops we needed," he said.

Painting scandal

spending that would reach more than $1.9 million by the end of the contract in early 2005.

On February 6 of 2003, a UMass official — Robert Tone, manager of contract administration in the procurement department — initiated an email discussion about changing the $10,000 limit from a requirement to an option. The discussion began with a message from Tone to Richard A. Heath, a senior contract officer from the physical plant department.

The following day, Heath forwarded a message to Howard Cleveland, then central shops manager at physical plant and the official in charge of the painting contract, stating that "if you wish to proceed with Amendment #1 to the Paint Contract with Garland Construction to change the wording on the limits of the dollar amount of each job to read: 'Projects estimated to exceed $10,000 may be publicly bid....as opposed to the way it reads now' 'will be publicly bid.'"

Later that afternoon, Heath told Tone that Cleveland had "vehemently agreed" with the proposal. He suggested that Patrick Daly, interim physical plant director, should also approve the changes.

Four days later on Feb. 10, Heath drafted a letter to Edward Orwat, president of Garland Construction, seeking his approval.

Orwat agreed to the changes and renewed the contract for 2003 on Feb. 14, signing an amendment that changed the language of the $10,000 limit from "will be publicly bid" to "may be publicly bid." The form also carried Daly's undated signature, along with the signature of Joyce M. Hatch, vice chancellor for administration and finance at UMass.

State and university officials would not comment in detail on the investigation or the validity of those documents.

MP3s affect hearing

By JP Wilson
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN, Kan. - The box of an MP3 player is covered with information from battery life to the amount of storage on the device. The information fails to state that the device may cause permanent hearing loss.

"MP3 players' users blasting loud music for long amounts of time can cause permanent hearing loss," Cornell Cheung, a Manhattan audiologist, said.

Batteries in MP3 players allow for longer use than previous portable music products and new technology has amplified the sound it can produce. Put these two factors together and MP3 players allow for longer listening at louder volumes, making exposure to dangerous levels more likely.

But, companies producing MP3 players could be liable for the damage their product causes if they don't alert consumers to the dangers in using the product. Although there has not been a case involving MP3 players and hearing loss, William Westerbeke, professor of law at the University of Kansas Law School, said all manufacturers have a legal duty to the consumer when their product could cause harm.

"The manufacturer has a duty to provide a warning that is obvious to the user," Westerbeke said. "The duty is to not hide it. The warning has to be seen and understood."

Neither Apple's iPod nor Sony's Hi-MD Walkman put a warning label on the exterior of the box, although Sony's box contains instructions on how to open the box to avoid danger. If either of these products contain a warning inside, some consumers said they are not made aware of the danger before purchasing the player.

"I sure didn't see any warning. If I would have, I wouldn't have bought it," Montreal Devine, junior in radio and television, said.

Rising gas prices cause a new jump in fuel thievery

By Katie Phillips
Daily Kent Stater

KENT, Ohio - Escalating gas prices are fueling a mini-crime wave and forcing stations to pump up security as motorists fill up their tanks and flee without paying.

As soaring prices hit the $3-a-gallon-mark, first with rising oil costs and then the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the number of drive-offs increased - and customers' frustration did as well.

Gasoline thefts cost the industry $237 million nationwide in 2004, and losses will continue to surge, said Brad Proctor, founder of GasPriceWatch.com, a Web site devoted to helping motorists find the cheapest gas in their area.

"We're scheduled, prior to the $3-price, to lose $500 million [because of drive-offs,] but it's going to be much higher than that," he said. "It's going to go up significantly."

The frustration is often misdirected at the retailers, which is then aimed at gas thefts, said Jeff Lenard, director of communications for the National Association of Convenience Stores.

"Margins are tight; credit card fees are on the rise, and there's an increase in gas theft," Lenard said. "There's frustration all around the pump from those buying the gas, and those selling the gas."

"It's not a good time for either of them."

Retailers are as frustrated as customers, said Linda Casey, spokesperson for Speedway SuperAmerica.

"The important message is the psychological difference in people's minds between shoplifting and drive-offs," Casey said. "But they're both stealing, and they are the same. Those of us who are honest people and pay for our goods end up covering the loss from those who steal it."

Tactics that pump pirates use vary; strategies include covering up license plate numbers to conceal identification, switching license plates, or filling up and placing the nozzle on the ground, leaving the clerk unaware that the motorist is finished pumping.

The fill-and-flee strategy, which is deemed the most common, is considered petty theft and may result in a fine of $1,000, six months in jail and license suspension of six months, said Chief James Peach, of the Kent Police Department.

Gas thefts drive stations to use prepay pumps in order to protect their investment, but it is an idea that was never before pushed in the industry, said Roger Dreycr, president of the Ohio Petroleum Marketers and Convenience Store Association.

As prepay becomes increasingly frequent, retailers see less traffic of customers inside their stores.

"Gas customers will buy less gas when they are required to prepay because they underestimate their gas purchase," Lenard said. "After they've filled up their tanks, they go about their business. They don't want to pull over and go in the store."

Money is not made at the pump but in the store, so gas thefts threaten all involved, Lenard said.

The highest U.S. gas price Thursday was $4.29 in Lanai City, Hawaii, while the lowest price was $2.39 in Baton Rouge, La. The national average Thursday was $2.87, according to GasPriceWatch.com.

Discrimination at Coors' core

Debbie Friedman

If you've been watching the NFL lately, I'm sure you've noticed that Coors Light is now its official beer sponsor. But I wonder how many of you realize what else the Coors company sponsors. If Coors Light, Zima, Killian's Irish Red and or Masters Beer are favorites of yours, I would strongly recommend finding new ones. The Coors Company has built an empire by selling relatively cheap beer to the working and middle class, and then using their profits to fund right wing extremist groups, fundamentalists and causes.

In a book called "The Coors Connection," author Russ Bellant provides evidence linking the Coors family to the Ku Klux Klan, the Neo Nazi's and many right wing think tanks. One such think tank is the Heritage foundation, which was founded by Joe Coors in the 1970's, and whose main purpose is to help push the neo conservative agenda into the American mainstream. The Coors family also funds the Free Congress Foundation, which produces materials speaking out against abortion amongst other things. And on top of being anti-Semitic, racist, sexist and anti-union, The Coors Company has a history of discriminating against gay and lesbian employees. I guess you could say that The Coors Company is an equal opportunity discriminator.

On top of being anti-Semitic, racist, sexist and anti-union, the Coors Company has a history of discriminating against gay and lesbian employees. I guess you could say that the Coors Company is an equal opportunity discriminator.

Luckily during the 1980's a major nationwide boycott was initiated, sinking profits and forcing the company to change its image. In more recent years, The Coors Company has offered money to minority organizations, and gives marriage benefits to employees in same sex relationships. Today, you could argue that The Coors Company genuinely cares about equality and minorities; however, that argument is thinner than their beer.

All that Coors has done is gotten behind a blatant facade created by a clever public relations campaign. For every dollar they indifferently give to minority groups, you can be sure that many more are still funding the same right wing causes. This modern age of acceptance and diversity has led them to find more creative ways to fund their politics with your money. In 1993 they founded the Castle Rock Foundation, which gives $2 million to $3 million to right wing causes each year. This move was a deliberate attempt to separate the Coors name from Coors politics.

It's ironic how many advertisements for Coors Light reach out to minorities, gay and lesbian communities and women, even though their money and power is used to bring down those exact people. Their advertising campaigns have been extremely successful because when you hear Coors Light, I'm sure no one thinks of Bill Coors telling a group of African American businessmen that they don't succeed because they "lack the intellectual capacity." And I'm positive no one thinks of Coors using polygraph operators to make sure their employees were not homosexuals (which was stated in sworn testimony before the senate in 1977.) Instead you're probably picturing giant people playing volleyball in the snowcapped Rocky Mountains or hearing the catchy slogan "Tap the Rockies, Coors Light."

Now I realize that much of this shameful activity was in the past; but can you really forgive or forget such blatant abuse of corporate power? Even though they have changed their ways a little, it was only to expand their market and help rebuild their tarnished image. Don't get me wrong, I understand that all companies have to be concerned with increasing profits, but there is a way to generate profits without generating hate and prejudice.

I'm proud to see that this University does not sell Coors products. However, bars in town do and it is popular among students because we are a highly targeted market. Just take a drive down Route 9, past the Salvation Army, and you'll see their billboard. Watch their new "love train commercial," and you will see a happy, diverse group of young people dancing to a song with the lyrics "people all over the world, join hands." But don't be fooled. You now know where your money goes when you spend it on Coors products. If your love for Coors is making you doubt all of this, take a trip to the W.E.B. DuBois library, go up to the 14th floor and look up call number E 743 B44 1990.

Seeking Chavez for guidance

Jeff Napolitano

"It is practically and ethically inadmissible to sacrifice the human species, madly invoking the use of a socioeconomic model of careening destructive capacity."

- Hugo Chavez, speaking to the U.N. this week.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez spoke at the United Nations in New York this week. The speech he gave was one of the best-received in recent history, and for good reason. He, like George Bush, called for a reorganization of the U.N., but Chavez's suggestions actually make sense. And unlike George Bush - who openly violated the laws of the U.N. in the war against Iraq - Chavez actually has some credibility.

Chavez addressed the blatant failure of the goals of the U.N. to decrease the hunger and increase the level of education in the world. These problems, as he correctly recognized, cannot be resolved within the current framework of the U.N. These problems cannot be resolved within many of the current existing political systems of the world.

The Venezuelan President did not go far enough, however. If the United States continues on its current course of ignoring and vilifying the U.N., not only should the seat of the United Nations be moved out of New York into another country (as Chavez suggested), but the U.S. should be suspended from the U.N. altogether. There is so much evidence of violations of international law by the U.S., including formal rulings by the World Court, that there is not enough space to list it in this entire newspaper.

One suggested place for the relocation of the U.N. was to Jerusalem - to turn that city into an "international city." And while doing this may, in part, deprive the Palestinian people of their rightful home, at the very least it will make the occupation of their homeland more visible and less tolerated by the civilized world. Palestinians have called for the intervention of U.N. peacekeepers to witness and stop blatant acts of aggression against them, so surely having the capital of that organization located in such proximity will lessen the violence in the region.

Most impressive about Chavez's speech, however, was his own call to lessen and change the world's energy policies, in light of the impending environmental doom such policies will lead to. Given that Venezuela is the fifth-largest oil exporter in the world, Chavez's call to recognize global warming (about which Bush still stalls) is especially significant.

Finally, Chavez demonstrated what has haunted the political establishment of the U.S. for over a century: the emergence of a democratic Latin America. If the countries to our south can wrench themselves free of U.S.-supported dictatorships and death squads, strangling economic policies and other such foreign interference, a large part of the U.S. Empire will be lost.

A Central and South America which is allowed to govern itself in a free and democratic fashion will no longer be a honeypot of resources into which the U.S. can freely dip.

A Central and South America which is allowed to govern itself in a free and democratic fashion will no longer be a honeypot of resources into which the U.S. can freely dip. In the past 100 years, the U.S. has intervened for its own political and economic interests in Chile, Brazil, Peru, Guatemala, Colombia, Panama, El Salvador, Cuba, Costa Rica, Ecuador, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay, Bolivia, Nicaragua - again, the list of the death, pain and suffering the U.S. political establishment has incurred in these countries goes on and on.

And it seems like Venezuela is leading the charge in South America (although Brazil's democratic reforms are not far behind). Chavez cited some statistics of success that puts the U.S. to shame: 5.6 percent of the Venezuelan population learned to read in the last year and a half, effectively eliminating illiteracy in the country. Almost 70 percent of the population is receiving free medical attention.

The improvements in his short term of office are extensive and impressive, but mostly so because of the disparity between the wealth of that country and ours. It is difficult to understand how we tolerate our government when almost 20 percent of our population doesn't even have health insurance, compared with 70 percent of Venezuela's population which receives it for free.

I do not mean to single out Chavez as the sole cause for all good done in Venezuela. He is not singularly responsible for the improvements made in his country. What his term in office does demonstrate, however, is the ability of a people to improve itself when the resources of the country are not diverted to enriching the wealthy and kept from the poor who need them.

If anything, Venezuela has provided a proof of concept of the ability for a country, including the poor, to thrive and sustain without wreaking war and poverty on other nations. It is in contrast to the current "current" implies that it does not have to remain the same) unsustainable model of the imperial United States. Venezuela provides, in contrast to our current, the "non-imperial" model of government, which is so desperately needed in the interest of the human race.

Student surveillance still here

Kelan J. Steel Lowney

I try not to be a knee-jerk liberal. For instance, when GEO and various student organizations protested the $65 international student SEVIS fee (framed as a "surveillance fee"), I admit that I was more than a little skeptical. Liberal groups are always quick to cry wolf at the slightest indication that "The Man" is harassing people. A quick Internet search suggested that there was no new information gathered by SEVIS; the fee was levied mainly to pay to shift the information to an on-line database.

Reasonable debate with students affected by the fee, however, convinced me that my Internet sources were - surprise - largely incorrect. The SEVIS requirement did (and does) surveil international students in new and inventive ways. Passing the cost of this heightened surveillance along to the watched students themselves was simply pouring salt in the wound. After an intense effort by students, the cost of the fee was distributed equitably across the campus community. If international students were to be kept under such close watch, we would all shoulder the cost.

It is possible to get UMass to revoke the permission given to the FBI that allows them to use our campus police. But only a sustained student outcry can make this happen.

Time to move on, right? Get back to our schooling?

Maybe not.

Like most Americans, it's easy for me to believe that the truth of any issue exists somewhere between what the conservatives think and what the progressives think. Sure, the modernization of SEVIS may have, inadvertently, increased the surveillance of some students, but how bad could it actually be? It probably wasn't a non-issue, as the UMass Administration made it out to be. But, it probably also wasn't the beginning of a scary police state, as some students made it out to be. The truth, I thought, probably lays somewhere in the middle.

Imagine my surprise when I read in Thursday's Boston Globe that our governor has declared the police state open for business. Addressing the conservative Heritage Foundation, Romney asked, "How many individuals are coming to our state and going to those institutions [universities] who have come from terrorist-sponsored states? Do we know where they are? Are we tracking them?" Apparently, SEVIS was only the first, small part in a widening net of surveillance surrounding international scholars. Copious information on targeted individuals and groups is already being collected and managed at a central clearinghouse in Framingham, cutely named "the fusion center."

Gov. Mitt Romney's newly proposed tactics for "tracking" involves constant "monitoring" and "wiretapping." Forget for a moment that tracking people based on their ethnicity has been proven to be an ineffective way of stopping crime. Forget that it is, in fact, counter-productive, as it makes entire communities resent the government. Forget that it encourages xenophobia. Forget that the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution forbids unreasonable search and seizure. Forget that this myopic surveillance of foreigners blinds us to home-grown terrorists. Forget that "terrorist-sponsored states" is an essentially meaningless, fear-mongering term. Forget all this for a moment. The state and federal governments wouldn't be able to pull this off without a fight - surely one that would be fought more aggressively than that regarding a simple $65 fee. Right?

Wrong.

An investigation by The Nation, a progressive weekly, revealed that the University of Massachusetts Amherst already has an FBI agent on campus. That's right, there is, today right now, an FBI agent here at UMass, assigned to monitor the activities of potential troublemakers. If other universities are any indication, this means, primarily, international students and peace activists. Remember that peace rally on campus last year? Odds are an FBI agent was there gathering information. (By the way, The Nation's profound method of exposition involved calling up the university and simply asking.)

Should this be disconcerting? Perhaps we should all sleep a little safer, knowing that Uncle Sam sent a G-Man to the sleepy west of the woods east, just to look over us. However, the historical misuse of government intelligence, especially such that is gathered on college campuses, makes me more scared than assured. Other universities with this post-9/11 semi-secret FBI presence already have shown examples of student harassment and abuses of authority.

What can be done? As they say, the price of campus liberty is eternal vigilance. It is possible to get UMass to revoke the permission given to the FBI that allows them to use our campus police. But only a sustained student outcry can make this happen.

Even then, the Administration may try another tactic to make life difficult for its non-American students. For instance, you may think that the defeat of the SEVIS fee was the end of that story. After the SEVIS debacle the University wouldn't soon try to put an undue economic burden on international students. But wait. This semester, the International Programs Office has been given the authority to charge international students an additional $2,000 visa processing fee. That's a bit more than $65. GEO has already passed a resolution condemning this new, unnecessary and unlikely burdensome fee.

There's no rest for the weary

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ICE IS PRAISED

Aaron Harman and Tiffany Sannie
Co-Chairs, Student Health Advisory Board

We want to thank the Collegian Editorial staff for bringing ICE (In Case of Emergency) procedures to the attention of the UMass community. We feel this is a critical issue, and an important way to help emergency workers do their jobs and reduce harm that may occur in broader emergencies.

The Student Health Advisory Board (SHAB) will be looking at ways to inform the UMass community about ICE, and to help the campus develop clear and effective emergency response systems. SHAB serves as the official liaison between health services and the student population. We participate in the planning, implementation and evaluation of the campus health-related programs, undertaking specific projects as the need arises. ICE is one such project. If there are members of the UMass community who would like to help out with this important project, please contact us through the Health Education Division of University Health Services at 577-5181 (ask for Tom), or simply come to one of our every other week meetings. Next meeting is Wednesday, Sept. 21, from 2-3 p.m. in UHS 208.

Again, we want to thank The Collegian for printing this editorial, and we invite you to partner with us in our efforts.

REAL LOUISIANA

What really happened in Louisiana? I have heard just about every misleading, erroneous fact from people who have never been to Louisiana since hurricane Katrina. "We (Louisiana/America) do not care about the poor," "Led Zeppelin wrote 'When the Levee Breaks.'" All the news media has done a horrible job reporting the New Orleans side of the disaster. Anybody from Louisiana - me included - can tell you exactly how the flooding of New Orleans is an event, like the assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand, which can only be understood in a historical context.

Contrary to what the media reports, attempts have been made to improve the class divide in New Orleans. In 2002, through the actions of the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Unions (AFL-CIO) the Greater New Orleans Green Party (props to Jason Neville), and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN) the voters of New Orleans approved the nation's first across the board wage increase (including private industry). The $1 wage increase to $6.15 an hour was enough to cause the Small Business Coalition to Save Jobs, the hotel lobbyists and the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce to fight the voter approved ballot measure in the courts where it was struck down by the Louisiana Supreme Court as unconstitutional. In Louisiana, even one of my Bush-supporting friends who lived in the real New Orleans told me that the people of New Orleans needed to be paid more. He considered it a non-issue.

As much as people would like to think, the issue of disadvantage in New Orleans isn't based solely on class. As you have heard, the poor in New Orleans lived in the lowest lying areas. This is also true from where I am from in Baton Rouge. Some of the poorest people in Baton Rouge live in "The Bottoms" where the flood pumps never seem to work when it rains. Of course - you can try organizing the neighborhood like my friends and I did, but they will just ignore your complaints.

In addition, many people in New Orleans live no farther than a mile from where their ancestors from Senegal, Gambia and other Sub-Saharan African countries were brought as slaves. No farther than one mile from where their ancestors met in Congo Square and successfully kept African rhythms alive in America, and no farther from where they created the basis of all popular music today. In short, where you lived in inner city New Orleans was heavily based on where your ancestors lived.

If you want to understand why people still won't leave New Orleans, you wouldn't understand unless you've been there. It's that simple.

If people want to understand poverty distribution in South Louisiana, go to Baton Rouge and survey possibly the worst public schools in America, some of which aren't predominantly black, but are 100 percent black and underachieving, then realize how deep the problem is after considering it is twice as good as New Orleans' school system was. You should also read about the nation's longest desegregation case involving the East Baton Rouge Parish School System. But before you go, decide what side of Baton Rouge you want to stay on, the black (North of Florida Blvd.) or the white side (South of Florida Blvd.).

'WAR' IS SWELL

By JAKE MONTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The opening scene of "Lord of War" is of the ground strewn with bullets and it begins one of the most outstanding openings to a film in recent memory. The camera traces the life of a single bullet, from the factory, to its being shipped, to its being shot out of an automatic weapon. The sequence is a wonderful filmmaking achievement - one of many in this intricately directed work of art.

"Lord of War" is the story of Yuri Orlov, played by Nicolas Cage, and his involvement in the corrupt and dangerous world of dealing contraband, arms in particular. As the film progresses, Yuri gets drawn deeper and deeper into the dangers of his business and rises to the "ranks of the best merchant of death alive." Ethan Hawke is an Interpol agent named Jack Valentine, who lives for the glory of busting men like Yuri. And, of course, there's a girl, played by Bridget Moynahan, whom Yuri gets with a catch: he can't tell her anything about his business. To contrast Yuri's ruthless amorality with some humanity, there's Jared Leto, Yuri's brother. He says to Yuri at one point, "You remind me to be more human."

But one isn't watching the film for a lesson in morality, although that aspect of it is acceptable. What really interests one in the film is the question of how it will all be resolved. Does Yuri go to jail, get killed, give up the trade, become a new man? How will the film provide a satisfactory ending to the life of a character that is so flawed? But in asking these questions we are underestimating the film. We are reducing it to a Hollywood formula that has to appease us in some way. The film is bigger than that; it wants to say something about the arms trade in the world today, and the resolution succeeds in this respect.

The film is written and directed by Andrew Niccol, who wrote "Gattica," "The Truman Show" and "The Terminal." The direction is careful and very intelligent. Most of the film is narration and it blends seamlessly with the action. The film is so technically proficient that while watching these long periods of narration one may feel he or she is watching a work of brilliance. In some ways, it is. The film is very well done. The problem is that when we finally get to see the characters interact, it is so much more interesting than the rest of the film that we realize that the movie is spending too much of its time on these long, narrated segments. The film is short on drama and long on exposition.

Nonetheless, Niccol takes us on a course in how a film should be directed: careful attention to detail and painstaking efforts to communicate a great deal in a small amount of time. There are scenes of stunning achievement. For instance, there is a surrealist's dream sequence where Yuri is taking cocaine and wandering through a remote part of Africa at night. The music combined with the lighting creates a bizarre and eerily affecting world. There is another scene that is one shot of an airplane being dismantled over the course of an entire night. It is in fast-motion and one can't help but wonder how they pulled the shot off.

"Lord of War" is a superbly acted, well-crafted expose of the arms trade. At times it rises to a sort of intoxicating entertainment and, in the end, we feel we've just witnessed a story that will raise the consciousness of all those who see it. Nicolas Cage tells us bleakly, "They say evil prevails when good men fail to act. What they ought to say is evil prevails."

'Cry_Wolf' offers smart scares and refreshing originality

By JEFFREY HOROWITZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It would be unfair to throw "Cry Wolf" into the slasher category. This is a far more ambitious film and it succeeds on a superior level. The title would lead us to believe it's a predictably banal movie about lying. Though it has a lot to do with lying, that's not what it's really about. It's more about bored rich kids with little ambition that are expected to inhabit the world and can, therefore do nothing better than participate in destructive behavior until they do. I went to one of those private schools where teachers and parents told us the world would inevitably be ours whether we wanted it or not. That's a lot of pressure to live up to. Kids either overworked themselves trying to live up to it or gave up and started trouble. I saw those kinds of troublemakers every day. They were the ones we had the assemblies about. As a film about disturbed and troubled youths "Cry Wolf" has got it and it's a bit scary to realize how far it can go.

Owen Matthews (Julian Morris) is new to his illustrious private boarding school. His roommate, Tom (Jared Padalecki,) brings him to a midnight meeting where his soon to be clique will invite him to play a tricky and deceptive game to see who can out-lie the rest of the gang. As it turns out, Owen is the best of the liars and wins the game. Here he meets Dodger (Lindy Booth,) a seductive and attractive little red head that seems to suggest trouble in her every expression. She takes a liking to Owen and, naturally, he cannot resist.

Dodger comes up with the idea to take their midnight lying game a little bit further. What if they invented a killer just to rile things up? Striking panic into the parents and students and suspicion into the faculty could be fun. The idea emerges after a student is violently killed. The clique of troublemakers spread an e-mail that it's actually a serial killer and more victims are to come. What's so disturbing is not how revolted we are by their actions but how exciting it seems to do something so awful, how tempting it would be to join in.

They create a list of victims the killer takes and they even assign the killer an orange ski mask, army fatigues and a vicious looking hunting knife. They appoint him the grizzly name, "The Wolf." The table is set for panic and his journalism teacher, Rich (Jon Bon Jovi actually very good here.) warns him that he is playing with fire.

Soon enough, in accordance with Rich's warning, the killer

Reese Witherspoon's latest film not much like 'Heaven'

By JEFFREY HOROWITZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Reese Witherspoon is a welcome presence in movies of this kind. It's her familiar territory to walk this path, so from the start of her new film, "Just Like Heaven," she is at home with this material. But she deserves better then the kind of material she gets stuck with here. "Just Like Heaven" is an excruciatingly lame retread of the 1990 hit, "Ghost." That was about a ghost stuck in this world by the love he had for his girlfriend. This is also about a ghost stuck in this world, only so that she can fall in love with a man she has never before met. That means lots of scenes where our living protagonist talks to himself, lots more scenes of our ghostly antagonist walking through walls and coffee tables, and even a couple of scenes where the two bodies merge in a blatant lift from its predecessor.

I'm excluding its incredibly corny screenplay. There's a scene toward the end where a character looks confused at someone she once loved and says, "Where have I seen you before," to which he replies, "Maybe you've seen me in your dreams." To which I replied by burying my head in my hands and shaking my head in disbelief. It was not until I reached the halfway point that the film turned offensive. It took on the Terri Schiavo political issue, a subject way too heavy for a romantic comedy and way too delicate for the type of shameless manipulation this movie inflicts.

Reese Witherspoon plays Eliza-beth Masterson, a dedicated doctor that pulls twenty six hour stretches in her hospital to seal a permanent position. Granted, she looks surprisingly good for someone without sleep and also drives amazingly well under the circumstances. In fact, the script forces her to drop something in order to get her eyes off the road long enough to drive into a truck. It's always the trucks that get the job done.

Meanwhile, a depressed couch potato named David (Mark Ruffalo) is seen renting out her apartment. This can only mean the worst, for two reasons. The first, if someone else gets your apartment you probably aren't coming back. The second, that means you shouldn't be sporadically appearing in the apartment and scaring the tenant.

On several occasions she haunts the apartment and harasses David, claiming he's broken into her apartment and she wants him out. After both realizing that he is the only one that can see her, they go on an inquiry to find out who she was and what happened. It must, as it does in "Ghost," lead to a paranormal psychic. He's played in an annoying performance by Napoleon Dynamite. Trust me, that will be his name from now on. He must be here, if not in another pointless role, because "Napoleon Dynamite" was a hit and a Napoleon appearance will attract younger audiences.

There is also an obligatory life saving scene where some guy keels over and only the ghost can save him, but David must make the incision, which had me longing for a mouth-to-mouth cliché. Sitting through this was expected, as were scenes where the ghost has to listen to friends reminisce about what a workaholic she was and about her limited dating life.

What was shockingly unexpected was the plot development about whether a patient lying in a three month coma should be taken off life support. It is up to David and Elizabeth to save the patient. Though it fits nicely into the plot, it is a very heavy theme to stick in the middle of a ghost-man romance. Worse yet, in the closing moments they try to milk the life saving attempt for laughs. This material is in very poor taste. The romance and the ghost story being cheesy, that's allowed; the controversial political commentary is unwelcome and uncomfortable, specifically in this kind of movie. When it ended on that sappy note that hopes to inspire a smile, I was stuck mulling over the outrageous political accusations in shock.

Ruffalo and Witherspoon imitate "Ghost" in "Just Like Heaven"

'Junebug' suffers from sitcom plot devices and film clichès

By PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A well-cultured and well-mannered art dealer with a British accent has traveled the world in search of avant-garde, modern paintings. One quest for such a piece leads her to the hometown of the family of her new husband in small-town North Carolina. She and her husband stay at the family's residence, which leads to a breakdown of the family's structure. She feels the need to find ways for them to reach common ground and a truce.

The basic plot of Phil Morrison's "Junebug" is vaguely reminiscent of a situation comedy, what with its clashing of upper-class versus down-south cultures, no? And avant-garde filmmakers, as a rule, wish to avoid having their work compared to a sitcom. (In fact, if you truly wish to insult a filmmaker's Sundance entry, say it reminded you of a sitcom. There's nothing harsher.) Indeed, much of the humor derives from the problems inherent with the fish out of water (Embeth Davidtz) attempting to adapt to her surroundings.

The family is a happy medium between the two main southern stereotypes: wicker furniture southern hospitality and chew-spitting white trash. While the film does not seem to make too much of an effort to refrain from easy jokes that play off these stereotypes, it works to ensure the characters are three-dimensional. Besides Madeline, the art dealer, and her husband George, there's his father, who registers only slight bemusement upon meeting his new daughter-in-law. George's mother, who is more bemused; his brother Johnny, who bears a serious grudge against him and harbors a thinly veiled attraction to Madeline; and George's heavily pregnant wife, Ashley, a southern belle who is in awe of Madeline's culture. In addition to the family, there is the odd painter seeking Madeline's services, a phallus-obsessed artist who depicts unconventional and quasi-offensive visions of the Civil War.

The film has very little structure, and the only subplot that seems to tug the film along is Ashley's pregnancy. One of the film's main events is the birth of her child, as could be expected - the unspoken rules of cinema dictate that if you have a pregnant woman in your film, she must have given birth by the movie's end. My reluctance to reveal plot spoilers forbids me to note what happens next. The other major plot concerns the relationship of Madeline and Johnny, which plays out in scenes so awkward they could cause more squeamish viewers to cringe. Of course, those particular viewers would probably already be cringing after scenes of the painter proudly displaying his questionable masterpiece and an anecdote involving a tick. Couples on a first date would be ill-advised to see this film.

Just as "Junebug" lacks a tangible structure, it does not have a solid ending. There are no major epiphanies, no drastic changes in the family's dynamics, no altered lives, and no morals learned. The movie is a simple carnival ride of easy gags, simple plot devices and opportunities to quietly giggle at the quirks of both cultures that are clashing. It is obvious that Morrison and screenwriter Angus MacLachlan were striving for a film that playfully and warmly reminds the audiences of the ties that bind a family, no matter the apparent roadblocks, and they have succeeded, albeit marginally.

It's impossible to deny the film has heart, and the willingness to confront family-related problems that are difficult to comfortably discuss. But even with this courage that would logically provide this film with grit, "Junebug" never seems to challenge the audience, only guide it passively along while resolutely refusing to cause any disruptions. Were this film of better quality, it would goad the viewer into entering the world of Madeline and her in-laws, interacting with their relationships and struggling along with them. Alas, the film just lies there, as if cynically telling the viewer he or she can either enjoy it like it is, or leave for all it cares.

'Wolf' delivers a smart horror flick gets the e-mail and decides to turn the liars into the victims. Owen starts getting threatening instant messages. Tom's side of the room is trashed. The kids get someone's bloody tongue stud and a message reading, "I ate your friend." Is the killer real? Maybe it's just one or more of the kids tormenting the others. If it is the killer, what is his identity and is it relevant to the plot? The final revelation is very relevant to the plot and as much as you think you know it, you most definitely do not. It changes three times in the final moments.

What's very interesting is the way the accusations fly and how none of the kids can trust one another because everyone lies. These kids think up some pretty creative plans and they somehow always stay a step ahead of one another and we are right there with each of them, hanging on as their plans and accusations are slung into action as instantly as that original e-mail.

There are not as many horror movie clichès as one would expect. There's even a nice little scene where someone calls the police for help and they won't come because of the large amount of prank calls.

Very smart, too, how their lives go spinning out of control with their credibility and we must watch as their destruction backfires on them many times over. As for those suspense filled scenes where the ski mask wearing killer treks after the kids with hunting knife in hand, they actually worked for scares. That means I was already involved by the time the killer or somebody posing as the killer appeared, and that I was. The movie is so involving that it sucks you into its characters' dilemmas in a world where a slasher-victim chase can, once again, actually work.

Mixed results for UM cross-country teams

By Amir Norman
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's and women's cross-country teams had mixed results on Saturday during their respective meets at Amherst College.

The Minutemen stuck just to the right pace to take home a win while the Minutewomen finished in third place in their race.

Six Minutemen finished in the top-10, as UMass won the meet with 27 points, followed by Maine with 35 points and Vermont with 70 points.

"We knew [Maine] was strong up front, but I knew they had weakness in their fifth, sixth and seventh runners," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

Sophomore Nils Fischer, who took second, led the Minutemen for the second race this season, finishing the eight kilometer course in 26:32.

"I felt strong; I think our team was strong," Fischer said.

Freshman Jesse Regnier and Sean Corbett came in fourth and fifth, respectively, which gave UMass an edge over Maine, which had runners finish first, third and sixth. Black Bear Kirby Davis won the meet in 25:49.

O'Brien was more pleased with this meet than last week's at Dartmouth, where the Minutemen placed fourth in a nine-team field.

"It was two different races for two reasons," O'Brien said. "Last week's race, some of our kids suffer a little bit, and in the second part of the race we fell apart."

Freshman Mathew Weissinger and senior Ryan Corbett sealed the victory for UMass coming in seventh and ninth, respectively. A pack of UMass runners sealed the victory by finishing 10th, 11th and 12th to keep the eight-point lead over Maine.

"This meet we had made a plan that we would stay off the opening pace so that we could finish stronger, and so we held back a little bit until the three-mile mark and ran harder at the 3 mile mark."

For the Minutewomen, sophomore Christina Derosa took second place to lead the Minutewomen. However, Vermont won the overall meet with 28 points, followed by Maine with 48 and UMass coming in third with 49.

Heather Jovanelli of Maine was the top individual finisher, winning the meet in 18:59, just eight seconds ahead of DeRosa.

"I wasn't very happy last weekend at Dartmouth," Minutewoman coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I feel that they were just running not racing. And I think that there was a huge difference today. It was no comparison."

"Unfortunately, we were one point behind Maine," LaFreniere said. "But they raced."

DeRosa led the Minutewomen for the ninth consecutive race of her career with her second-place effort on the five-kilometer course. She finished in the top-five for the fourth time in her career.

"DeRosa did a fantastic job," LaFreniere said. "Amanda Bodette wasn't even in the top-seven last year, so she has made a tremendous improvement."

Bodette earned her first career top-10 finish, taking 10th as the second UMass runner to cross the finish line. Bodette led a pack of Minutewomen finishing in the top-15, but they could not close the gap between a group of Vermont and Maine runners to cut into the lead.

Sophomore Ashley Davidson and juniors Cuisle Kierans and Erin O'Donnell rounded out the top-five runners for UMass.

"I think they realize now what racing is all about," LaFreniere said. "They need to train how they were racing today... and I think they get that now."

The Minutemen and Minutewomen will break for two weeks before heading to the prestigious Paul Short Invitational hosted by Lehigh University on Oct. 1.

"We going to do our best," said Fischer, who expects to have a more competitive race at the invitational. "Keep it together, and good things will happen."

nents, and to set the tempo for the rest of the season. Our team is young, and these games help us to gain experience for later in the season," Shea said.

Youth has certainly been an asset to the Minutewomen, as freshmen Katelyn Orlando and Mary Shea have been key contributors in the team's victories, and that's no surprise to coach Shea.

"Every player is brought in for a specific reason, and we expect them to contribute right away and do the little things to help us win games," Shea said.

The team will hope to see more success from its young players this week as they host the Terriers of Boston University on Tuesday.

and Stapleton. They did just that.

In yesterday's game neither Murphy nor Stapleton were able to even get a shot on net. The Minuteman defenders effectively stayed on the two and made them a non-factor all game.

Neither, however, slipped under the Maroon and White's radar as sophomore defender Kenneth Cook and the rest of UMass' defense was ready for the challenge.

"We knew [Murphy and Stapleton] could finish," Cook said. "We had to defend as a team and get all the guys behind the ball. They were a real physical team."

Consistently throughout this season Koch has stated that the key for the Minutemen's success was for them to keep their team shape. As of Sunday, nothing had changed in the coach's eyes.

"As a team we had to stay compact and make sure it was hard for them to find [Murphy] in open spaces," Koch said. "And I thought everybody did a good job."

The win was big for a UMass team that entered the game in the midst of an early season skid that began to turn around with a 2-1 overtime win over Cornell on Friday.

However, the Minutemen knew that the weekend would not have been a total success without a victory over Navy on Sunday.

"We knew they were a good team," Cook said. "This was a big weekend for us. We're starting to gel as a team and starting to learn what's working for us."

Koch had nothing but high praises for his team after the win over the Midshipmen.

"Our guys played well," Koch said. "Especially in the first half we moved the ball quickly which made it hard for them to get started. I think they were a little off today."

The Minuteman defense will be tested again on Wednesday as the team travels to Durham to play the undefeated New Hampshire Wildcats (4-0-1)

Minutewomen look to finish better against their opponents

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

While soccer is played in halves, itis the final third that has been a hindrance lately for the Massachusetts women's soccer team.

That's not to say the effort isn't there, though, because it is. It's not the execution that's been doing them in; it's just the finishing off part that has spelled trouble.

Take last Friday's game up in Worcester, for instance, when they took on a Holy Cross team that has never beaten them since they first started meeting in 1986. After Britt Canfield made a beautiful cross shot in the first minute of the game, which forward Jenny Roehrig followed up with a goal on the rebound, one had the feeling the Maroon and White were going to rip the game wide open.

Instead, they held on to their slim lead with white knuckles.

Whether it was the midfield play, a high amount of substitutions from Holy Cross or just the dripping, drizzling rain, the Minutewomen were unable to get anything going. That includes the upstart senior Adair Blyler, finally back after sitting out for nearly a month with mononucleosis, who provided some spark in the second half but to no end result.

Where we didn't do well, and where they (Holy Cross) didn't do well, was the final third, UMass coach Jim Rudy said following the match on Friday. We had things that were on, we had people that were open, we just couldn't deliver the final pass to spring our people and to get an open bid to finish, and end that game, which is a bit frustrating.

More of the same happened yesterday against the Vermont Catamounts, but the Minutewomen were unable to escape this time with a win.

Once again, UMass was the first to strike, this time with six minutes to go in the first half when Canfield put on another display of speed, juking past the goalie on the right to go up 1-0.

Two quick UVM goals before the close of the first half later, the tide had turned and UMass was unable to respond. This, despite taking 23 shots to the Catamounts' seven, 12 corner kicks to UVM's four (one on which they converted), and 10 shots on goal to their five.

Not to be forgotten that coming into yesterday's game, opponents were averaging five goals per game on the Catamounts, including an 8-2 rout by Rhode Island two days prior.

Sometimes you got to take a lot of lumps before you do well, Vermont coach Kerry Dzieczkaniec said.

What are we doing differently? Weire learning our lessons, and really making prugress as a team.

She couldn't have said it any better. In fact, the same scenario could be said about these very same Minutewomen. If they learn from their wrongdoings, could they too turn the corner on these collapses?

"I guess with time, it will come together," Rudy said. Let's hope so, or else it'll be a long season.

What's up with that?

a very, very solid effort."

Coen, who finished the day going 14-of-20 for 213 yards and one touchdown, showed what he could do following a pass interception by free safety Shannon James towards the end of the first quarter.

With the Maroon and White calling six rushing plays in a row, three by Baylark and two by senior R.J. Cobbs, Coen was called upon on a 3rd down and goal on Albany's eight.

Buying time, Coen threw a strike down the middle, hitting redshirt sophomore Rasheed Rancher in stride, and increasing the lead to 14 points.

"It always helps when we establish the running game, that's always our key and it always takes pressure off anything else you're going to do," Coen said. "Definitely working out of the huddle was a little bit more calm, I think we got to manage the game a little better."

Aside from the solid play of UMass' newest signal-caller, the game on Saturday resulted in something unusual and rare - three safeties. The first came following a punt by junior punter Christian Koegel, which bounce out-of-bounds and gave the Great Danes possession on their own three yard line.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Raunny Rosario powers through a group of defenders during UMass' 40-0 win on Saturday. Rosario rushed for 15 yards on three carries.

After two unsuccessful plays, redshirt junior defensive linemen John Hatchell recorded the game's first safety, dragging Albany quarterback Dani Bocanegra to the ground in the endzone.

The following two safeties occurred from two botched snaps by the Albany long-snapper - the first soaring over the head of punter Marc Pallozi and the third quarter and the second coming after another high snap just under five minutes later.

The offensive line paved the way for Baylark (18 attempts, 83 yds., one TD) and Cobbs (14 attempts, 73 yds., two TDs) to keep the Albany defense on its heals.

"I've got to give a lot of credit to my offensive line of course, they put in good work this week," Cobbs said.

Defense gets it done for UM

"They've got a great defensive unit," Ford said. "They're smothering ... sheer team speed. [Brown] gives you a lot of different looks and comes at you a lot of different ways. They've got some great athletes, and they run very, very well."

Standing out early on for the Minutemen has been redshirt junior strong safety James Ihedigbo, who has been causing quarterbacks fits each game.

Entering this season with no career sacks, the Amherst native recorded two in each of UMass' first two games and was in the middle of a couple more last night, getting credit for .5 sacks.

"A year ago, we ran a lot of blitzes through his window, and he didn't have a sack," Brown said. "He had a lot of near-sacks, but he never really had a sack. He is finishing what he starts now.

"Interchangeably playing Brandon Smith and [Shannon] James, and we played Tracy Belton, [Brandon] Freeman and Stevie Costello; we interchanged those guys, Especially on humid nights like [Saturday], I think keeping those guys fresh keeps them playing at a high tempo for 60 minutes."

With all 22 players on last year's two-deep charts returning this season, plus the emergence of freshman cornerback Sean Smalls and the return of redshirt senior cornerback Steve Costello, Brown has been able to keep a steady rotation on and off the field with his defensive backs to keep the group from tiring and playing at a high rate of speed, a luxury very few teams have.

"We didn't make any mistakes," First-Team All-American free safety Shannon James said. "We ran around and flew to the ball. Everyone contributed and played fast."

James picked off his 18th career pass - which leads all active Division I players - in the first quarter Saturday, tying a UMass program record in the process.

James made it clear that his defensive unit had one specific goal against Albany, though, and that goal didn't involve individual accolades.

"That is why we lost [to Colgate on Sept. 10]. We didn't shut them out. I wanted to make sure tonight that it wouldn't be our fault, and we got it done."

Men's soccer grabs two wins

ing spectacular, nothing fancy."

Redshirt freshman Zach Simmons tallied the first shutout of his young career, making some clutch saves with acrobatic dives and leaps. Simmons is learning the ropes the hard way and taking some abuse early in the season. He took a fall in the second half around the 18:00 mark when a ball was lofted towards the goal and he - along with a Navy forward - went up to control it at the same time.

Simmons jumped a little higher and was low bridged, coming down awkwardly on his side. He popped up right away, but not before a few tense moments were had on the UMass sideline.

Friday's match up with Cornell was looking bleak to start the game, and the forecast of a loss in the home opener was not a pleasant one for Koch and company.

But the Minutemen were a different team in the second half and came out firing against Cornell goalie Steve Lesser, taking the game 2-1 in overtime on a rebound goal by freshmen Mike Desantis, off of a shot by freshmen Prince Ofosu.

The Big Red cracked the scoreboard first with a goal at the 21:45 mark in the first half, when a centering pass found the left leg of Cornell forward David Browning, who promptly put it in the top corner to give them the 1-0 lead over the Minutemen.

That is the way the first half ended, with UMass down 1-0 nothing and down in spirit. But an inspired team showed up in the second half, and it took a quality performance to turn it around, something that the Minutemen were up for.

"I think they understood more what they had to do and they did it," Koch said after the win. "And we didn't do it in the first half. I don't know where the heck they were but they showed up in the second half.

"And they showed up in the last fifteen minutes of the first half, so I thought from that point on we started to control more of the game and get our composure."

The Minutemen tied the game at the 13:35 mark in the second half: with time running out and urgency rising, Ofosu sprung free on a breakaway trailed by Lemire; Ofosu's shot deflected off the goalie and set up a rebound in front of the net for a streaking Lemire, who put it in to tie the game.

The overtime period was more Minuteman intensity, as UMass kept putting pressure on the Cornell defense.

Simmons made a tough save to keep the Minutemen alive, and after a missed opportunity with a corner kick, Ofosu broke free on a breakaway again: he was dribbling up the left side with a Big Red defender on his back, when he kicked the ball at the goal, the rebound sailed to the other side of the net where - not unlike Lemire's goal earlier - Desantis was waiting and put home the game winner.

"I was making my run near-post and Prince (Ofosu) just absolutely burned some kid out in the corner," an elated Desantis said. "I figured the ball would go through so I just, kind of, kept running and waited for a rebound and the (Cornell goalie) coughed it up and I just put it in."

Both UMass goals were triggered by an explosive Ofosu, a relentless physical player and a worthy compliment to Bullen in the forward spot.

"He's very strong and he shields the ball as well as anybody," Koch said of Ofosu. "Those are real positives. He did a real good job. We're real pleased with the way he's been playing. He's been a real nice addition to the team."

After the score was knotted at 1-1 in the second half, the Minutemen had some great opportunities to end the game before the overtime period. A few shots were from point blank range with the back of the net showing, but UMass couldn't put the game away. It was something that concerned Koch when the outcome of the game was uncertain.

"You have to put those chances away and to be honest we missed them," he said. "We missed them against Maine. We missed a couple of chances against Hartford. You can't keep missing those opportunities because they'll come back to haunt you."

When Desantis knocked the rebound home and clinched the win in UMass' home opener, 26 jubilant soccer players stormed the field, yelling and screaming like they had won the World Cup.

It was an important win for the Minutemen, and despite a lackluster first half and a couple of could-have-been game-winners sailing wide of the net, an evercritical Koch only had one thing to say:

"I got no complaints."

Minutemen silences opponent

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team knew entering their game on Sunday that Navy had a great offense. They knew that the key to victory would be tough defense. The question was, however, could they execute?

UMass (3-3) silenced all speculation as it shut out the Midshipmen (4-2) by a count of 2-0 in front of 363 at Rudd Field. Yesterday's game was the first time that Navy (4-2) has been shut out this season.

As a whole, Navy was never able to get their offense moving. The whole game they were only able to get eight shots off, two of which were saved by UMass freshman goalkeeper Zach Simmons.

"[Navy] came out a little slower than I thought they would," UMass coach Sam Koch said after the game. "I don't know if they were tired from their game on Friday or just that they've been on the road a lot."

The Minutemen turned in their finest defensive performance of the season while improving their record to .500 for the first time since September 5th when they defeated Michigan 2-1.

Entering the game sophomore J.P. Murphy and junior Carter Stapleton were leaders of a Navy offense that had previously outscored their opponents 13-3 this season.

Murphy upped his season point total to nine on Friday afternoon when he scored his fourth goal of the season in just five games.

Just behind Murphy in points for the Midshipmen was Stapleton with seven. The midfielder has proved to be Navy's main table setter as he leads the team with three assists to go along with two goals on the season.

UMass knew that in order to beat Navy they needed to shutdown the tandem of Murphy

Canfield again got by Kissock but had a poor angle and her shot went wide.

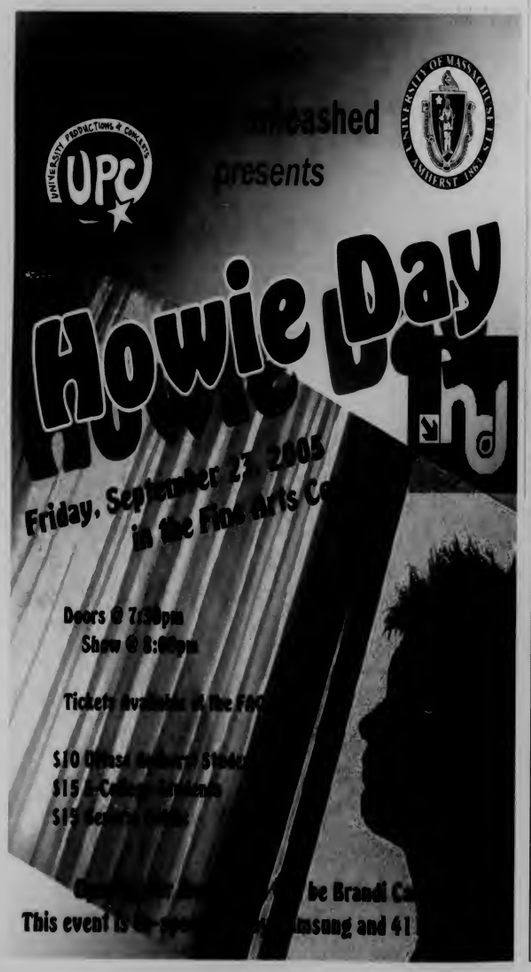
As the missed chances continued to mount, Rudy realized that his team was letting a feisty Vermont squad hang around.

"When it was 1-0 and we had missed a lot of good chances, I just had a feeling that I hoped it wouldn't come back to haunt us," Rudy said. "We could have been walking off this field with a 7-2 win just as easily."

Friday's game at Holy Cross (2-6) was similar to the Vermont game, with the major exception that UMass was able to pull out a victory.

As with the Vermont game, UMass got off to a quick start against Holy Cross, scoring just 1:37 into the game.

Roehrig provided the goal, as she shot a low laser past the helpless goalie. Canfield was credited with the assist, as the initial shot was deflected and the rebound was directed to Roehrig in front.



Once again UMass had chances to add to its lead, but were unable to do so, and as the game progressed the Crusaders stepped up their play and kept the game close.

"I don't think they were ready to meet our intensity," Rudy said. "And 15 minutes in when we didn't get the second and third goals, which were so close, I think they realized that they had to put more into it."

After the early goal, both teams struggled to score, as the wet conditions and small field stifled the offenses.

Goalie Kristin Walker also helped to keep the Crusaders at bay with strong play between the pipes, as she recorded her third shutout of the season.

"It wasn't pretty but I'll take the win," Rudy said. "In years past we may not have gotten the win. I don't think we played as technically as we could have, and I think the field had something to do with it, and Holy Cross had something to do with it. But I'm just happy to get a W."

With a pumped up crowd of 10,177 filling the bleacher seats of Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, and a looming stormy sky above, the Massachusetts football team (2-1, 1-0 Atlantic 10) was able to generate more than enough thunder on Saturday night.

The Minutemen blew out visiting Albany 40-0 under the lights in the first contest played at McGuirk this season and did so with a stifling defense and a consistent offense. UMass will host another night game against Rhode Island on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium, beginning at 6 p.m.

After the Great Danes were unable to do anything with its opening drive, the Minutemen did not waste any time.

Beginning the drive at its own 36 yard line, junior tailback Steve Baylark carried the ball for 15 yards into Albany territory. Redshirt freshman Liam Coen then threw a screen pass to receiver Brandon London in the flat, setting up the screen. After making one Albany defender miss, London bulled over a few more, and was finally taken down after a gain of 17 yards.

Two plays later, UMass tried a similar screen pass, this time to receiver J.J. Moore, who used decent blocking by his teammates and went 22-yards down the left sideline after making the catch at Albany's 23 yard line.

With only a little under six minutes into the game, Baylark put the Minutemen on top, driving the ball in from one yard out and giving UMass a lead it would never relinquish.

UMass coach Don Brown was pleased with the work of Coen, who made his debut as a starter on Saturday.

"[Coen] really made no mistakes in terms of putting our defense and our team in bad situations," Brown said. "To be quite honest with you, I didn't know quite how he was going to react, but he gave us

Defense keeps Albany at bay

No one has questioned the talent, the determination or the iron will of the defense of the Massachusetts football team (2-1 1-0 Atlantic 10).

The backbone of Don Brown's team was spectacular during a tough 6-5 season last year, and this year's group is already starting to trump what it was able to do in 2004.

Through the first three games of the season, the defense has allowed a total of nine points, coming from a one-yard run by Richmond quarterback Stacy Tutt and a 36-yard field goal off the foot of Colgate's Mike Rava.

Otherwise, opposing offenses have had very little success against the Minutemen, including Albany, which was shut out 40-0 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday night.

And the defense has been timely, too. They kept Richmond off the board by keeping the dangerous Tutt in check throughout the night.

They kept Colgate's offense lifeless after the Raider defense came up with two touchdowns of their own, and the Minuteman offense had its back against the wall.

In its most recent test, UMass registered a NCAA Division I-AA record three safeties, recorded a school record by only allowing 31yards of total offense and allowed -37 rushing yards, the fewest allowed by the Minutemen since Nov. 2, 1963, when the defense set a school record after allowing -58 rushing yards against Vermont.

"We're playing at a very solid level," Brown said. "To be quite honest, I expected us to handle the Albany offense, but I didn't expect us overwhelm them the way we did."

Albany coach Bob Ford was so stymied by UMass' defense that he even elected to quick-kick on third down from his own 20-yard line with the Great Danes trailing 14-0 in the second quarter.

Minutemen win two

Rudd Field was good to the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-3-0) this weekend, as it returned home for the first time this season to face Cornell and Navy in a two-game home stand, defeating both teams (2-1 over Cornell, 2-0 over Navy).

The Midshipmen came into Saturday's match up with a 4-1-0 record and a potent offense featuring two players with seven points on the season already.

However, the UMass defense was up to the challenge as it blanked Navy en route to its third win of the season, getting the Minutemen back to the .500 mark.

After the 2-1 comeback win over Cornell on Friday, UMass took the momentum into yesterday's game and struck first with a goal by sophomore Kenneth Cook at the 21:09 mark in the first half.

After a foul on the Midshipmen on the right side of the field about 10 yards from the net, a free kick by sophomore Douglas Rappaport curled towards the goal and Cook deflected it past the Navy goalie.

Cook's shot never hit the back of the net; once it was past the diving goalie, a Navy defender jumped up and kicked the ball towards midfield. There was a momentary pause and then came the call from the sideline official, saying that the ball had crossed the line into the net.

It gave UMass the early 1-0 lead that it would build on in the second half.

The second goal came in the 62nd minute when sophomore Matt Lemire took a header from senior Tim Kitchell and buried it in the back of the net for his third goal of the season. The assist was credited to Kitchell and freshmen Nick Kelly who inbounded the ball from the sideline.

On Lemire's goal, the ball never touched the ground: Kelly's pass from the sideline went directly to Kitchell, who headed it backwards towards the net; Lemire then took the ball in mid air and ripped it past the goalie.

For an offense that has been missing its leading scorer - senior captain Oral Bullen (two goals, one assist on the season) - it was a satisfying effort.

"You rely on Oral (Bullen) so much that some of the other guys sit back," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Without him out there other people have to step up. That was a real positive I think for us. We'd much rather have Oral in there but we were glad with the way the guys were able to handle it.

"We're finding the right combination on the field I think," he added. "Guys are playing well. The guys that are out there now have a little better understanding. We're eliminating some of our dumb mistakes that we were making in the early games."

Kitchell has been shouldering the load for a depleted senior class due to injuries, and - showing confidence in the game plan - helped the UMass defense hold a tough opponent to a scoreless afternoon.

"It's the military. We knew they were going to be physical," Kitchell said of his opponent. "Were a pretty strong team as it is and we came into the game expecting a strong physical attack. We knew they were going to be direct; they were going to go straight towards our goal, noth-

UMass splits weekend games

By DAN DUGGAN

The theme of the weekend for the Massachusetts women's soccer team was missed opportunities.

UMass (3-3-1) split two games this weekend, winning on Friday 1-0 at Holy Cross and losing yesterday at home to Vermont 2-1, but in each game UMass had numerous chances to put more goals on the board and came up empty.

"We had a lot of really good chances [against Vermont] - just like at Holy Cross - that we squandered because the final ball wasn't good enough," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We probably squandered 40 scoring chances this weekend. We got out of it okay with Holy Cross because we kept the lead the whole game, but against Vermont we got down and we couldn't pull back."

Yesterday's loss to Vermont (2-6) marked the first loss at Rudd field for the Minutewomen this season, although it seemed early on that they were on their way to their third home win.

UMass had two good scoring opportunities early, but two blasts from close range by midfielder Jenny Roehrig were turned away by goalkeeper Laura Kissock. Most of the first half was played in Vermont's end of the field as UMass dominated the Catamounts.

UMass finally broke through on a goal by forward Britt Canfield with 6:13 remaining in the first half.

Roehrig set up the goal with a pass between two defenders, and Canfield ran down the ball, went around the drawn-out goalie and deposited the ball in the empty net.

The goal was the second of the season for Canfield, who now leads the team with seven points.

It appeared that UMass was on its way to a lopsided win, something the Catamounts have been on the losing side of many times this season, as they had been outscored 33-11 in their first seven games.

But UVM responded quickly to UMass' goal, scoring twice before halftime. The first goal came less than two minutes after Canfield's goal, as a corner kick that was mishandled by UMass goalie Kristin Walker resulted in an Amy Cochran goal.

Cochran added her second goal three minutes later, heading in a beautiful cross from Lexie Kaknes with 1:11 remaining in the half.

UMass continued to dominate in the second half, but was unable to net the equalizer.

Ten minutes into the half, midfielder Lindsey Bellini had a shot from pointblank blocked and forward Caitlin Footit's rebound shot sailed high.

The Minute-women's best bid at tying the game came with just under four minutes remaining, as

Streak ends for field hockey

Riding the momentum of last weekend's wins, the Massachusetts field hockey team made a weekend road trip to New Hampshire and Maine, hoping to achieve a .500 record for the first time this season. The Minutewomen (3-5) fell just one goal short as they lost to Maine 2-1 Sunday after defeating New Hampshire 3-2 in overtime on Saturday. The team had high hopes coming into the season after its success in 2004, but stumbled early, losing their first four games.

Saturday at Memorial Field the Minutewomen took on the Wildcats of UNH (3-5) in what turned out to be a very close contest. Despite an early score by UMass' Gina Sanders from Katelyn Orlando, it appeared the Wildcats were in control.

"New Hampshire out-played us for most of the first half," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "We were not composed and they took advantage of it."

However, the minutewomen kept the game close, only allowing their opponents to score once, a goal by MacKenzie Stuart through just over nine minutes of play, leaving the score tied at halftime. UMass would take the lead again in the second half with a goal by Katelyn Woolfrey on a penalty corner from Patricia Borneo and Kara Murphey. The Wildcats once again answered with a score by Brittany Jacobs, and the game went to overtime, the first overtime game for UMass this season.

It was ended by freshman Mary Shea with an unassisted goal, her second of the season. With their third straight win, the Minutewomen seemed to have pulled it together after a shaky first four games.

"Once we executed our game plan and knew how we could be successful, we were able to control the play," Shea added. "There was plenty of praise to go around after the game. Erin Parker demonstrated a lot of poise and played very experienced when she set up the final play. Becky Letourneau also played her best game of the season in goal. You can see the difference in the defenders in front of her. They play with a lot more confidence and help to set up the play."

Unfortunately, that confidence did not carry over the state line into Maine.

On Sunday, the team traveled to Orono to take on the Black Bears of Maine (5-3). The game had a promising start, with a first half goal by Lauren Gillespie, her first of the season, on a redirection from Erin Parker. The Black Bears' Shaunessy Saucier tied the game with her first goal of the season on a pass from Kim Macdonald, whose name would come up later in the game. The score would remain tied until halftime.

In the second half, the Black Bears took control, as Kim Macdonald, who assisted on the first goal, scored at 43:43, her second this season. It would turn out to be the game winner, and UMass would fall to Maine 2-1. After a solid first half, it all seemed to come undone.

The loss snaps a 3-game win streak dating back to last weekend and brings the Minutewomen to 3-5, but coach Patty Shea remains optimistic towards the rest of the season.

"Our focus is always on our conference. We use these non-conference games to prepare for our in-conference oppo-

Readings for Audobon Day

By RYAN RICHARDSON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Tuesday, Sept. 27, Memorial Hall will host several readings from naturalists and environmentalists to commemorate the second Massachusetts Audubon Day. The event will run from 7 p.m. until 8:30 p.m. and is sponsored by the University Store.

The event is scheduled to open with Wally Swist, the General Book Department Manager of the University Store, reading from the poetry of Robert Francis.

Other participants scheduled to have readings are: Donald Kroodsma, emeritus professor in the Biology Department and author of "The Singing Life of Birds;" Lynn Margulis, professor in the Department of Geosciences; John Hanson Mitchell, editor of "Sanctuary: The Massachusetts Audubon Magazine;" and Laurie Sanders, Mill River Field Coordinator for UMass Extension and host of "Field Notes" on NPR's "Morning Edition."

The speakers who have published books will be available to sign copies after the event, which is open free to the public.

"Despite the Valley being a semi-green area, people's consciousness needs to be raised to nature around us," said Wally Swist, the coordinator and host of this event. Swist is also a self-proclaimed naturalist. He has had a long love affair with the wilds of the Pioneer Valley; even during his four years working at an independent book store in Hartford, he would journey back up to it on the weekends for hiking trips, weather permitting.

Carjacking at Hampshire Mall in Hadley

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

HADLEY — A carjacking at the Hampshire Mall on Saturday night resulted in a high speed chase, which destroyed a woman's car and left two brothers facing a long list of criminal charges.

Hadley police say Amy Galant, 32, was uninjured after two men threatened her at gunpoint outside the Ground Round restaurant at 10:30 p.m. before driving away with her 2004 Mercedes convertible.

The incident occurred just after Galant, who is a mall employee, entered her car, police said. The suspects, who were reportedly wearing bandanas, allegedly opened both doors of the car and one put a BB gun to the victim's head. They allegedly pretended the BB gun was a handgun and told her they would "shoot if she called the police."

A friend of Galant witnessed the carjacking from her car in the parking lot. She then called police from her cell phone.

Within minutes, Sgt. Brian Ravish spotted the Mercedes driving westbound on Route 9. A chase ensued, as Ravish was joined by town and state police.

Ravish told reporters the car reached speeds between 80 and 100 mph as it drove without its headlights on. At one point, the car sideswiped a second vehicle on Route 9, before heading north on Middle St. (Route 47). No one in the second vehicle was injured, police said.

The car eventually rolled over on a patch of grass on 28 Middle St., just 25 feet from the front of a house, according to Hadley Police Chief Dennis Hukowicz.

Hukowicz says in his 30 years at the Hadley Police Dept., this carjacking is the "first one I recall."

Hemp is seen as possiblity for fuel substitute

By JOHN FENNUCIO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

With gas and oil prices at an all-time high, the alternative solution for residents throughout Amherst and the country for energy is hemp.

Gas prices recently broke the $3-a-gallon mark for the first time in the region, which has drivers and residents who rely on gas for their cars as well as oil for heat struggling. The thought of hemp production as a cheap alternative to oil and gas is appealing because it can be converted to "biomass" that is in turn converted to energy.

"Biomass can be converted to methane, methanol, or gasoline at a fraction of the current cost of oil, coal, or nuclear energy," said Jack Herer, a longtime hemp activist and author of "The Emperor Wears No Clothes."

In his book, Herer states, "Hemp stems are 80 percent hurds (pulp byproduct after the hemp fiber is removed from the plant). Hemps hurds are 77 percent cellulose - a primary chemical feed stock (industrial raw material) used in the production of chemicals, plastics and fibers ... an acre of full-grown hemp plants can provide from 50 to 100 times the cellulose found in cornstalks, kenaf, or sugar cane."

Many people aren't educated about hemp due to the illegal nature of its cultivation and its (strictly legal) association with marijuana. Bruce Montague, an employee of Amherst's own Sumer Heating Company, said in an interview last winter in response to the suggestion of using hemp energy, "I don't think there'd be any benefit."

According to Herer's research, "Farming only six percent of the continental U.S. acreage with biomass [from hemp] crops would provide all of American's gas and oil energy needs, ending dependence upon fossil fuels." He added, "Each acre of hemp would yield 1,000 gallons of methanol. Fuels from hemp, along with the recycling of paper, etc., would be enough to run America virtually without oil."

Herer explained the versatility of hemp by saying, "It can be grown in virtually any climate or soil condition on Earth, even marginal ones."

Recent marijuana decriminalization laws in Amherst have lightened the penalties for possession of the plant. However, the association hemp has to the drug is possibly one of its biggest roadblocks towards legalization. With crystal methamphetamine presently the country's largest drug problem, admitted by both state and local law enforcement agencies, the current administration is asking such agencies to focus their efforts on marijuana busts.

"Nearly half of state and local law-enforcement agencies identify 'meth' as their greatest drug threat, as more

Preparation for college is found lacking

By PHOEBE RANDEL
BADGER HERALD

MADISON, Wis. — Three institutes of higher-education research released a report Monday asserting that states must improve how well their public school systems prepare students for college. The report calls for greater coordination between high schools and colleges, attempting to ensure that what is expected of students in high school correlates with what is needed to be successful in college.

The report suggests that states need to incorporate data systems to track individual students' success over time in order to review the affordability of their public colleges and take similar measures to bridge the gap between public high schools and colleges.

The Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction acknowledges there is a problem and said the department is working to improve the situation with new programs.

"In Wisconsin, there is a tremendous amount of coordination to ensure that students are prepared for college," DPI Communications Officer Joe Donovan said.

This coordination comes in the form of a program called PK16, which stands for pre-kindergarten through grade 16. One of the program's goals is to focus on keeping students motivated and challenged during the transition from their senior year of high school to college.

Fran Garb, senior academic planner in Wisconsin's Office of Academic and Student Services, explained that PK16 has been successful in improving the sharing of data between high schools and colleges, as recommended in the report. She also noted that public high schools in Wisconsin will be creating a complete database.

"We are hoping to be able to use this opportunity of having a K12 database and a university system database to share info across that PK16 divide," she said.

Garb said ACT results indicate the state should be concerned about college readiness.

"ACT data indicated that a fairly low percentage of the Wisconsin students were prepared to succeed in the university based on their performance," she said.

Another issue of concern, according to Garb, is "the gap between the performance on the ACT test between students of color and majority students, even when they had the same course-taking pattern. This suggests that the high school experience for those two groups of students is somewhat different."

Florida is mentioned in the report as a state that is making reforms to change the lack of coordination between colleges and high schools. Heather Sherry, director of the Office of Articulation at the Florida Department of Education, said the state wants to provide more challenging coursework, starting at the middle school level.

"We will definitely acknowledge that there are improvements to be made, and that is why there is a big focus on increasing rigor, starting in middle school and moving all the way up into college," Sherry said. "We know that the curriculum starting in middle school and going on into high school is the most important factor regarding whether or not a student is prepared or successful in college."

Sherry also described Florida's Brighter Future Scholarship Program, which she said has received a lot of publicity. The program aligns state-university entrance requirements with high school curricula, encouraging students to go above and beyond the high school graduation requirements.

Visa troubles for students

By CHRIS HALL
CAVALIER DAILY

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — The perceived difficulty of acquiring a visa to study in the United States remains a discouraging factor for international students and is partially responsible for a drop in applications from international students, said Laura Tischler, spokesperson for the Bureau of Consular Affairs.

The problems facing international students seeking visas were discussed briefly on Tuesday during a Congressional hearing on the weaknesses of the visa system.

"The bottom line was that perception counts a lot," said Thomas Costa, a professional staff member of the House Subcommittee on National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations. "The student visa delays that occurred after 9/11 did not continue to occur, although there was a perception that they still existed."

The number of international students applying to study in the United States has decreased dramatically over the years since the Sept. 11 attacks, with many of the early problems revolving around security checks and background checks, said Rebecca Brown, director of the University's International Studies Office.

The effects of the tightened security procedures resulting from the Sept. 11 attacks are ongoing but have diminished over the past few years, Brown said.

"It's nowhere near what it was before," she said.

Poll: PATRIOT Act supported

By DAN FERGUSON
THE DAILY CAMPUS

STORRS, Conn. — According to a new study performed by UConn's Center for Survey Research and Analysis (CSRA), a majority of Americans support the PATRIOT Act despite knowing little of the specific provisions made in it. A report released by the department Aug. 30 reports the public is "uninformed about [the act's] details and wary of its consequences."

According to a press release on the CSRA's web site, a group of 800 respondents consisting of Democrats, Republicans and Independents were surveyed by phone. The PATRIOT Act was supported by 57 percent of the respondents, yet only 42 percent could identify its primary intent. Also, just 31 percent could pass a 10-question quiz on the specific provisions made by the act, with only 1 percent answering all 10 questions correctly.

Political Science Professor Richard Hiskes does not put too much weight in the polls.

"A lot of research has made it clear that citizens know things when they need to, not when pollsters call," Hiskes said. "Voters know more about politics when they have to go and vote."

The survey reports the more the public knows about the act the less they support it. Of the respondents that know the intent of the act, only 57 percent supported it compared to the 70 percent that supported it but did not know its intent.

"There's a contradiction in knowledge of the PATRIOT Act; Americans think they're familiar with it, but when you actually ask them about the specifics, it's clear that most of the public doesn't understand what the PATRIOT Act actually does," said CSRA Director Dr. Samuel Best, in the press release.

Most of the support for the PATRIOT Act came from Republican respondents. 85 percent of which supported the legislation as opposed to only 50 percent of Democrats that responded. Additionally, Republican respondents to the survey knew more about the specific intent of the act than their Democratic counterparts.

The lack of news on the PATRIOT Act may contribute to the amount of support or criticism it has received.

"It is the journalists' and politicians' job to educate the public," Hiskes said. "It's their fault that the public doesn't know enough about the act. There has been very little news and criticism about the act from the media and politicians."

Some people agree there needs to be more information shared with the public by those who helped pass the act into law.

"The media has talked about [the PATRIOT Act] a lot, but not about the specifics," said Jeffrey Egan, a 1st-semester journalism major. "Just the infringements and controversy it has caused."

In the CSRA survey, close to 50 percent of all respondents thought Muslim and Arab Americans have more cause to fear investigation under the act. This was despite specific portions of the PATRIOT Act stating there would be no discrimination of those groups, as seen on the Electronic Privacy Information Center's Web site (www.epic.org).

According to wikipedia.com, the PATRIOT Act of 2001 came into law shortly after the terrorist attacks on the United States on Sept. 11. The act moved quickly through the two houses of Congress and President George W. Bush signed it into law. It has since become a controversial focus point on privacy and civil liberties. The act has permitted the sharing of information between government agencies, internet monitoring, roving wiretaps and other provisions meant to curb future terrorist attacks.

Currently, the American Civil Liberties Union is supporting many suits against parts of the act that allowed searches and seizures without a court order.

Students in dorms prone to meningitis

By Jordan M. Smith
The Parthenon

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. — University and health experts are recommending students be vaccinated because students living in the dormitories are at a higher risk of getting meningitis.

Information provided by Dr. Charles McKown, Dean of the Joan C. Edwards School of Medicine, indicates incoming college freshman in 2008 will have to be immunized because the vaccine will become mandatory.

According to the Center of Disease Control's Website, meningococcal disease is a rare infection that affects the fluid surrounding the brain and spinal cord. The risk of getting this disease is higher for students who reside in dorms than for those who live in other environments. Meningococcus can occur up to 25 times more frequently for students living in dorms.

Despite meningococcus being a rare disease, Marshall University officials are informing students now because the disease does have the potential to be fatal. Meningococcus information sheets are being posted in the electronic student handbook, myMU, as well as in UNI 101 courses for all instructors to discuss with the students.

"It's not a common disease, but it's a dreadful disease," Steve Hensley, Dean of Student Affairs, said.

The Office of Student Affairs also received information about meningococcal disease. Hensley said it is important to make students, especially those living in the dorms, more aware of the dangers of this disease and the vaccines available.

"Every person needs to have the information to make their own decision about being vaccinated," Hensley said.

Lisa Nicol, Haymaker Hall resident, said she did not realize the importance of getting vaccinated.

"No one ever told me how serious meningococcal disease could be or that I should get a vaccine to prevent the problem," she said. "I live in the dorms, and it's really scary to know I'm at a higher risk of getting this."

Emergency situation discussed

WASHINGTON — Four years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in Washington and New York, and weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast, D.C. officials are questioning whether the city is adequately prepared for emergencies or disasters.

Local leaders held a panel discussion downtown Thursday focusing on procedures already in place in case of an emergency and how businesses and institutions can better prepare themselves for one.

"There [are] always risks out there, and Washington, D.C., is certainly not immune to them," said Edward Reiskin, deputy mayor for public safety and justice in the D.C. government, at the forum. "But I don't think there is any reason to have to live in fear or be consumed with notions of terrorist acts."

The session was the second in a series hosted by the Washington D.C. Marketing Center, a non-profit group that promotes economic development in the city. Reiskin told the crowd of about 95 business professionals that ensuring security in the nation's capital is difficult but not impossible. The panel speakers emphasized that successful security can be achieved by common sense solutions.

"We really need to work and think as a region to prepare for emergencies," Reiskin said.

Charlie Gleichenhaus, who has handled the International Monetary Fund's security operations since 1998, said that when his facility began receiving multiple anthrax scares, an off-site mail screening system was established. Gleichenhaus said the cost of the new mail program is still less expensive than closing the IMF for one day in the event of an outbreak.

Educating local leaders about how to better prepare D.C. businesses and institutions for emergency situations will be beneficial to the city's plan overall, Reiskin added.

"Any way in which we can engage the broader community ... is a positive thing," Reiskin said. "It's certainly helpful to us to have venues and outlets through which we can engage and communicate."

Mark Miller, emergency management coordinator for the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, said a collaborative approach must be used to secure the nearly 1,000 Metro railcars, 100 rail stations and 10,000 bus stations in the area. Miller added that Metro works with D.C. Department of Transportation and D.C. Emergency Management Agency to prepare in the event of an emergency. The Metro system encompasses more than 1,500 square miles of territory, he said, making Metro facilities an obvious

Media shield laws debated by journalists

By Katie Schwartz
The Daily Campus

STORRS, Conn. — Within the past year, there have been 12 instances where reporters have gone on trial and in some cases, sentenced to prison, due to their refusal to disclose anonymous sources.

Jim Taricani of NBC affiliate, Channel 10 News of Providence, RI was sentenced to six months in home confinement when he refused to reveal the source of a tape in Aug. 2004. The tape incriminated Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci, showing him accepting a $1,000 bribe from the FBI. The tape was broadcast to the public via Channel 10 News on Feb. 1, 2001.

Taricani, along with Managing Editor of the Journal Inquirer Chris Powell came to UConn Wednesday to discuss the matter of a shield law preventing journalists from being jailed. There are 31 states that have already established some variant of a shield law, which protects that state's journalists from being prosecuted on the grounds of nondisclosure. Taricani believes such a law needs to be established on a federal scale.

While Powell argued against enacting such a law, Taricani was a strong advocate, expressing that a shield law is a necessity in that it will allow the public to learn of scandals on a federal and communal level.

"We thought this tape was such a vivid representation of corruption and was an opportunity for the people of Providence to witness such," Taricani said.

After airing the tape, Taricani was found within contempt of court and fined $1,000 for every day he did not reveal his source. This lasted 85 days until finally the judge ruling the Cianci case decided the tapes were to remain sealed even after it was presented as evidence. This would mean that roughly 30 to 40 citizens would be given the opportunity to see them. Due to this, and the fact the public was already suspicious of such fraud existing within their state government, the station decided to air the tape. Powell, on the other hand, felt the decision to air such a tape was made without careful consideration.

"I don't think courts will ever let someone be convicted on secret evidence, no matter how conservative the judge," Powell said. "The tape eventually going public was very anticipatable and indeed it did."

As a remedy to the recent criminal convictions of journalists, Powell said the solution does not lie within a shield law, but instead the federal government needs to grant access to certain documents that are otherwise confidential.

"Journalists don't need a get-out-of-jail-free card," Powell said. "Instead we should be given more access to information."

Federal officials urge delay in return

By David Crary
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Residents began streaming back Monday as part of a plan by the mayor to reopen New Orleans one neighborhood at a time, despite repeated warnings from the top federal official on the scene - and President Bush himself - that the city is unsafe.

Mayor Ray Nagin, under mounting pressure to rescind his decision to let people in, defended the move and complained that the federal official in charge in New Orleans, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, had made himself "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

Around midday, Nagin spokeswoman Sally Forman said the mayor was reassessing the timetable for bringing people back into the city because of "external factors," such as a tropical storm headed for the Gulf of Mexico.

The dispute underscored the lack of coordination between federal and local officials that has marked the disaster practically from the start.

Algiers, a neighborhood of 57,000 people across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, became the first section Monday to reopen to residents. Algiers, home to many of the companies that make floats for the Mardi Gras parade, saw little damage from Hurricane Katrina three weeks ago. Unlike much of the rest of the city, it has electricity and drinkable water.

Over the next week, the Uptown neighborhood, the Garden District and the historic French Quarter are also set to reopen to residents and businesses at Nagin's invitation, bringing a total about one-third of New Orleans' half-million inhabitants back.

John Schwab, 31, came back to Algiers with his brother and encountered no checkpoint getting into the neighborhood, despite warnings from the mayor that police would be checking IDs. Schwab owns a janitorial service that had contracts with movie studios. But they have all pulled out of New Orleans because of the storm.

"I'll probably have to look for a job in construction," he said. "That's about the only thing around."

A few gas stations and convenience stores were open, but little else. The manager of Winn Dixie supermarket said he had hoped to be open by Monday, but it took longer than he anticipated to clear out the spoiled food and other debris.

"We're now shooting for Thursday," said Grady Shavers. "Salvage crews already took everything out of the store. That was a nasty job."

In Washington, President Bush on Monday questioned the plan to let people back in, saying there is "deep concern" about the possibility that Tropical Storm Rita, which was headed toward the Florida Keys, could head into the Gulf of Mexico and drop more rain on New Orleans. He said he has been warned that the city's levees would be breached again if that happened.

Bush said there are significant environmental concerns. New Orleans still lacks drinkable water, and there are fears about the contamination in the remaining floodwaters and the muck left behind in drained areas of the city.

"The mayor — you know, he's got this dream about having a city up and running, and we share that dream," Bush said. "But we also want to be realistic about some of the hurdles and obstacles that we all confront in repopulating New Orleans."

Allen, head of the federal government's hurricane response, warned over the weekend that city services may not be able to handle the influx of people. He cited a lack of drinkable water and 911 service, and he, too, expressed concern that another storm could cause the patchwork repairs to New Orleans' levees to fail and bring another round of flooding.

He said hoped to meet with the mayor later Monday to discuss his concerns and work out a timetable for bringing the city back.

Asked on CBS' "Early Show" when it would be safe for people to return, he said, "We know potable water will probably be restored soon and the levees will be fixed, so that max mean days, weeks."

Nagin defended the decision to bring people back.

"If he's suggesting I'm pushing a little hard, I am. The citizens of New Orleans deserve the opportunity to see what they have left and what they can salvage," Nagin told Fox News in response to Allen's warnings.

"I'm a little surprised the admiral came out publicly on this," he added. "Maybe since I've been away a day or two, maybe he's the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

About 20 percent of the city is still flooded, down from a high of about 80 percent, said Mitch Frazier, spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers. The still-flooded areas are near Lake Pontchartrain where the levees broke and in eastern New Orleans. Frazier said all of the water is expected to be pumped out of the city by Sept 30.

With hurricane season still in full swing, he said, engineers are trying to repair the broken levees "to offer at least a baseline level of protection."

"There is not the hurricane protection here that there once was. It is significantly compromised. The hurricane-level protection we have had here prior to Hurricane Katrina will not be able to return. It will be years, not months," he said.

On Monday morning, traffic was backed up severely along Interstate 10 west of New Orleans and was stop-and-go across the elevated portions of the highway that crosses Lake Pontchartrain. Tractor-trailers, emergency vehicles and National Guard trucks shared the highway with cars towing trailers full of hurricane gear and pickup trucks with their beds loaded with water, cleaning materials and coolers.

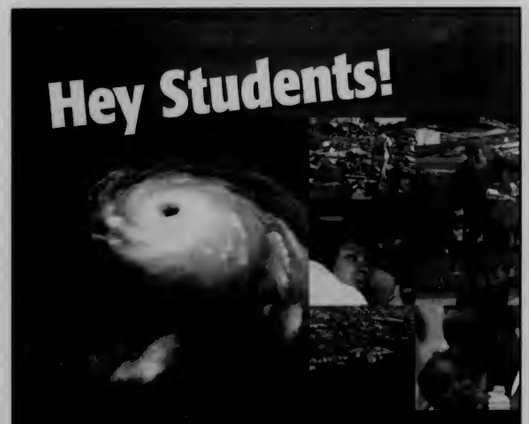
In the Uptown section, where the floodwaters left behind mud and other debris, residents were cleaning up, even though the neighborhood had not officially been reopened.

Refrigerators, strapped shut with rotting food still in them, lined some streets. Garbage bags, stacks of mattresses and box springs, furniture, clothing, toys and other goods were piled at the curb to be picked up.

In Algiers, Barry Kern, president of Mardi Gras float-maker Kern Studios, said he supports the mayor's plan to bring businesses and some residents back.

"Obviously we need to get businesses up and running any way we can," Kern said. "If we don't start somewhere, where do we start?"

He said that the city might be unfit for children, but that there are key businesses that need to be reopened, like his, so that people can start making money and the city can get back on its feet.



The vice president of the National Hospital Accreditation Organization also cautioned against reopening parts of the city, saying several hospitals probably were damaged beyond repair, while others may try to rush back into business before conditions are safe.

Swist characterized the event as "a feast of ideas relating to nature," designed not just to raise awareness but "inflected toward the celebration of nature." He further characterized his expectations for the atmosphere of the event: "It will be a lively two hours that will present a forum for intellectual stimulation and entertainment. It will be a celebration of nature, because it's an important part of what's around us."

The first Massachusetts Audubon Day played host to seven speakers, which Swist felt was little long, so this year it was cut back to only four, all of whom Swist claims could carry the evening on his or her own.

"Kroodsma has begun to be referred to as a foremost ornithologist nationally," Swist said of the professor. Kroodsma has been studying birdsong for over 30 years and was recognized in 2003 as the "reigning authority on the biology of avian vocal behavior" by the American Ornithologists' Union. Kenn Kaufman, author of "Kaufman Field Guide to Birds of North America," notes of Kroodsma that he "has the soul of a poet and the mind of a scientist, and he understands birdsong better than the birds do themselves." He will present a talk regarding his most recent book.

Margulis has been distinguished a number of times: she was elected to the National Academy of Sciences in 1983, and she received the National Medal of Science from President Bill Clinton in 1999. She has been published on a wide range of scientific topics. "She's a real renaissance woman," said Swist.

Mitchell has done much of his work on one square mile of land 35 miles north of Boston, his best known work on the tract is "Ceremonial Time," which recounts a natural history of the area since the Ice Age. For his entire body of work, he was granted the 2000 New England Booksellers' Award in Non-Fiction. He will read from his most recent book, "Looking For Mr. Gilbert: Reimagining the Life of an African American," a tale of Robert Gilbert, the man behind 19th century conservationist William Brewster.

Sanders will present a talk on Lake Hitchcock, Emily Dickinson and drinking water, all in about 20 minutes, according to Swist. The segment will be titled "Connections." Sanders received her bachelor's degree at Smith College and obtained her master's from the University of Vermont. She has also produced over 30 segments on natural history for public television. Her segments for Morning Edition can be heard on Mondays at 6:30 and 8:30 a.m. on NPR stations.

Swist himself has also published a number of poetic works and served as the writer in residence for two years at the Robert Francis House in Amherst. His work, like the work of many of the speakers, focuses in on the natural world and other aspects of life, including omelets, through three full volumes and nine chapbooks. He has received the Haiku Society of America Merit Book Award, and two Museum of Haiku Literature Awards.

Carjackers are arraigned

"This is the only one in my recent memory," he said.

Gallant's pocketbook was recovered from the vehicle, but the car was completely destroyed, police said.

Police identified the driver as Azmir Perez, 20, of 256 Main St., Amherst and the passenger as his brother, Bryant Velez, 17, of 30 Gatehouse Rd. in Belchertown. Perez was tackled by a police officer at the scene, while Bryant was tracked down by state police dogs, hiding underneath a parked vehicle on nearby Newton Lane.

Both suspects received medical attention before being placed in jail. Perez is currently being held on $10,000 bail and Velez's bail is set at $3,000. They were arraigned yesterday at Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley.

The men faced a long list of charges, including: carjacking, armed robbery while masked, resisting arrest, disorderly conduct and possession of burglary tools. Perez, the driver, faced additional charges, which were assault with a dangerous weapon (handgun), failure to stop for police, leaving the scene of a property damage accident, reckless operation of a motor vehicle, possession of a firearm without a permit, destruction of property and intimidation of a witness.

A "not guilty" plea was entered for each of the suspects.

target of terrorists.

Like other D.C. institutions, GW has followed suit and established its own procedures in case of an emergency. Two months after the Sept. 11 attacks, the University hired John Petrie to till the new post of assistant vice president for public safety and emergency management. Petrie oversees a staff of seven emergency management associates and works closely with city and federal safety professionals.

Petrie, a former commanding officer for the naval station in Norfolk, Va., is responsible for coordinating contingency plans for GW in the event of an emergency. He said that GW's close proximity to high-profile governmental buildings helps with protection, but does not eliminate potential threats.

"We have all of the intelligence agencies ... and 17 law enforcement agencies being sure that this piece of geography [the GW campus] is the safest geography on the planet," Petrie said. "That's not a guarantee that something cannot happen, especially in the broad scope of emergencies."

Shortly after becoming GW's emergency preparedness czar, Petrie created a 22-page plan that outlines what GW would do in a disaster.

Recognizing the need to inform the community about this plan, Petrie said he and his team have mounted an aggressive campaign to share emergency information. Petrie said the Emergency Management Department has attended residence hall meetings, spoken at Colonial Inauguration sessions and put advertisements in GW publications.

Both Petrie and Reiskin acknowledge that there are tangible threats to safety in D.C. and at GW but said that for the most part, students should not worry.

Students have difficult time getting visas

The U.S. government also has recently adopted a policy of extending the duration of student visas to four years in an effort to streamline the process of coming and going from the country during their time of study, Brown said.

Other factors contributing to the decrease in applications from international students include competitive promoting and pricing by universities in other countries, Tischner said.

The factors in recent years that have led to international students' perception that acquiring a visa for the United States is difficult include the relatively new policy of the federal government of eliminating the option of a personal appearance waiver, or exemptions from personal interviews extended to many types of visa applicants.

"The federal government now requires every person who wants to come here to go to an interview with the U.S. consulate," Brown said.

More women are in college

By Vimal Patel
Rocky Mountain Collegian (Colorado State U.)

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — Already outnumbering men at higher-education campuses nationwide, women are expected to further widen the gender gap at colleges and universities, according to a new federal report.

Between 2002 and 2014, enrollment for women in degree-granting institutions is expected to increase by 21 percent, compared with 12 percent for men, the report states.

The report was released Sept. 9 by the National Center for Education Statistics, the data-analyzing branch of the U.S. Department of Education, and provides more data to confirm the national trend that women, generally, are more focused on higher education than are men.

"I'm fascinated by the trend," said Ryan Barone, Men's Project Coordinator in the Office of Women's Programs and Studies at CSU. "It's a welcome change from the domination of higher education in this country by men."

In 2000, about 56 percent of all undergraduates were female, the center stated, compared to only 42 percent in 1970. Since 1979, women have outnumbered men on college campuses.

According to the NCES Web site, "females have higher aspirations than males while in high school, they are more likely to enroll in college immediately after graduating from high school and they persist and complete degrees at higher rates than males."

In the 1974-75 school year, women earned 7,266 doctorate degrees, while men earned 26,817, according to U.S. Department of Education statistics. In 2004-05 women startlingly narrowed the gap, earning 21,000, while men earned 23,600.

In the number of bachelor's degrees conferred, however, women have not only closed the gap - they far exceeded it.

In 1974-75, women earned 418,092 bachelor's degrees while men earned 504, 841. But in 2004-05, women earned 774,000, while men only earned 578,000, the statistics show.

Barone said women are still lagging behind men in doctorate degrees partly because of gender socialization.

Congress recieves greater communication through 'net

By Kaley Lyon
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN, Kan. — According to a recent Congressional Management Foundation report, Congress has received four times more communications from citizens in 2004 than in 1995 and the primary increase is due to Internet-based communications.

In 2004, the House of Representatives received more than 10 million communications by post and 99 million via the Internet. The Senate received nearly 8 million postmarked communications and 83 million Internet communications.

All forms of communication combined, Congress received about 200 million communications in 2004.

"My office has seen a significant increase in the amount of communication we're receiving," Fehr said. "Most of that is through e-mail."

However, City Manager Ron Fehr said that on the city government level, the amount of communications has remained consistent, though it is more difficult to determine.

"It's a little different because our elected officials with the city are part-time," Fehr said. "They don't have offices at the city, so we don't officially have a way of tracking those numbers down. My instinct would tell me that at the local level, there's always been a lot of calls and communication because we're pretty handy, as opposed to officials in Washington D.C. I think it's been pretty consistent."

Overall, the adaptation of the Internet as an everyday communication device has improved communication between citizens and their elected officials.

A CMF study surveyed a able - all of which are beneficial to the process. More than half of my correspondence with constituents is received via e-mail."

Congressional offices are devoting more resources to managing the increasing volume of constituent communications. CMF found that 73 percent of managers surveyed say their offices spend more time on constituent communications than two years ago.

"My office devotes a significant amount of time to corresponding with Kansans, and it's something I make sure to do well," Moran said. "I believe I have an obligation to those who contact me to respond, inform and if I can, help with whatever their issue or concern may be."

Even with so many messages being received, there are ways to make one's message attention worthy, and even influential.

"I think the first thing you need to do, is put your most important thoughts right at the start, keep them short and make it brief," Carlin said. "If you're concerned and you get my attention, we can have future e-mails to spell out the problem."

Carlin said he encourages conciseness, when communicated to legislators.

"Make it brief and to the point - don't make me read through all kinds of verbage to get to your concern and then wonder, did I interpret that right?" she said.

CMF also found only 3 percent of staff surveyed said identical form postal mail would have "a lot" of influence on their member if he/she had not yet reached a decision on a particular issue.

In contrast, 44 percent reported individualized postal letters would have a substantial influence.

"While I receive many personal letters from Kansans, there are many more that are form-type letters," Moran said. "I treat all mail with the same level of importance, but it is easier to understand a person's concern when they relate it to their personal experiences."

According to CMF, citizens who write or call their elected official are six times more likely than the general public to belong to a group trying to influence public policy or to attend a political event such as a rally, speech, or protest.

These citizens are also three times more likely to write an article for a magazine or newspaper and four times more likely to work for a political party.

As so many more citizens are communicating with their officials, it can be assumed that this may represent a trend of growing political involvement.

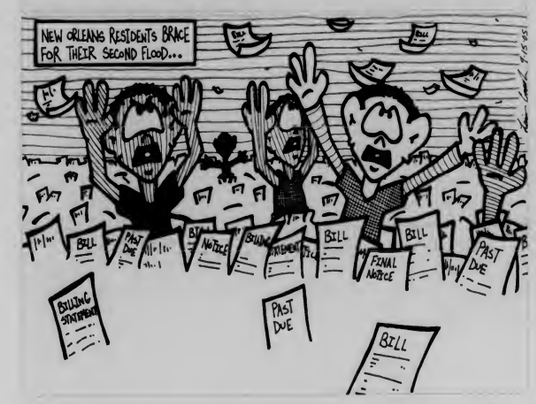
CSD endangering student independence on campus

With UMass transitioning into a new season this week, students seem to have finally calmed down and settled into their weekly routines. In addition to classes, many Registered Student Organizations will soon become, if not already, a regular part of students' schedules as a number of RSOs are advertising around campus for new members. However, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano has decided to take the fun and independence out of RSOs this year, which will undoubtedly have an impact on RSO membership.



By having the administration control one of the few things students formerly had actual control over, it would not be surprising to see RSO membership decline or worse yet, be neglected altogether. Gargano mentioned in The Collegian yesterday that he felt "RSO student leaders should walk away with a certain set of skills." The question that is consequently raised is what skills should we be walking away with? By managing a club not affiliated or managed by UMass, students will learn on their own how to deal with people head on; skills that will serve most valuable in the real world. These students aren't looking to be future office managers of small businesses; they're looking to meet people and get along/work with them in a small social environment.

Also, RSOs are so popular on campus because they're not necessarily academics-related. Gargano wanted RSOs to be more linked with academic affairs in order to "support co-curricular programs and experiential learning," according to yesterday's article. Students go to class in order to learn academic material related to their particular field of study. Students go to RSOs, in part, to get away from the frustration and stress of classes. They go to have fun, to converse with people about non-class related topics and to get to do something different. Linking RSOs in general without specific regard for what each RSO does to some department within the University in order to help the students in some way is poorly thought out and defeats the purpose of having an RSO.

Additionally, Gargano has expressed his ambition of expanding the number of RSOs, saying, "On a campus this size, we should have 400 RSOs." It is not unusual for Gargano to be thinking, once again, in terms of quantity and not quality. If students would like to be part of an RSO that does not currently exist, it is no hassle to get a group of similarly-interested peers together and form one. To blatantly set a goal of 400 RSOs based on campus size is proof that Gargano is not in touch with the student body that he so proudly insists on taking charge of.

The variety of RSOs that we have on campus is one of UMass' assets and qualities that is so appealing to prospective students. Perhaps Gargano should actually listen to student suggestions, really sit down and listen to them, before he decides to enforce rules and organizations that take away what little student independence we have.

Can I get some cornrows?

Ethan Burke

Last year I visited Zanzibar, an island off the coast of East Africa. While walking along the beach, a woman offered to braid my hair in cornrows. So I sat in the sand for 45 minutes gritting my teeth with each braid. Aside from the sunburn on my white scalp, I really liked my cornrows.

Throughout my travels, a few friends gladly braided my hair the few times I asked. One girl I knew from playing basketball at Massasoit Community College years ago offered to braid my hair, but since I left the beautiful beaches of Zanzibar and the friendly people of Tanzania, I haven't found any friends who can braid cornrows.

I asked a few young women living in my apartment complex in North Amherst if they knew how to braid cornrows. One young woman said, "Do I look black?" I jokingly responded, "I was unaware only black women could braid."

I got to thinking about racial segregation in America and in UMass residential living. My roommate used to joke about how he lived in the "Asian dorm" in Dwight Hall (Northeast). Soon after coming to UMass I realized that Northeast is the Asian part of campus. The first time I went to Totman Gym across from Northeast residential area, I found myself in a pickup basketball game with all Asian students.

Never having lived on campus, I asked other UMass students, "If the Asian students live in Northeast, where do the blacks and Latinos live?" They promptly responded, "Southwest."

Obviously, residential areas of UMass aren't exclusively black, white, Asian, Latino, or any other race, but there exists a concentration of different races in certain parts of campus.

I doubted UMass had a policy of racial segregation in finding residence for students. Rather, I assumed students select their roommates and request a certain building with other friends. I was surprised to discover it is actually both.

Under the title, "Living at UMass," the Housing Services section of the UMass Web site describes the "Asian/Asian American Student Program" located in, surprise, Dwight Hall (Northeast). The "Harambee: African Heritage Student Program" is located in Coolidge Hall (Southwest). There is also the "Kanonhsesne: Native American Student Program" and the "International Student Program."

For all of the talk about having diversity on campus, one would think the university would not encourage segregation.

With such a racial and cultural divide persisting in America today, it's not surprising that students chose to self segregate. People will live with others they identify with and feel comfortable around.

Ultimately, students choose where they live, not the university. Our partially segregated campus results from personal choices of the student body. This suggests something about the broader culture and subcultures in America. A century and a half after slavery, decades after the Jim Crow era and the Civil Rights Movement, segregation persists.

Propaganda would have us believe that America is a melting pot of cultures, a land of equal opportunity, a harmonious place where the color of one's skin doesn't make a difference where we are all simply Americans.

A discriminatory legal system, lack of social services, government policies (such as under-funding public schools in poor areas and zoning laws) and an economic system that does not provide for everyone have all contributed to a society that is no longer legally segregated but segregated just the same.

South Bronx and wealthier parts of Manhattan lie only miles from one another but are worlds apart. New York City has strong ethnic divisions where subcultures develop that appear foreign to other ethnic groups.

With such a racial and cultural divide persisting in America today, it's not surprising that students choose to self-segregate. People will live with others they identify with and feel comfortable around.

In addition to the residential programs mentioned above, UMass Housing also describes the "Nuance: Multicultural Student Program" in Gorman Hall (Central), which encourages participation of people of all different ethnic backgrounds, saying, "The program addresses the social, academic and cultural needs of students of color while they are attending a predominantly white university."

Living among people of different cultures from around the world and subcultures within America becomes a learning experience itself. UMass would be doing everyone a service if all residential areas on campus were multicultural and specific cultural programs were left to student organizations. We as students should include self-segregation in our discussions of diversity at UMass.

I don't so much mind constantly being called Bronson Arroyo (apparently all blond guys with cornrows look alike), and I like the change of look. So if you see a tall guy with blond hair riding his bike around campus, stop him and offer him some cornrows. Maybe I should just hang around Southwest more.

Time to look beyond race

David Lawrence

Hurricane Katrina caused a true disaster along the Gulf Coast. Relief efforts are still underway and the rebuilding of New Orleans will take years, if not decades. This catastrophe was horrific and should sadden every American. It seems that Katrina knocked us down, exposing our weaknesses and our mortality both as individuals and as a nation. Our dependency on oil, rampant racism, corporate national media and suspect government were all laid bare by the winds of Katrina.

As if we didn't know that we have a dangerous dependence on oil, Katrina hit us with a slap shot. Knocking out a huge portion of domestic oil production, the disaster suddenly inflated gas prices and made every one of us cringe at the pump. The time has come to realize that we need to shut down the SUVs and find a better way to travel - we aren't getting away with it for much longer.

Our country stands on precarious racial turf, and it is not only people on the street who discriminate. People from all walks of life, including members of Congress, rap singers, and even the popular media all demonstrate racist tendencies.

Kanye West recently suggested the following scene inside the White House around the time Katrina hit:

Office Aide: "Mr. Bush, should we help in New Orleans?"

G. Bush: "Aren't there black people there?"

Office Aide: "Yes, Mr. Bush."

G. Bush: "Don't bother then, I don't care about them."

Yeah, right, Kanye - you're part of the problem.

We do have a racial problem in America that has been partially uncovered by this disaster. It isn't George Bush's fault, and it isn't Kanye West's fault. The blame sits squarely on the shoulders of every racist American. There are definitely a lot of white people who are racist and contribute to the racial problem. I've met some of them. There are also black people who are racist and contribute to the problem. I've met some of them as well. Despite having slightly different skin tones, the racists that I've met - both black and white - were similarly ignorant and bigoted, and would probably get along swimmingly together.

Bigotry isn't a white, Islander or ALANA trait. It's a human tendency, and we all need to think about that when we write, think, speak and vote. Kanye West certainly should have done so before he made that bigoted statement on NBC TV. The government reaction to Katrina was embarrassingly poor, but that was caused by hubris and incompetence, not racial motivations. If you recently ordered a shirt quoting Kanye West's comments, then you need to think about your own bigotry.

The media did not hide its racism during the Katrina coverage. Poor blacks and whites alike were hit hard by the disaster, and many found themselves scavenging abandoned supermarkets and shops for the food and sundries that they needed to live. When video was shown of these individuals, the blacks were often captioned as "looters" while the whites were described as "scavengers." The popular media simply cannot pretend this didn't happen. It did, and it is unacceptable. There are reporters and news people who need to think about their own bigotry.

The media didn't only fail in their reporting of looters following Katrina. Another stunning example of their incompetence is the overexaggerated "predicted death tolls" that were reported after the disaster. Most media outlets reported that 10,000 people were killed in the flood throughout the confusing days after the levees broke. It turns out that the true death toll in New Orleans likely won't even reach 1,000. This is clearly an example of incompetence, but I suspect that there may be something more sinister behind these exaggerations. Do higher death tolls mean higher ratings? It's scary to think about.

The response to Katrina was startlingly slow. Given all the emphasis placed on Homeland Security and preparedness since Sept. 11, you would have hoped the government would be prepared for this disaster. With at least four days advance notice that this disaster was coming and a still-delayed response, what should we expect in the event of a sudden strike on a city?

Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael Brown "resigned" last week following questions about the response to Katrina. It immediately came out in the press that Brown was completely unqualified to head up FEMA. The reason Brown held such a prestigious position was his friendly relationship with the Bush Administration. Brown's resignation, and to some extent the poor response to Katrina, stands as a frightening example of how political patronage can be detrimental to our government. This long standing practice (George W. Bush is hardly the originator of patronage) may fall under new scrutiny given the failure of Michael Brown.

As Hurricane Katrina ransacked Mississippi and Louisiana, it uncovered a lot of frightening things about America. It also uncovered a lot of positive things that others have talked about on these pages. We've all heard stories about people of all races coming together to help in the spirit of human kindness and altruism. Nearly everyone has donated some of their time or money. The human response to this disaster gives me hope that we'll be able to respond as a people and move forward in rebuilding Mississippi, Louisiana and America.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

TIME TO GROW UP

I am writing in a moment of awe and bewilderment having just read Marisa Kanof and Rachel Kaplan's column ("UMass students: pray for Gargano.") As I'm reading their article, I can't help but ask myself, "How can they be serious?"

Gargano is by no means a perfect administrator; that much is clear. His "Students First" campaign is a farce and the campus has clearly taken the wrong course in trying to make this university more student-friendly.

But to peg the blame on one man is ridiculous, and for students to not take responsibility for their own mistakes is dishonest. The Student Government Association (SGA), in all its glorious self-promotion as the voice for students on campus, has in the last few years done nothing but act like a collection of children pretending to be revolutionaries.

First we had the pathetic little squabble between the SGA and the ALANA caucus, where powerful arguments in support of the ALANA caucus were childishly diluted with cries of racism and corruption. Then came the idiotic - because no word better describes it - vote of "no confidence" against the University's administration. This blunder of epic proportions did not convince the University to listen to students; instead, it silenced the most powerful voice for student advocacy in the Valley. The SGA muted itself, and now what do we have to show for it?

Well, we had another fantastic bout of racism last year, with the SCERA Office now clearly being used as a meet-inghouse of intoxicated Klan members. And so, instead of students brushing this off as a bunch of drunken fools out of control on campus, we spend weeks bickering and complaining and calling for resignations that should have happened the day after the pictures were released. Instead of tending to our university, we chose to tend to our sense of political correctness.

And now we have the audacity to blame it all on Gargano and pray for his removal from office? I can't say I entirely blame him for his actions; while the most powerful student group on campus is busy playing pretend politics with itself and refusing to engage the administration, Gargano steps in and says, "Fine, if you're not going to do it, I'll do it myself."

Do students want their autonomy back? Do we want to be left alone by the administration and allowed to run our own organizations and fund our own activities and enjoy a university that caters to our desires?

Then we should all collectively grow up.

HEALTH INSURANCE MAY BE FLAWED

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst has been extorting a health fee, called the QSHIP, contrary to the legislature's intent of M.G.L. 15A § 18, against students that are enrolled in greater than 5 but less than 9 credits. In so doing, thousands of students have had to pay for a fee contrary to the Massachusetts General Laws, the Code of Massachusetts Regulations 114.00 CMR 3.00, and the Division of Health Care Finance and Policy's guidelines as described in the Division's 2000 and 2004 book titled "Access to Health Care."

In addition to the fact that the UMass Board of Trustees have singled out students at UMass Amherst to pay twice as much for health insurance than UMass at Lowell or UMass at Boston, they have also marked up the cost of the insurance, thus collecting additional fees that they should not have collected. The collection of this "ultra virus" fee is in the millions of dollars per semester. This does not include what Aetna/Chickering, Inc. wrongly collected during this same period; that figure is in the tens of millions of dollars.

It gets better. UMass Board of Trustees counsel has stated that they can interpret law above the intent of the Massachusetts General Court, our state legislature. The Attorney General of Massachusetts, Thomas Reilly's Office, is defending the actions of Aetna/Chickering and their illegal collection of monies against a class of students that should not have been mandated to pay the health insurance contrary to the law, the code and the guidelines.

Reilly seems to defend big business and its right to victimize students, both young and old, at UMass Amherst, by turning cheek when the UMass Administration, the UMass Board of Trustees and the Massachusetts Division of Health Care Finance and Policy have been in collusion in extorting millions of dollars from students. Reilly is in no position to investigate through the Insurance Fraud Bureau because his office is defending the Division of Health Care Finance and Policy. There appears to be a conflict of interest.

For the academic year 2005-2006, UMass Amherst students pay $855 per semester for this plan. UMass Lowell students pay $912 annually and UMass Boston students pay $1,088 annually. Why should UMass Amherst students pay almost twice as much for basically the same insurance when each of these plans is administered by the same company, Chickering, which is owned by Aetna Insurance?

I write because I filed a federal lawsuit against UMass Amherst, the UMass Board of Trustees, and the Division of Health Care Finance and Policy to protect the rights of this class of students.

UMass students may be entitled to a refund if they attended UMass Amherst after 1989 as a part-time undergraduate or part-time graduate student and were mandated to pay a QSHIP health fee.

Okkervil River paint their 'Black' opus

Okkervil River
'Black Sheep Boy'
Jagjaguwar Records

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Somewhere between indie-rock's passionate angst and alt-country's dark folk lies Okkervil River, a band that has only been around for a few years but has released the type of fully-realized album that most veteran bands would kill to dream up. "Black Sheep Boy" is an 11-song journey through dark woods, dark streets, dark stretches of endless night and, well, darkness. Okkervil frontman Will Sheff and his band have concocted an album that is both warm and frightening, loud yet atmospheric, violently raw yet softly fragile, taking what was best about their 2003 album "Down The River Of Golden Dreams" and bringing it to a whole new level.

Opening with the title track "Black Sheep Boy," a track by singer/songwriter Tim Hardin that inspired Sheff to write many of the songs on the album, Sheff's delicate voice sets the mood and establishes a character, the black sheep, who lurks in every corner of the record. The next track, "For Real," is startlingly brooding bloodlust, with Sheff confessing, "Some nights I thirst for real blood, for real knives, for real cries," before massive stabs of electric guitar come raining down on him. "For Real" is, in many ways, a four minute summation of what's to come. Quiet tracks like "In A Radio Song" and "Get Big" are huge because of their subtle beauties whereas rockers like "Black" and "The Latest Toughs" feel triumphant despite Sheff's emotionally heavy lyrics and delivery.

Indeed, Sheff's lyrics often are heart-on-sleeve but they are always intelligent, literate, and clever. "The Latest Toughs" features a bridge where Sheff admits, "I don't know what notes you want to hear played, I can't think what lines you'd like me to sing or say, and I'm not sure what subjects you want mentioned, so pause and add your own intentions." Musically, "Black Sheep Boy" is more expansive then previous efforts, with soft acoustic guitars, violent electrics, and plenty of horns, pianos, keyboards, and atmospheres.

"Black Sheep Boy" culminates in the massive "So Come Back, I Am Waiting" which finds the album's titular character at first dissolving and then growing horns, snorting, stamping, and shouting as Sheff grows from a near-whisper to a gut-wrenching scream. "Black Sheep Boy" is far-and-away the best album that Okkervil River has put out but "So Come Back..." is the type of song that stands out as a monument amongst a tough crowd of practically flawless peers. Concocted like a perfectly staged car-crash, "Black Sheep Boy" delves into greed, anger, lust, violence, and corruption fearlessly. Many of the songs are, on the surface, depressing, but like the best pieces of bleak art, it is almost uplifting to see the world's darkest facets through such a unique microscope. Okkervil River have been truly meticulous in creating their masterpiece, while being careful not to push the songs to overkill. Every second and every piece of this record is important and not a moment is wasted. "Black Sheep Boy" is truly a blindingly bright success; as close to a must-have record as anything in the past 10 years.

15 artists exhibit new work at the Hampden Gallery

By Leann Leake
Collegian Staff

"Seeing comes before words," says John Berger, as quoted in Amy Eva Raehse's introduction to Hampden Gallery's latest show "New York/New England/New Talent 2005." This is a concept that the two jurors of this show - Raehse herself and Trevor Richardson - have really taken to heart. A juried show without a predetermined theme is very rare in the art world, but this one is limited only by the geographic locations of its artists. The reward is a breath-taking sampling of contemporary art, with incredible scope in media, style, subject matter, and approach.

The work of each of the 15 artists represented is engaging and fascinating, but a few stood out especially. Because it is the only piece using sound and motion, Mathew Southerlin's installation piece "Three Sisters" is what first engages the visitor. It is an electronic conversation held between three six-foot-tall black metal poles with strangely shaped wooden "mouths" at their tops (one covered mysteriously with a cloth). They face each other and squeak, chirp, and jabber away at unpredictable intervals. Psychologists tell us that when things confuse us and throw us off, we give them extra attention. This makes "Three Sisters" a very fitting way to enter the show - with new open eyes and an urge to listen and understand.

Francoise McAree's painting "Spotty" is a mysteriously powerful painting of a face, compositionally cropped so that only the eyes, nose, and part of the mouth can be seen. The subject's expression is unreadable, and it's not clear if it is male or female. But what catches the eye across the room and brings the viewer closer is a strange kind of half-formed revulsion. The face, as the title suggests, is mottled with spots that, from across the room, could almost be beautiful. Closer, the viewer sees that the fascinating marks have clearly deteriorated into something a lot like acne on the bridge of the nose, and that the slightly curved mouth is cracked and dry, with peeling skin. Even still, the painting draws you in — up close, McAree's craft is revealed, and the skin is all luscious purples, electric blues, and jewel-like reds and oranges. The spots, up close, are made of curved, lovely shapes of color. At once, the viewer is disgusted and fascinated. "Beautiful or ugly?" the painting asks, and we are hard pressed to answer, but we do want to stay.

For a touch of humor, visitors will enjoy Jeff Warmouth's "SuperJEFFUmarket," a three-piece sculpture made of stacks of boxes topped by cans ("560 cans, 20 boxes," as the gallery label tells us). At first, the piece seems to be an eye-rolling redundant tribute to Warhol's Campbell's soup cans, but on closer inspection you'll find that Warmouth has doctored the labels of all of the cans

Waltham

2/10

Waltham
RYKO Records

Remember the 1970s when bands would name themselves after where they were from? Yeah, neither do I, since I wasn't born yet. Well, here's a refresher for those like me: Boston was from Boston, Kansas was from Kansas; I could list more, but I hope you get the point.

The point I am trying to make here is that bands still do it. One of the present bands that does it is Waltham from Waltham, Mass.

Recently, Waltham released their second album on RYKO records and I don't get how these guys got signed.

To be fair, the band does what they do just fine, but I don't get why they are doing it in the first place.

Every member of the band is a career man, but it appears they are stuck in the 1980s in two different ways.

The first way is that their music sounds as if it should be in some bad movie from the '80s. The second way is that they're still whining about relationships as if they were still in high school. They could easily be mistaken for the Canadian band Simple Plan, but at least Simple Plan has been in high school more recently than these guys.

Another fault with this album is that one-third of the album's song titles are a variation of a girl's name. These girls could be complete fiction - actually, I hope they are, because these songs could make them want to change their names.

The rest of the album creates a repetitive sound that just should stop; an EP of these songs is too much.

With the album comes a free DVD and even that's too much. The DVD is full of live footage and other typical things. What makes this DVD interesting is the band is dressed up in work clothes, trying to say their music matches their working-class-town's attitude.

Maybe their music, their clothes and their attitudes are just a gimmick - if that's the case I just don't get it.

The Evil Queens

7.8/10

First it Boils, Then it Spills
Addison Records

New York City is so big it can have many bad bands and still have a reputation of a good city for rock and roll.

With that being said, the third album "First It Boils, Then It Spills" by the band The Evil Queens is definitely something worth writing about.

The Evil Queens took longer to record then all the others and frankly it shows. The production was still done by Jon Chinn, like their two previous albums, but the band has grown since the days of just taking two days to produce an entire album. "First It Boils, Then It Spills" took an entire year to complete recording.

With the longer production time, the sound of the album is finer and clearer, and that works well with the garage rock feel the album creates.

At times, the band sounds like Texas indie-rockers, Spoon, if you subtract Spoon's storytelling lyrics. At other times, the band sounds as if they were supposed to be around during the early 1990s with the grunge trend alive and well.

But most of the time, The Evil Queens sound similar to fellow queen band Queens of the Stone Age.

What makes this album stand out so well is the lack of filler it has to offer as the album goes along; the tracks stay loud and strong, a difficult goal that rarely achieved these days in rock and roll.

MTV success could be right around the corner for this band if their small independent label Addison Records markets them right or if a major label picks them up and puts them on a popular tour this fall.

Unfortunately, it is unlikely the success will come, since Addison is a relatively new label with one other act on its roster, Manda and the Marbles. Unfortunately the press the band receives has failed to get the noticed. And the band has very small touring plans to get their name out there this fall.

Give the band another album as well-rounded as this one and then the MTV success will definitely come calling regardless of their small label since their amount of press will increase.

Our Lady Peace

8/10

Healthy in Paranoid Times
Columbia Records

In the three years since Our Lady Peace has released a new album, Canada has sent lots of sub-par musical hacks to America and beyond. Luckily, Our Lady Peace has released a new album — now we can forget all about those other hacks.

On Aug. 30, 2005, Our Lady Peace released their seventh album, "Healthy in Paranoid Times," their second with new guitarist Steve Mazur.

With this new release it is easy to say that Our Lady Peace has matured — even for them. In their 13 years, the band has not been one to stay quiet about controversial or spiritual themes. Even their breakout single "Superman's Dead" from the album "Clumsy" had spiritual references.

Now with their new album, take their spiritual side and increase it. "Healthy in Paranoid Times" is 12 songs about politics, religion and relationships. Once increased, question it, because the world is much different now.

The world's differences shows not just in the music, but when reading the album's liner notes: it is quick to realize that the world's current events have lead the band to work harder and question more about their lives.

The instrumentals of the album are nothing special; they blend in well with Maida's voice and that's okay because Our Lady Peace has always been a pop-filled rock-and-roll band.

It's a shame that 31 songs that were written and recorded for this album will never be heard — if the band released more and made this album a double album, it could have competed with the Foo Fighters for best double disc album of the year.

YingYang Twins

7.3/10

United States of Atlanta
TVT Records

After the success of their third album "Me and My Brother," the platinum selling rap duo Ying Yang Twins release a new album, "United States of Atlanta."

With this release, the duo has a lot to prove that they belong in the mainstream pop culture and are not just a one hit wonder.

On "United States of Atlanta" the Twins do it right — they could have released an album of mediocre rhymes, instead they risk the chance of losing popularity to release an album that showcases that they can do more then write songs about going to the club and dancing. They are similar to Outkast, but more bluesy in the slower songs.

An example of this exploration is in the song "Live Again," a slow ballad-like song about a struggling mother trying to straighten out her life and support her family. While the woman in the song is a stripper, the song is much more about her family then her career.

This song features a cameo by Adam Levine from Maroon 5, who has also recently worked with Kanye West. At first one would think this cameo is unique, but in the past the duo has had pop princess Britney Spears share the mic in a song.

Other cameos throughout the album are Mike Jones, B.G., Pitbull, Lil Scrappy, Missy Elliott, Busta Rhymes and Anthony Hamilton.

Pop star cameos haven't made Ying Yang Twins go soft on us yet; this is quite evident in the first single "Wait." This song is a typical Ying Yang Twins song, easily detailed as X-rated. In fact, most of the album is X-rated, but don't worry; it also comes in a clean version for you fans of Will Smith and random pauses in your music.

These songs are just two of the 23 songs on the one disc that makes up the album. Granted, some of these songs are filler, but that's okay since there are plenty of better songs to make up for it.

The production for the album is tight, done mostly by in house producer Mr. Collipark from Collipark Music Inc.

The Click Five

1/10

Greeting From Imrie House Lava Records

The pop music landscape is a crass, terrifying war zone to traverse. The Click Five are the type of band that go above and beyond the call of duty: making the pop music world more horrifying then it was before. Literally within the first ten seconds of "Good Day," the first track from "Greetings From Imrie House," the song already sounds dubious when the vocals and keyboards come in. Before the twentieth second, the song is wearing out its welcome.

Every note, every line, every drum beat sounds so overtly synthesized and strained. The band is prone to name-dropping The Cars, Cheap Trick and The Beach Boys - artists known for taking pop music to new places — and their publicists want to make sure that every one knows that the band were schooled at Berklee. However, what is impossible to disguise is that every song on the album is just a half-hearted, unoriginal trick from other bands' playbooks. The Click Five is marketed as some sort of indie-pop boy band — touring with Ashlee Simpson and writing songs with members of Fountains of Wayne and Kiss (which is a whole 'nother issue) — and they even wear matching clothes. However, what a whole team of PR people can't do is disguise the fact The Click Five is just that: a marketed band. Ashlee Simpson fans may get a kick out of the crunchy power chords, the '80s keyboard parts, and hearing lead singer/dreamboat Eric Dill sing through a Cher-like vocoder "Hey girl, I wanna catch your wave / Hey girl, I wanna drift away with you" on the appropriately titled "Catch Your Wave", but no one would guess The Click Five are a group of professional musicians.

"Greetings From Imrie House" sounds about as close to an album made by robots, with the marketing department pushing the buttons, as it gets.

Every second is meticulously plotted out and produced to be 'just perfect'; unfortunately the man behind the curtain is blatantly visible, to the point where it's almost impossible to hear the music past the image. The songs are all filled to the brim with little tricks and gimmicks but nothing can disguise the complete lack of songwriting. The Click Five is violently, boorishly monotonous and far more offensive. There is pop music, there is tactlessly commercial music, and then there is The Click Five.

Local H

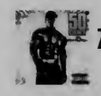
Comes Alive Cleopatra Records

Local H's combination of post-grunge riffs and smart, witty lyrics have flown just under the mainstream radar for about 10 years now. While the two-man group has seen some radio success and receives positive reviews, when the time comes for year-end-lists and front-cover articles, critics seem to favor the latest trend. (Time will be the judge if Franz Ferdinand deserved all the attention that Local H's "Whatever Happened To P.J. Soles" didn't get.) However, Local H's talent and workhorse ethic has helped the band build a strong cult following and a quiet reputation as one of the most consistently strong bands around.



Local H is also known as a touring machine, so it was only a matter of time before the band released a live album. "Comes Alive" is a document of the band taken from the fall of 2004. Two shows were recorded and spliced together with the intention of bringing Local H's live energy home.

Singer/guitarist/bassist Scott Lucas and drummer Brian St. Clair always sound energetic on their albums, but live recordings of songs like "Everyone Alive" and "Deep Cut" take the songs to a new level of intensity. The track list is diverse, with singles, fan favorites, and some new takes on older songs. "Bound For The Floor", the band's big hit, sounds surprisingly alive given the fact that Lucas has probably played the song more then anything else in his catalogue, and the new takes on "No Problem", a song that was based around acoustic-guitar when it first appeared on the 1996 album "As Good As Dead", and "President Forever", an acid-tongued attack on George W. Bush from 2003's "No Fun" EP, are experiences that any fan will be glad to have on record. The album even features a bonus track: a studio version of the band's semi-infamous cover of Britney Spears' "Toxic".

While this should prove to be very satisfying for fans of the band, it won't do much for most other people. While Local H's power remains in tact during the songs, the shows have been edited, cutting out most of Lucas' well-established give-and-take with the audience. Lucas is a strong songwriter, so his songs always have his distinct personality, and while that comes through on every Local H record, his live performance is impossible to replicate. Lacking the coherence of the band's studio albums and unable to fully capture exactly what makes Local H live so great, "Comes Alive" is a must-have for fans but newcomers should actually see the experience in person. Still, this collection makes it perfectly clear that both on record and in concert Local H is heads-and-tails above the competition.

7.6/10

The Massacre: Special Edition Shady/Aftermath

50 Cent's "The Massacre: Special Edition" is an ambitious affair. The album includes an extra song — the infectious "Outta Control (Remix)" featuring Queens duo Mobb Deep — and the bonus DVD boasts a video for every song on the album. Is this too much 50 or did he massacre the competition? This package is "just a lil bit" of both.

First off, the album. Why would the four million plus people who have already purchased the original "Massacre" purchase this album? Based on the album alone, they probably would not. There is no real incentive aside from the "Outta Control (Remix)," which replaces the original version on the album. But for everyone else who doesn't have this album yet, it is not as strong as 50's previous album, "Get Rich or Die Tryin'." Jadakiss says it best on his diss record "Animal" when he says "You ain't get shot again yet, so what's your second album about? Nothing!" The themes of "The Massacre" don't deviate from the present rap formula of money, cash, and hoes mixed with verbal assaults, and his flow does not match up to the heavyweights in the industry. A major fault of the album is it finds 50 less convincing as the gangster figure he has made himself out to be.

What the album lacks in lyrics it makes up for in production and irresistibly catchy hooks. The production - handled by Dr. Dre, Eminem, Scott Storch, and Hi-Tek, among others - is top notch as they lace track after track of club beats to make you dance. 50 then adds his singsong hooks to each track. 50's specialty is the effortless hook. Here, he makes a stab at becoming the heir to Nate Dogg as the man giving us hooks that refuse to leave our heads. No matter how ridiculous "Clickity clank, the money goes into my piggy bank" or "Bitch, get in my car" look on paper, 50 finds a way to get them stuck in your head. If only our teachers were that good; I'd have a 4.0.

Now for the DVD, the make or break feature for those four million people that already know all about the music. As usual, all across this disc 50 plays on his bulletproof image. The DVD begins with a drive by shooting and the menu is a kaleidoscope of guns. The videos range from gritty black and white hood dramas to comical video game effects where we watch a boxing video game version of 50 knocking out other pixilated opponents. Later we find G-Unit in the strip club before heading out to a tropical locale to yacht. But who is 50 Cent? Is he out on the street robbing people or is he driving around his new Ferrari in the 'burbs? This is the downfall of the DVD, highlighting just how fragmented 50's image is these days. While other rappers tell their narratives of how they made it from Staten Island to tropical islands, 50 seems to believe he's in both places at once.

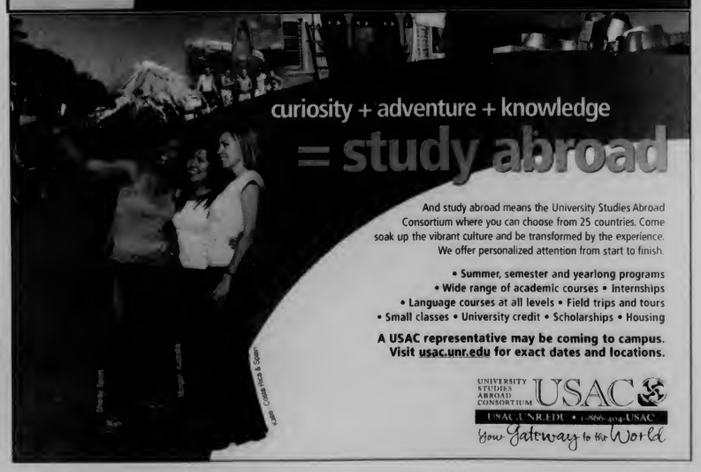
with seemingly endless creativity. The stacks of products become a tongue-in-cheek psychoanalysis of the artist, as viewers pick out cans of "Big Jeff's Forked Tongue," "Ripe Bitterness (pitted,)" and "Marinated Self-loathing (in bile)." It's all very heavy-handed, but Warmoth seems to know that his self-exploration (so common now) can be wearying, and so sticks to a light touch with a lot of humor. How could anyone write this piece off, when it dismisses itself so well?



Other pieces that will reward you kindly for time spent with them are Steve Budington's "Rough Draft," a painted study of texture and color that fills the eyes with the day-glow weirdness of a pile of crumpled yellow paper; Anna Bayles Arthur's "Unraveling," a dreamy mixed media piece whose foggy dripping desert with its half-suggested insect shapes gives a nod to Bosch's "Garden of Earthly Delights"; and Victor Signore's "Mortification (a psychological death)," a brooding room carpeted with iron filings housing an elegant table cast of salt.

"New York/New England/New Talent 2005" will be at Hampden Gallery (in Southwest) through October 27. The gallery is open from 12-6 p.m. from Monday to Thursday, and 2-5 p.m. on Sundays.

for his play at the Michigan State Fall Classic on Sept. 4 and 5 where he tallied five points with two goals and one assist, sharing the award with football defensive back Brandon Smith.

Young guns

Having to deal with injuries to three seniors leaves room for other players to fill the void - in the case of the men's soccer team, most of them happen to be freshmen. Eight freshmen received playing time this weekend, including offensive standouts Ofosu and Desantis, who scored the game-winner against the Big Red on Friday. Freshmen David Spatcher, Tony Bassett, Michael Connolly, Nick Kelly (who tallied an assist with an inbound pass against Navy), Costa Tsolfrides, Simmons and Chris Brown also received significant playing time and have all contributed to the Minutemen's two-game winning streak . . . After going 1-3 in the first four games of the season and then winning the next two, UMass coach Sam Koch had no answers for the change, responding simply: "I don't know." . . . Sophomore Doug Rappaport and Brown both hail out of Tucson, Arizona and attended Salpointe High School, leading their team to a Class 5A state championship.

Katrina affects sports scene

By Gil LeBreton
Knight Ridder

When the winds blew and the levee busted, one of the treasures of the New Orleans sports scene - the Scheuermann family - never had a chance.

Delgado Community College sits at the edge of what used to be one of New Orleans' proudest landmarks — 1,500-acre City Park. An estimated 14,000 oak trees, dozens of them centuries old, lined the park's emerald boulevards.

Joe Scheuermann, coach of the Delgado baseball team, lives two blocks from City Park. Ageless Kirsch-Rooney Stadium, Delgado's home field, is virtually in Scheuermann's backyard.

And sometime after midnight, according to Army engineers, on the morning of Tuesday, Aug. 30, the levee gave way at the 17th Street Canal and Spencer Avenue, sending a torrent of hurricane-churned salt water into the venerable New Orleans neighborhood of Lakeview. Less than three miles away, the Scheuermann home at 39 West Park was directly in the floodwaters' path.

Like a growing number of New Orleans area residents — some hardy, some simply curious — Joe Scheuermann went home for a few hours last week. What he found took his breath away.

"We had to kick the front door down, because the rain had swollen it," Scheuermann said. "I cannot describe what we saw once we were inside.

"Imagine if you put everything you own inside a giant washing machine and mixed in 10 loads of mud. Our refrigerator was in the living room. There were holes in the walls, from where the furniture had been floating and banging against them. The stench, you wouldn't believe — it was like raw sewage."

An estimated 12 to 15 feet of water covered the houses on West Park at the flood's highest point. Nearby Tad Gormley Stadium, site of the 1996 U.S. Olympic Track and Field Trials, sat in water up to its portals. Hundreds, maybe thousands, of oak trees sat on their sides, uprooted and stripped of leaves.

At Delgado Community College, Scheuermann found that soldiers from the 185th National Guard Battalion had already begun the cleanup chores. Five campus buildings, Scheuermann guesses, are complete losses.

His baseball field, he discovered, was a battered and muddy mess.

Scheuermann's Delgado team calls Kirsch-Rooney Stadium home, but over the decades, every New Orleans high school player, from Rusty Staub to Will Clark to Thomas Diamond, has played baseball there.

Major league teams, burnstorming their way north, have played spring training games at Kirsch-Rooney.

A member of the Scheuermann family, it seems, has been at the center of the New Orleans baseball community forever. Joe's father, the late Louis "Rags" Scheuermann, won eight national titles in the amateur ranks and built perennial winning programs at both Loyola University and Delgado. When Rags retired in 1990, he passed the Delgado torch to his son, Tulane graduate Joe.

Like father, like son. In 15 seasons at Delgado, Joe Scheuermann has sent more than 100 players to Division I programs at Tulane, LSU and around the nation. By Scheuermann's own count, "99 percent" of his Delgado players are from New Orleans area high schools.

Nature, at its cruelest, knows no boundaries, Scheuermann discovered.

At Kirsch-Rooney, his supposedly hurricane-proof outfield fence was reduced to splinters. His new scoreboard was blown into the cemetery beyond the right-field wall. The light pole behind third base and the two in right field were toppled. The dugouts and equipment shed — gone.

"I lost everything," Scheuermann said by phone. "Spikes, gloves, uniforms. Basically, anything that was facing the north when the storm hit is gone."

The Delgado baseball program, Scheuermann said, has always operated "frugally."

"My wife used to say that I haven't thrown away a pair of baseball pants in 15 years," he said.

Now, he has to start all over again. Funds will be tight, as Delgado itself tries to reopen. The school chancellor has told Scheuermann that he'd like for the school's baseball program to continue, but Delgado will need desks and books before it can pay for bats and balls.

"If we can keep the program self-sufficient," Scheuermann said, "we can send a real positive message to the community."

It was "Spirit of New Orleans Night" at Ameriquest Field in Arlington on Saturday. The Texas Rangers provided transportation and tickets for the area's Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

And when it was told about the plight of Joe Scheuermann's Delgado Dolphins this weekend, Rangers management again unselfishly stepped up to the plate.

UMass adds top players

with a name that many basketball fans are familiar with: Luke Bonner. Bonner's brother Matt starred at the University of Florida and currently plays in the NBA for the Toronto Raptors.

Bonner, a redshirt freshman center, transferred from West Virginia this summer and, like Forbes, will sit out this season. Bonner has three seasons of eligibility remaining at UMass.

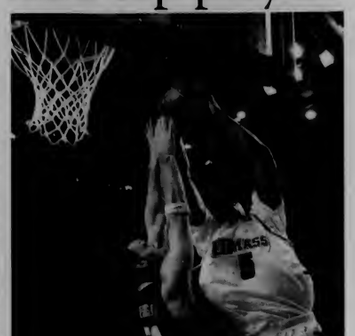
Coming to UMass is something of a homecoming for Bonner, as he is from Concord, NH and starred at Trinity High School in Manchester, NH.

"Luke Bonner is a seven-footer who can really play the game of basketball," Ford said. "He's got a great bloodline and really loves the game, and has an incredible work ethic. He's got incredible days ahead of him."

Another player Ford added this summer who will have to wait a season before joining the team is junior forward Etienne Brower.

Brower comes to UMass after playing for two years at Boston University, where he was an America East All-Conference Third Team selection.

"Etienne Brower is a proven player at the Division 1 level," Ford said. "He was an All-Conference player at BU. I love his versatility; he's somebody that can do a lot of different things on the court."



Ford added also added Tiki Mayben, a freshman guard, who will not play this season and will not be able to practice with the team because he is an academic non-qualifier.

Mayben was highly-recruited out of Troy High School in Troy, NY and committed to Syracuse University, but academic problems prevented him from ever enrolling at the school, and instead he landed at UMass.

"We've added a lot of players to improve our program," Ford said. "Like they say 'Rome wasn't built in a day.' It takes time. It's going to be a process to get our program back to the top of the A-10 again."

While Ford has obviously been busy adding players, two players from last year's squad were lost during the off-season.

Jeff "Big Deli" Salovski and Olivier Lamoureux, both of whom were freshmen last year, left the program over the summer. Salovski transferred to Sacred Heart University, while Lamoureux transferred to McGill University in Montreal.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior forward Stephane Lasme and the Minutemen have been working all off-season to prepare for the upcoming season.

While Lamoureux saw very little action last year, Salovski was a player that had potential, as evidenced by his 21 point performance against Xavier last January.

"Any time there's a change in a coaching staff there are things that take place and a lot of time it's things that are out of your control," Ford said. "Olivier was in a situation where he just wanted to go back home to Canada and play basketball there. He left on great terms.

"I don't think Big Deli felt comfortable here for whatever reason. He wasn't overly excited about playing basketball or going to school. It was his decision 100 percent to make the move."

The eight returning players from last year's team also kept busy during the off-season. They spent their summer in Amherst working on both academics and basketball.

The team began practicing last week, as new NCAA rules allow the coaching staff to work with the entire team for two hours a week, as opposed to the past rule which allowed coaches to work with no more than four players at a time.

Ford expects it will take time for the team to pick up his system, but he is encouraged by what he's seen early on.

"They're looking good," Ford said. "So far I've been happy with the performances of everybody. We're going to be very thin the first semester, because we are sitting out players, and Dante Milligan [who transferred from Pittsburgh last year] doesn't get eligible until second semester, so we're only going to have nine scholarship players. We're going to have a very small room for error. We can't have injuries and we need to have everyone ready to go."

NOTES: The schedule has still not been completed, as UMass still has to fill at least one game, but it is expected to be linalized in the very near future ... One problem with the schedule was the loss of the Gonzaga game scheduled to take place at UMass. Gonzaga backed out of its agreement to come to Amherst and UMass is currently trying to work out something for next year. ... Ford plans to hold walk-on tryouts sometime after Oct. 15, but details are not yet available.

Dark side of boxing

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — The news conference afterward was filled with the usual congratulations for the winners and talk about bigger things to come. Oscar De La Hoya was the promoter and he answered questions in two languages, thanked all for coming and declared the night a success.

Outside, HBO was hosting a poolside party at the MGM Grand hotel — casino for those lucky enough to get an invite. There was plenty of food, drink and laughter for the fight crowd.

Spirits weren't so high in a hospital not far from the glittering Las Vegas Strip. There, Leavander Johnson lay in the intensive care unit, his doctor unsure he would survive the night.

This was the dark side of boxing, the one that fans who pay $500 to sit ringside never see.

Johnson had hoped to end the biggest night of his boxing life with the IBF lightweight title belt still around his waist. He might have even enjoyed himself at the HBO party afterward.

Instead, he was in a deep coma that doctors induced to try to save his life.

"He was fighting for a world title, then a few minutes later here he is fighting for his life," said Johnson's father, Bill, who also is his trainer.

Johnson said his son knew the risks. He had been fighting for money for 16 years, and understood that taking punches to the head could be dangerous.

Unfortunately, as Mike Tyson likes to say, boxing is a hurt business.

But it shouldn't hurt this bad.

Johnson left the ring upright, not knowing that a blood clot was beginning to form, eventually swelling so much it moved his brain from the right side of his skull to the left. When his left leg began dragging on the way to the dressing room, though, it was clear something was terribly wrong.

The doctors of the Nevada Athletic Commission acted quickly. In the space of 40 minutes, they got him to the hospital and then into surgery. A surgeon took out a piece of his skull, and left it open so his brain would have room to swell.

The problem is, his injury is not an isolated one.

Four times in the last four months in Las Vegas, boxers have left the ring bleeding in the brain. One is dead; two others survived.

It's scary, but also puzzling. It might be a statistical anomaly, but doctors can't say. They just don't know enough about why some fighters are injured while others can spend a career getting hit in the head and show no ill effects.

The only thing they're sure of is it isn't something in the water.

"That is the biggest concern of all, that there have been so many of these," said Dr. Margaret Goodman, a neurologist and the ringside doctor who examined Johnson during the fight. "I think we need to evaluate the system from top to bottom."

What is clear is that Johnson took a savage beating in a fight that probably shouldn't have gone as far as it did, 38 seconds into the 11th round.

The 35-year-old fighter spent 16 years chasing a title, and finally won one on an upset in Italy in June. His reward was a $150,000 payday to defend his title on a pay-per-view card that included fighters with pedigrees such as Shane Mosley and Marco Antonio Barrera.

He fought valiantly, but was outclassed by Jesus Chavez, who rarely missed with punches that were thrown with bad intentions. Bill Johnson warned his son at one point he was going to stop the fight, but it continued until Chavez threw some two dozen unanswered punches and referee Tony Weeks finally called it.

Goodman immediately leaped into the ring to tend to the fighter. He said he was OK, didn't have a headache and wasn't dizzy.

"I'm just sad and disappointed," Leavander Johnson told the doctor.

In a way, he was lucky. If another half hour had been wasted getting Johnson into the operating room, he likely would have died, just as 75 percent or more of fighters with such injuries do.

But something is surely amiss. Four brain injuries in four months in one city is four too many. It's a wakeup call that blares at boxing regulators to try to find out why.

A good start might be brain scans before every fight, though promoters argue the cost would be exorbitant. As it is, no one knows if Johnson came into the fight with a brain problem, just as no one knows whether he was injured by a punch in the first round or the punches that finally ended the fight.

"Maybe we can't find the answer, but it's something that has to be done and done very quickly," Goodman said.

It's too late for Johnson. All anyone can hope is that his brain responds when doctors eventually wean him off the drugs that induced his coma.

But it's not too late for those who come after him.

Even in a hurt business, they deserve a little help.

USC's record stay in top spot

(AP) — Southern California's run at No. 1 in The Associated Press Top 25 reached a record-breaking level and Oklahoma, the team USC replaced in the top spot almost two years ago, was unranked for the first time since 1999.

With the Trojans top-ranked in the AP media poll released Sunday, USC has now been No. 1 for 22 straight polls, besting the record set by Miami from 2001-2002.

USC received 57 of 65 first-place votes. No. 2 Texas received the other eight first-place votes. LSU is No. 3 followed by Virginia Tech and Florida, rounding out the top five.

The Trojans took over the top spot Dec. 7, 2003, after then-No. 1 Oklahoma lost the Big 12 title game to Kansas State.

USC won the Rose Bowl to finish the season No. 1 in the AP poll, then began last season in the same spot.

The Trojans became just the second team to go wire-to-wire as No. 1 in 2004, started this season as the overwhelming top-ranked team and have done nothing to prove the voters wrong so far.

USC improved to 2-0 Saturday night with a 70-17 win over Arkansas at the Los Angeles Coliseum. Heisman Trophy winner Matt Leinart, Reggie Bush and the Trojans have scored 133 points.

But holding on to No. 1 is about to get tougher over the next two weeks as USC hits the road. The Trojans play No. 24 Oregon in Eugene next week and at No. 18 Arizona State on Oct. 1.

The Sooners are out of the rankings for the first time since Bob Stoops' first season as coach after a 41-24 loss to UCLA on Saturday.

No. 25 UCLA is one of four teams to move into the rankings this week, along with Oregon, Alabama and Michigan State.

The Spartans jumped all the way to No. 17 off their 44-41 victory over Notre Dame on Saturday.

Aditi Kirkhabwala of The Bergen Record in New Jersey had Michigan State 10th on her ballot, giving the Spartans extra credit for winning on the road.

"What it came down to is they're 3-0 and they won at Notre Dame, a place that was all revved up and excited about Charlie Weis," she said. "To go in there and withstand a charge, and beat a good team was very impressive."

Dropping out along with Oklahoma were Clemson, an overtime loser to Miami, Boston College and Fresno State.

In the USA Today coaches' poll, the top five is identical to the AP poll - USC, Texas, LSU, Virginia Tech and Florida.

The second half of the top 10 in the AP poll starts with No. 6 Florida State. Georgia is seventh, Ohio State is eighth, Louisville ninth and Tennessee is No. 10 after losing 16-7 at Florida.

No. 11 Purdue is followed by Miami, California, Michigan, Georgia Tech and Notre Dame, which dropped six spots to No. 16 after its first loss under Weis.

runs, 50, 40 home runs."

Braves general manager John Schuerholz thinks some players look smaller, but added, "It's not scientific at all."

"There may have been some relationship. I have no data on that," he said. "Obviously, all of the supposition is that performance-enhancing drugs allow you to perform at a higher level physically, whether it's speed, arm strength or power."

It's hard to discern whether increases and decreases in size are related to steroids. Tigers coach Lance Parrish talked about All-Star catcher Ivan Rodriguez.

"The only guy on this team who's really lost any substantial weight on this team is Pudge, but I think that was by design on his part," Parrish said. "People accuse him of being on stuff and then getting off it, and who's to know? But I know just from watching him from the first day of spring training, he's been on an unbelievable running regimen, diet and workout programs that are second to none. So I can see why he lost so much weight."

Panthers shut down Patriots

By David Aldridge
Knight Ridder

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — They have been so good for so long that when they look bad - really bad - it's hard to explain.

Locust attack?

Ides of September?

Meteor?

The answer is, the New England Patriots got their rear ends handed to them by a good Carolina Panthers team, 27-17, Sunday.

"Everybody has to do better," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "We have to do a better job of coaching and a better job of playing if we're going to beat a good team like Carolina. Simple as that."

This was one of those days when there wasn't any coaching magic, no players available to validate Belichick's usually razor-sharp coaching instincts. The two-time defending champs were smacked around pretty well in front of 73,528 at Bank of America Stadium.

"Bad day at the office," safety Rodney Harrison said.

Tom Brady, who's made cool and collected his natural pose during the Patriots' three Super Bowl runs, looked like any other quarterback who's running for his life against a fierce pass rush.

"They were blitzing everybody," Brady said. "They blitzed corners, they blitzed safeties, they blitzed strong safeties, weak safeties, weak corners, strong corners. It was everything. Every linebacker. I think we handled it. We knew what they were doing. ... We were getting guys picked up. It was just a matter of, from there, executing the plays."

Backup cornerbacks Duane Starks and Guss Scott, who had to take more snaps in a depleted secondary than usual - starter Tyrone Poole didn't even dress, and backup Randall Gay was injured in the first half and didn't return - didn't morph into Mel Blount and Lester Hayes, like reserves Earthwind Moreland and Hank Poteat seemed to do last season.

The Patriots' rejiggered offensive line, which lost guard Stephen Neal in the second half, didn't turn into the second coming of Forrest Gregg. Fuzzy Thurston and Jerry Kramer. Instead, it committed a half-a-dozen illegal procedure penalties and failed to open any meaningful holes for Corey Dillon (14 carries, 36 yards).

New England was only down by 20-17 late in the third quarter when Panthers end Mike Rucker beat a double-team, swatted at Brady from behind just as he was starting to pass and caused a fumble. End Julius Peppers recovered and ran to the Patriots' 12, setting up a 1-yard touchdown run by Stephen Davis.

That was one of three Patriots turnovers to go with 12 penalties. The Pats also allowed a 76-yard punt return that set up another short Panthers touchdown drive. Carolina wasn't mistake-free, either, but the Panthers were a lot more consistent on defense than the Patriots, and a lot tougher between the tackles.

Moss too unreliable

By Joe Posnanski
Knight Ridder

OAKLAND, Calif. — Two plays explain Randy Moss. The first happened in the third quarter Sunday, with the Chiefs beating the Raiders by a touchdown. Moss, Oakland's big-money wide receiver, raced by former Pro Bowl cornerback Patrick Surtain. He soared over former Pro Bowl safety Sammy Knight. He pulled the ball in, ran away from the defenders, 64 yards in 11 seconds. He scored the tying touchdown.

He was Superman.

The second play happened in the fourth quarter with the Chiefs up by a field goal. It was third and seven. Moss, Oakland's big-money wide receiver, ran precisely six yards, cut to the sideline, caught the ball and eased out of bounds without even making the slightest effort to pick up the first down.

He was Superdog.

Well, this is what you get when you build your team around Randy Moss. You can always tell a team's character by its star. There wasn't much that separated the Chiefs and Raiders on Sunday night in front of a classic Oakland sellout crowd that featured a few thousand empty seats. The Raiders more or less shut down the Kansas City running game.

The Chiefs just outclassed the Raiders, 23-17.

The Chiefs won because Trent Green hit some key passes, because the Kansas City defense tightened at the end zone and because Priest Holmes, the Chiefs' core player, got the first down that put the game away.

More, though, the Chiefs came into Oakland and won because the Raiders have absolutely no idea what to do with Randy Moss. They were so thrilled to get him. Moss jerseys sold in Oakland. People were dreaming Super Bowl. There are some, even with the Raiders 0-2, still dreaming Super Bowl.

Let me tell you: Randy Moss is the dancing frog from the cartoon. You're sure he'll make you millions. But when the lights are on, he clams up.

Oh, Moss will get his numbers: The guy's one of the great talents to ever play professional football. Sunday, Moss caught five balls for 127 yards and that special touchdown. Another touchdown was taken away by an offensive pass-interference call that was, let's just call it, questionable. He was, without a doubt, the focal point of the game.

But the Raiders were down six points with about 5 minutes left. They started at midfield. They ran 9 plays to win the game - 4 of those from the shadow of the Kansas City end zone.

Here's what they did: They threw to Jerry Porter three times. They tried to get the ball into the hands of running back LaMont Jordan six times.

And they did not throw the ball to Randy Moss once.

Why? Well, there were different opinions on that.

Opinion 1: Good Chiefs defense: "We did a pretty good job covering him," Knight said.

JEAN CONVERSES/INTRA/CONTA TIMES

Raiders wide receiver Randy Moss has provided the big plays that are expected of him this year, but he has also lacked consistent effort.

Opinion 2: There were other open receivers. "I guess they didn't want to force the ball into him," Surtain said.

Opinion 3: The Raiders don't know what they're doing. "Yeah, I was surprised they didn't throw to him," Chiefs safety Greg Wesley said.

I have a fourth opinion. The Raiders coaches and quarterback Kerry Collins have no idea whether they can count on Randy Moss. They know he might do something amazing, something you've never seen before. And they know he might stop running in the middle of his pattern for no reason at all. And since they can't count on him, they didn't.

Look: Chiefs president/general manager/CEO/godfather of soul Carl Peterson was watching Moss a lot during the game. He noticed, as all of us noticed, that when the ball wasn't going his way, Moss would take two steps and stop.

After the game, several Chiefs players were laughing about how Moss constantly waves his hand while he's running his patterns — "I'm open!" he seems to be shouting — the way the annoying kid on the playground does.

It's one thing to be an individual. It's one thing to want the ball. It's one thing to even care more about your own personal stats than you do victory.

But what makes Moss so difficult is, when it came down to it, the Raiders did not know what to expect from Moss. It was fourth down at the Chiefs' 10, game on the line, and the Raiders called timeout. Collins went to the sideline. He came back out. Moss was lined up to the left, and the ball was snapped. Everybody in the stadium was looking at Moss. Everybody except one guy. Collins never even gave Moss a passing glance. He looked right the whole way, tried to squeeze a pass in to Porter. The ball was knocked away, almost intercepted.

The Chiefs' offense came on the field. The Chiefs gave the ball to their longtime star, Priest Holmes. He gained 2. Then he gained 14. That was a first down. That was the ballgame.

That's a player you can count on.

"Randy Moss is a special player," Knight would say, and that's a good word. Special. He can do special things. But in the 0-2 Raiders' locker room, Moss wasn't talking. He had a Raiders bodyguard keeping people away. He's a special guy.

Meyer's comments cause stir

By Mike Bianchi
Knight Ridder

Every time he said it, you cringed.

And he kept saying it over and over.

New Florida coach Urban Meyer, after the biggest victory of his young coaching career Saturday night, went armed forces on us.

He was talking about Andre "Bubba" Caldwell and Ray McDonald, two star players who were injured in Saturday's victory over Tennessee. And for some reason only a football coach understands, he kept referring to them as if they were casualties of war.

A sampling of Meyer's postgame news conference:

"Bubba Caldwell is a soldier; he will have surgery [on a broken leg]. Ray McDonald is another fallen soldier . . . Those are two soldiers . . . We take care of our soldiers around here . . . When one soldier drops a rifle, the next one's got to pick it up and go a little harder."

Will somebody make him stop? Please?

Actually, to his credit, Meyer swears he's going to make himself stop. When asked Sunday about the many military comparisons he made Saturday, Meyer acknowledged that he's not coaching in Utah anymore.

"I guess I'm not used to being on the national stage," Meyer said sheepishly. "Even though we use the term [soldier] out of respect, you need to watch what you say, especially these days. I need to be more careful."

I know football coaches are prone to hyperbole. And I know football is a brutal, tough and, yes, sometimes even a life-threatening sport. But football is not war, and the guys who play it are not soldiers.

However, the Gators do have a guy on their team who was a soldier. His name is Cam Brewer, a walk-on wide receiver and former Marine who served in Iraq. Asked by a reporter if he is offended by his coach's comments, Brewer answered, "No sir."

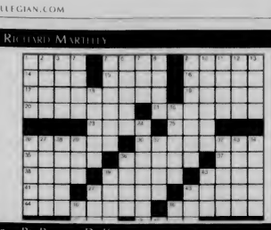
Always the good soldier.

"I've thought about it a lot," Brewer admitted, "and it actually motivates me when Coach Meyer calls us soldiers. You look at a football team and there are so many similarities to the military. The players are the enlisted men; the coach is the general. And then you have the camaraderie and the trust and the fighting and the sacrificing we do for each other."

Undoubtedly, football lends itself to military analogies more than any other sport as pointed out in the old bit by comedian George Carlin, who once lampooned: "In football the object is for the quarterback, otherwise known as the field general, to be on target with his aerial assault, riddling the defense by hitting receivers with deadly accuracy in spite of the blitz, even if he has to use the shotgun. With short bullet passes and long bombs, he marches his troops into enemy territory, balancing this aerial assault with a sustained ground attack that punches holes in the forward wall of the enemy's defensive line."

Carlin was kidding; Meyer was not. Although his "soldier" references weren't nearly as offensive as the ones made two years ago by former Miami tight end Kellen Winslow Jr., they still made you flinch.

All athletes and coaches should refrain immediately from correlating their make-believe war to real ones. In peacetime, the analogies are tacky. In wartime, they're just wrong. When fighting men and women are being sent home in caskets, it seems dreadfully self-important for a coach to liken his players to real soldiers.



A blitzing linebacker doesn't compare to an inescapable suicide bomber. Staring at a 3rd-and-7 pales in comparison to staring at an AK-47. And if Florida quarterback Chris Leak makes a bad decision, the consequence is a loss of down or yardage; not a loss of life or limb.

There's just no comparison to be made between football players and soldiers.

So can we please stop making them?

Busy off-season for Ford

Crowd of new faces for UM

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

With Midnight Madness (scheduled for Friday Oct. 14 at the Curry Hicks Cage) fast approaching, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has been working hard to prepare for the highly anticipated upcoming season.

Much of the anticipation has been due to the hiring of new coach Travis Ford in March. Ford has excited the fan base with the many players he has brought to UMass in his short time with the program.

Ford added six players to the roster during the off-season, three of which will be able to play this season, and three who can practice with the team this year but will not be eligible to play until the 2006-2007 season.

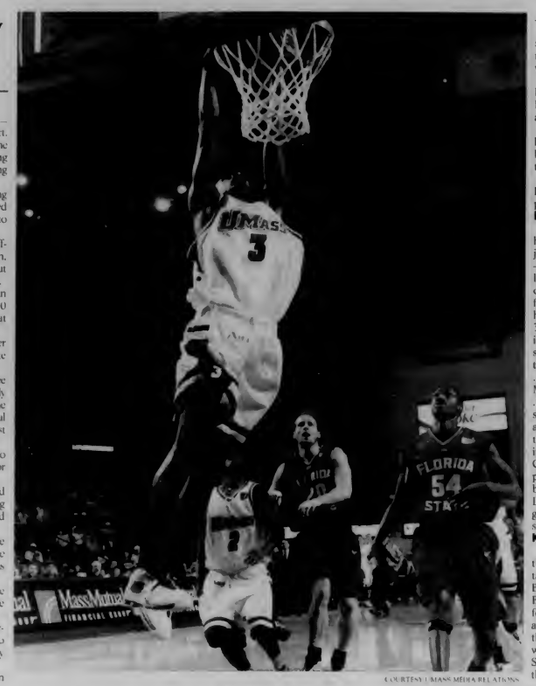
The first player that Ford brought in was freshman point guard Chris Lowe in April. Lowe averaged 12.0 points, 6.3 assists and 4.5 steals per game last year at Mount Vernon High School in New York.

Junior guard James Life was added a week after Lowe and should provide UMass with a legitimate perimeter scorer.

Life spent the last two years playing at Manatee Community College in Bradenton, Fla. and had a highly successful junior college career. He was third in the nation in scoring (25.4 ppg) and a second-team National Junior College Athletic Association All-American last season. He has two years of eligibility at UMass.

The final player that Ford added who will be able to suit up for the Maroon and White this season is junior swingman Brandon Thomas.

Thomas played for two seasons at Long Island University before sitting out last year while attending Santa Fe Community College in Gainesville, Fla., and has two years of eligibility remaining.



While those three players are expected to contribute this year, Ford's biggest off-season addition will have to wait a year to take to the hardwood at the Mullins Center.

The transfer of swingman Gary Forbes from the University of Virginia to UMass is the highest-profile recruit to join the team since Ford took over.

Forbes played in every game last year at UVA, averaging 9.4 points and 4.1 rebounds. Forbes will have to sit out this season, and will have two years of eligibility remaining at UMass.

Junior forward Maurice Maxwell will be joined by three new teammates this season, as UMass coach Travis Ford has been active adding players since taking over the program on March 25.

Bullen hurt

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

A 1-3 start to the season and an injury to its leading scorer and captain, Oral Bullen, left the Massachusetts men's soccer team running uphill going into its match with Cornell on Friday.

The Minutemen responded to this sudden adversity by sweeping the weekend — beating Cornell 2-1 and Navy 2-0 — and getting their record back to a respectable 3-3-0.

The Minuteman offense was without Bullen, who had two goals and one assist on the young season before going down with an ankle injury at Hartford in the Sept. 13 matchup against the Hawks.

The Minutemen travel to the University of New Hampshire on Wednesday to take on the Wildcats at 4 p.m. UMass is 26-11-3 all-time against UNH.

Military might

In Sunday's match against a 4-1-0 Navy team, which had two forwards with seven points on the season in just five games, redshirt freshman goalie Zach Simmons — who is substituting for an injured Nick Billman - tallied his first career shutout. Simmons posted two saves on eight shots in the contest. It was the first shutout for the Minutemen since Oct. 29 of 2004 . . . Simmons has started all six games for the Minutemen, making 31 saves . . . Senior defender Tim Kitchell offered an interesting sound byte after the victory against Navy, saying of his opponent's physical offensive attack: "It's the military. We knew they were going to be tough." . . . Since Rudd Field opened three years ago, the Minutemen have posted a 20-8-2 record, good for a .700 winning percentage . . . Sophomore Matt Lemire scored two goals last weekend, one against Cornell and the other against Navy, and has equaled his season total from last season (three goals) in just six games into the 2004 season . . . Lemire and freshman Prince Ofosu have picked up the slack since Bullen's injury, posting 10 shots on the weekend with two goals, both by Lemire. Ofosu's shot against Cornell goalie Steve Lesser led to freshman Mike Desantis' game-winning goal, as the rebound caromed off the goalie to the right have left a large opening in the wall to allow floodwater to continue to be pumped back side of the net where Desantis was waiting.

Kicked out

Injuries have been abundant for the Minutemen this season: they have suffered four losses, both captains — defender Craig Canavan and forward Oral Bullen — a senior defender and junior goalie Nick Billman. Canavan is out with a neck injury, and senior forward Ernie Bilattier and Bullen were both lost to ankle injuries. The timetable is uncertain for when the three seniors will be back, but junior Nick Billman will return shortly and is expected to split time with Simmons in the net . . . Bullen was recently named the UMass/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the Week

UMass takes on BU

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Correspondent

After starting the season 0-4, the Massachusetts field hockey team has come alive, winning three of its last four games, all on the road, improving to 3-5 on the year. UMass now returns home to take on No. 20 Boston University (3-3) in a non-conference matchup tonight at 6 p.m. The Terriers are third in the America East Conference, while the Minutewomen are sixth in the Atlantic 10.

UMass has just three more games before conference play begins Oct. 7 against Richmond, and will be looking to be playing its best field hockey when the conference schedule opens. Last year, the Minutewomen made it all the way to the Atlantic 10 Championship before being knocked off by Richmond.

Both teams are coming off a loss entering Tuesday's contest. UMass lost to Maine on Sunday 2-1, and BU fell to Northeastern on Friday 3-2 in overtime.

The Minutewomen will be trying to avenge last year's 1-0 loss, also at home, and turn around a negative trend against the Terriers. UMass has not defeated its cross-state opponents since the 2001 season, and is just 2-4 against them in the last six meetings.

UMass coach Patty Shea is confident her team can improve upon that mark tonight.

"BU will be a good opponent for us," Shea said. "They're strong in a lot of areas, but we can certainly meet the challenge."

Shea will be looking for continued solid play from young players, such as sophomore goalie Becky Letourneau, who has not allowed more than two goals in a game since Sept. 2 against No. 13 Northeastern.

Shea will also look for veteran leadership from seniors Katelyn Woolfrey, who had a goal against New Hampshire on Saturday, and Patricia Borneo, who tallied an assist in the same game.

The Minutewomen will need to stop BU's leading scorer, Sarah Shute, who scored all three of her team's goals in a game against Michigan State earlier this season.

Shute has five goals on the year, along with three assists for a total of eight points. The team will also be focused on goalkeeper Erin Prediger, who recorded a shutout last Sunday against Quinnipiac.

"We need to play our own game, control the tempo and not just react to what our opponents are doing," Shea said. "If we can possess the ball better throughout the game with better passing and hitting the open lanes quicker, we will do fine."

Home run totals down in MLB

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball had a brownout this year, with home runs dropping to their lowest level in eight years.

Is there a link between the power outage and tougher steroid testing?

"A lot of guys who were hitting them haven't been hitting them," Florida's Lenny Harris said. "I think the drug policy had a lot to do with it. It changed a lot of guys' diets. There are too many people having off years."

An average of 2.06 homers per game were hit through Sunday, according to the Elias Sports Bureau, down 8 1/2 percent from last season's final average of 2.25. The figure hasn't been so low since it dipped to 2.05 in 1997.

"I think it's cyclical," baseball commissioner Bud Selig said. "It's very hard to determine what variables are at work here. I don't think anyone really knows, and it's hard to draw a conclusion."

Some players point to the first year of steroid testing with penalties for first offenders. Nine players have been suspended for 10 days each for violating the major league policy, including Baltimore's Rafael Palmeiro.

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the players association, said linking steroid testing to the home-run average is too simplistic and pointed out that this year's level is only slightly lower than the 2.09 average for 2002.

"The numbers are essentially the same as they were three years ago, before there was testing, and in those three years players have been tested a massive number of times," he said. "You might want to consider other possibilities for home run production: the players are bigger because of training regimen, the ballparks are smaller, bat manufacture and design is different. There can be a slew of reasons."

Boston center fielder Johnny Damon cites better pitching.

"We haven't really faced too many chumps for pitchers this year," he said. "Young guys coming in have got some unbelievable stuff."

Several stars had huge power drops, many because of long-term injuries. San Francisco's Barry Bonds went from 45 to two as of Monday. Philadelphia's Jim Thome from 42 to seven and St. Louis' Scott Rolen from 34 to five.

"If I hit 12, the ratio would still be down," Bonds said.

Among those players who've been mostly healthy, Seattle's Adrian Beltre has fallen from 48 to 18, the New York Mets' Carlos Beltran from 38 to 15 and Washington's Vinny Castilla from 35 to 12. All three were free agents last winter and switched teams - and home ballparks.

Texas has done its part to ensure the home-run average topped 2.0 for the 12th straight season - a figure reached only once in 25 years before the current boom began in 1994. The Rangers have 152 homers at Ameriquest Field, a record for a home ballpark, and lead the major leagues with 252 overall - 12 shy of the mark Seattle set in 1997.

Bucking the trend are Houston's Morgan Ensberg, who has gone from 10 homers to 35, Atlanta's Andruw Jones, up from 29 to 50, and the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi, recovered from illnesses and back to 30 after hitting 12 last year. Jones is the first major leaguer to hit 50 since Thome and Alex Rodriguez in 2002.

"I know they've been saying a lot of stuff about a lot of people using illegal products to make themselves feel strong, but the game is still the same," Jones said. "All the guys still look strong, and there's no doubt in my mind they can still hit home

New Orleans braces as Hurricane Rita approaches

By Michael Rubinkam
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — The Army Corps of Engineers raced to patch New Orleans' fractured levee system Tuesday and residents were forced to decide yet again whether to stay or go as a new hurricane threatened to flood the city anew.

"First it was come back, then it was go," said Karen Torre, who returned to her Uptown home Tuesday to haul away debris and clean rotted food from her refrigerator before leaving again. "We're just trying to do what they tell us and get a few things done in between."

The new threat was Hurricane Rita, which strengthened into a 100-mph Category 2 storm as it barreled past the Florida Keys into the Gulf of Mexico. The storm was projected to cross the gulf and hit Texas by the end of the week, but engineers warned that even a glancing blow to New Orleans and as little as three inches of rain could swamp the city's levees as early as Thursday.

Mayor Ray Nagin, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and other officials strongly urged people along the Louisiana coast to be prepared to evacuate and said nearly 500 buses stood ready.

"The protection is very tenuous at best," said Dave Wurtzel, the Army Corps official responsible for repairing the 17th Street Canal levee, whose huge breach during Katrina caused the worst of the floods that wrecked the city.

In anticipation of another hurricane, the Corps drove a massive metal barrier across the 17th Street Canal bed to prevent a storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain from swamping New Orleans again. Although engineers into the lake, it will have to be closed quickly if Rita or another storm threatens.

"This is what we're going to have to rely on to protect this canal and this part of the city," Wurtzel said.

Government engineers and private contractors also worked around the clock across New Orleans to repair the damage to the system of pumps, concrete floodwalls, earthen berms and canals that protect the below-sea-level city.

In addition, the corps had 800 giant sandbags weighing 6,000 to 15,000 pounds on hand just in case, and ordered 2,500 more to shore up low spots and plug any new breaches. It was also putting pumps and other materials where they might be needed.

"If New Orleans was directly affected by a Category 1, I would be concerned ... I would pull my people out," said David Pezza, the top geotechnical engineer for the Army Corps. "These levees are greatly compromised."

Rita's threat to the levees already forced the mayor to suspend the phased reopening of the city and order a new round of evacuations. In some areas where bars, restaurants and shops were opening their doors for the first time since Hurricane Katrina, people were boarding up windows and getting ready to leave town again.

"I'm worried about getting more rain," Frank Wills said as he packed up to leave his 150-year-old Creole cottage in uptown New Orleans. "The ground's saturated, and a lot of the storm drains are clogged up with garbage. If we get much at all, I think you'll see flooding where you never saw it before."

AOL club holds Katrina fundraiser

By Ashish K. Sahu

The dinner fundraiser organized by the Art of Living (AOL) Club was a success with over 100 people from University of Massachusetts and the Five College area showing up to support the hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

Supplies and vegetables were donated by UMass faculty and a local farm.

The venue for the event had to be moved off campus at the last moment to the home of UMass finance professor, Atul Sheel, due to some misunderstanding regarding paperwork required by the Campus Center authorities.

A number of attendees were visibly annoyed at the lack of support and understanding from the campus center authorities to keep this event going on campus.

"They are doing this for a good cause, and here we are waiting for a room," said Ujjwala a graduate student at UMass. Some people who came to the event were car pooled to the off-campus venue.

The staff of Earthfoods volunteered to prepare the Indian food along with students and faculty of the Art of Living.

"The food was great and I'm glad we are able to help the victims," said Brett Lavallee, an attendee at the dinner.

The club plans to donate 50 percent of earnings raised from this event to the Chancellor Lombardi's office fund for Hurricane Katrina effort. The Remaining 50 percent will go to the trauma relief efforts of the Art of Living Foundation (AOLF) and International Association for Human Values (IAHV). AOLF and IAHV have extensive experience and expertise in providing trauma care to victims of natural disasters and terrorist attacks around the world.

The club plans to host its first annual 5K Walk for Youth for a "Stress-Free, Violence-Free Society" in Amherst on Oct. 16, 2005. A portion of funds from the walk will support AOLF's trauma relief work for youth affected by the hurricane.

Sen. leader to vote against Roberts

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid announced his opposition to Chief Justice-nominee John Roberts on Tuesday, voicing doubts about Roberts' commitment to civil rights and accusing the Bush administration of stonewalling requests for documents that might shed light on his views.

At the same time, two other Democrats edged toward expressions of support for Roberts, and Reid signaled he would not support any effort by die-hard critics in his own rank-and-file to block a vote on the nomination.

"I have reluctantly concluded that this nominee has not satisfied the high burden that would justify my voting for his confirmation based on the current record," the Nevada Democrat said on the Senate floor.

"The question is close, and the arguments against him do not warrant extraordinary procedural tactics to block the nomination," Reid said.

Taken together, the developments indicate Roberts remains on course for confirmation next week to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist and become the nation's 17th chief justice - but may draw significant Democratic opposition.

Reid had successfully urged fellow Democrats to refrain from taking positions on the appointment until after the completion of last week's confirmation hearings and the regular Tuesday closed-door meeting of the rank-and-file. He told some associates of his decision in advance, and then informed fellow Democrats of his intentions during the meeting.

Within minutes, other Democrats had begun to signal their intentions.

"I've not seen anything that would cause me to vote against" Roberts, said Ben Nelson, who represents Republican Nebraska and often crosses party lines to support President Bush's legislative proposals.

"I'm inclined to vote for Roberts unless something else comes up," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont. "It's a close call."

Reid said much the same about the Race viewed as reason for slow relief

By Felicia Mann
The Oracle (U. South Florida)

TAMPA, Fla. — Black leaders on the University of South Florida campus have said that the federal government's relief efforts came slowly because the majority of the Katrina victims were African American.

Kanye West, a popular hip-hop artist, raised a swell of nationwide discussion when he said during a telethon on NBC that "George Bush doesn't care about black people." Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice commented, saying that it is ridiculous to think this is a race issue.

According to a Wall Street Journal poll, West's opinion is a reflection of the opinions of many black Americans. Seventy percent of blacks and 27 percent of whites said that the federal government's response was slow because of the race of the majority of the victims. The poll also showed that 67 percent of white Americans and 27 percent of black Americans said race was not a factor. According to student body President Maxon Victor, there is no excuse for the slow response.

"The government and everyone know where the impoverished neighborhoods are," he said. According to Crystel Dawson, president of Black Student Union, it should have never taken five days for the government to respond.

"They're Americans," she said.

Even after the first week, Victor said the government still has not dealt with the major issues.

"Think socially what is going to happen to these impoverished neighborhoods," he said. These areas were social disasters before Katrina devastated them, said Victor, who believes Bush never cared about these areas before.

"I am not a Bush hater; maybe a basher," he said.

While he said that he feels this was a race issue, Victor does not want anyone to think that he is against white people.

"I am against a system, not a people," he said.

"I'm not surprised," said Dawson. "It seems that we are always the last ones to get a response to social and economic issues.

Towns take steps to curb West Nile Virus

By Michael Kuzelman
Associated Press

NORTH ANDOVER — Football pads weren't the only layer of protection players wore Saturday at North Andover High School. Athletes in both huddles also were encouraged to don insect repellent and long sleeves to guard against mosquito bites.

With the state reporting outbreaks of the mosquito-borne West Nile virus and eastern equine encephalitis, North Andover moved its game against Silver Lake High School from Friday night to Saturday afternoon to limit players and spectators' exposure to mosquitos.

"I think it's a smart move. We don't want mosquito bites killing people," Debbie Perez said as she watched her son, Eric, a North Andover wide receiver, warm up before the game.

The precautions are nothing new to the visiting team from Kingston, where an 85-year-old man died last month after he became infected with EEE.

David Whiting, whose son, Brandon, is Silver Lake's captain, slipped insect repellent into his son's equipment bag before Saturday's game.

"Hopefully he used it," Whiting said.

Gov. Mitt Romney issued a public health alert on Friday to warn residents to take precautions against mosquito bites.

The state Department of Public Health confirmed this month that a 33-year-old Boston woman and a 56-year-old Newton woman are the first two cases of West Nile virus in Massachusetts since 2003. The Boston woman recovered after five days in the hospital, while the Newton woman remained hospitalized Friday.

Also this year, the state has confirmed four human cases of EEE, all in the same general geographic area of the state, including the fatal case. The virus also killed a 5-year-old girl from Halifax and infected a 3-month-old girl from Plymouth and a 63-year-old Duxbury woman. New Hampshire, meanwhile, has confirmed five cases of EEE this year, including one death.

Public health officials said it's unusual, if not unprecedented, for so many cases to develop this late in the summer. The threat isn't expected to pass until the first frost kills the mosquitos.

"I never thought a year ago that I would be looking forward to the cold weather," said Thomas Trowbridge, chairman of North Andover's Board of Health.

Although the state has determined that aerial insecticide spraying will not help prevent infections, many towns in Plymouth and Essex counties have turned to ground-level spraying of areas near mosquito-rich wetlands.

After a horse in neighboring Haverhill tested positive for EEE, North Andover officials decided to start spraying athletic fields at area schools.

Bush denies N. Korean demand for reactors

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is dismissing North Korea's demand for civilian nuclear reactors and appears confident of a final agreement to end that nation's nuclear weapons program.

Still, the administration and South Korea foresee difficulties.

The next round of negotiations is planned for early November. In the interim, informal discussions among the six negotiating nations the United States, North Korea, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia — are expected.

"We are going to get this done," U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill told The Associated Press in an interview. He stressed that North Korea must agree to international restraints before its demand can be considered seriously.

In New York, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "we will not get hung up" on the North Korean statement.

"We can make progress if everybody sticks to what was actually agreed to," Rice said amid meetings with foreign ministers attending the U.N. General Assembly session. "I think we will just stick with the text of the Beijing agreement to which the North Koreans signed on," she said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan, meanwhile, said that if North Korea needed some time to reflect on the agreement reached this week, "We'll give it to them."

McClellan told reporters traveling with President Bush to survey Hurricane Katrina relief efforts that the agreement spelled out

Head of police academy transferred after hazing incident

BOSTON - The commander of the Massachusetts State Police Academy has been transferred following allegations of recruit abuse at the New Braintree facility.

Lt. Richard Lane was removed from his post on Friday, state police superintendent Col. Thomas G. Robbins told the Boston Herald. Lane, a 20-year veteran, was transferred to the Holden barracks.

Robbins also ordered the transfer of Trooper Paul Weinshenk, an instructor at the academy, and expanded an investigation into the facility that trains state police recruits.

"The entire academy needs to be looked at, the instructors at the academy, the system," Robbins told the newspaper. "My focus is to make sure we have the best training in place to uphold our values and integrity."

Robbins said he is aware of only one allegation of hazing _ an instructor who shoved recruits' heads in a dirty toilet bowl.

"I was overcome and upset when I heard about the incident," Robbins said.

A recruit who dropped out of the academy told the Herald he was ordered to wear a classmate's soiled underwear.

Although Lane was not involved in the alleged incident, he should have known about it, Robbins said.

"Lt. Lane was the commander of the academy. He was in charge when this incident took place," Robbins said. "When things like this happen, it needs to be truly vetted through the entire command staff."

Eric Baldwin, a five-year veteran and the instructor accused of the toilet bowl incident, was transferred to the Sturbridge barracks on Sept. 4, state police Lt. Sharon Costine said.

Weinshenk, a 12-year veteran, was transferred to the Grafton barracks, Costine said.

None of the transfers was punitive, and the troopers in question could be returned to their former duties depending on the outcome of the investigation, Costine said.

A replacement for Lane has not yet been named, Robbins said.

Robbins' expanded investigation includes having state police internal affairs investigators interview every one of the 174 remaining members of the class who started a rigorous, military boot camp-style 25-week program on June 27. Fifty-six had been questioned as of Monday, Costine said.

New York Times cuts 500 jobs, 4 percent of entire work force

BY SETH SUTEL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The New York Times Co. said Tuesday it would cut about 500 jobs, or about 4 percent of its work force, as part of an ongoing effort to reduce costs. The reductions come atop another 200 jobs that were cut earlier this year.

The Times said it expected 250 jobs at its main newspaper group to be affected, which includes the Times, the International Herald Tribune and the online operation of the Times. Of those job cuts, about 45 will come from the Times' newsroom, the company said in a statement.

Another 160 jobs will be cut from the Times' New England operation, which includes The Boston Globe and the Worcester Telegram & Gazette and Boston.com. The company did not provide a breakdown of those job cuts other than to say that 35 newsroom jobs would be cut at The Boston Globe.

The announcement came on the same day that The Philadelphia Inquirer and its sister newspaper said they would eliminate a combined 100 newsroom jobs because of lower circulation and revenue. The Inquirer plans to cut its editorial staff by 15 percent from 500 to 425, while the Philadelphia Daily News will cut its editorial staff 19 percent, from 130 to 105.

Both newspapers are published by Philadelphia Newspapers Inc., which is owned by Knight Ridder Inc., the nation's second-largest newspaper company.

Newspaper companies have been struggling with slow-growing advertising and a long-term decline in circulation amid changing media habits as more people go to the Internet for news.

Last week, Knight Ridder said its third-quarter earnings would fall about 20 percent because of declining ad sales, as well as higher interest expense and newsprint costs.

Knight Ridder cited weakness in its Philadelphia _ one if its biggest newspaper markets _ as well as Fort Worth, Texas and Kansas City as leading factors behind the profit decline.

The Times said it expects to begin making the staff cuts next month and complete them over the next six to nine months.

The company said in a statement that it plans to "manage the staff reductions in such a way that it continues to provide journalism of the highest quality, to function smoothly on a day-to-day basis and to achieve its long-term strategic goals."

Bush still hopeful of Korean agreement the steps needed to be taken. "Once they take those steps, then we would be prepared to talk further," he said.

Bush spoke by telephone with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun and they agreed that verification of North Korea's pledge to abandon its weapons program was critical, McClellan said.

Roh's office in Seoul took note of the prospect of "various difficulties" in resolving the nuclear issue and said the South Korean president told Bush he appreciated U.S. "flexibility" during the negotiations in Beijing.

State Department deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said: "There are going to be differences. That's to be expected."

Describing North Korea's demand as remote, Ereli said, "We're not even close to going that far."

North Korea said Tuesday it would not dismantle its nuclear weapons program until the United States first provided light-water reactors.

"Life is too short to overreact to every statement coming out of Pyongyang," Hill said upon his return from negotiations in Beijing. "It obviously was not a helpful statement. But it was not unexpected, either."

Still, Hill said North Korea's demand would be discussed at the next round, although he ruled out any such arrangement until North Korea rejoined an international treaty designed to limit the spread of nuclear technology and agreed to international supervision.

Under the tentative agreement, South Korea would provide North Korea with the energy it says it needs, Hill said.

"They know what they signed on to," Hill said. "We are not surprised by these sorts of statements. There probably will be more of them."

Asked if he was confident the breakthrough agreement would be concluded, Hill replied, "I wouldn't have supported it if I did not think it would get done."

He noted the agreement is not with the United States alone but with North Korea's neighbors. "That means something in Asia," he said.

Freedom House, a private group that champions democracy around the world, welcomed the agreement but its executive director, Jennifer Windsor, said there was a risk that international interest in promoting human rights would fall by the wayside.

"If North Korea truly wishes to join the community of nations and if its negotiating partners truly wish for a peaceful region, the country's egregious human rights record must be at the focus of serious discussions," she said in a statement.

Katrina evacuees flee New Orleans homes, again packed from Katrina, even though she did not evacuate. Weary from three weeks of recovery, she stood ready to flee Rita if she felt New Orleans was truly threatened.

"I don't have the energy for highs and lows any more," Sandars said. "I'm just maintaining day-to-day."

Even residents who have already been evacuated once faced the prospect of being uprooted again. At the Cajun Dome in Lafayette, emergency officials arranged to take the 1,000 refugees from the New Orleans area out on buses if Rita tracks north.

"Nobody here even wants to hear the word 'hurricane' right now," said Carlette Ragis, who has not been back to her home on Plaquemines Parish, south of New Orleans, since Katrina and has already enrolled her children, ages 11 and 7, in a Lafayette-area school.

"I'm concerned about them having to move again," she said. "I'm concerned about a lot of things. So many things are changing. We can't get any normalcy."

The call for another evacuation of New Orleans came after repeated warnings from top federal officials, including President Bush, that the city was not yet safe because of the lack of full electricity, drinkable water and 911 emergency service.

Nagin ordered residents who had slipped back into still-closed parts of the city to leave immediately. He also urged everyone already settled back into Algiers, the only neighborhood now open to returning residents, to be ready to evacuate as early as Wednesday.

But there appeared to be little effort to enforce Nagin's new evacuation order on Tuesday. Maj. Arnold Strong of the Louisiana National Guard said at this point, the National Guard is not planning to go through the neighborhoods to push people to evacuate. "We've been doing that for three weeks," he said.

And some of the 20,000 National Guardsmen patrolling the city were preparing to withdraw or move to higher locations if Rita approaches.

"We want to handle this in an organized way," Strong said, "so we're planning for the worst."

President Bush made his fifth trip to the Hurricane Katrina zone on Tuesday to meet with local business and political leaders in Gulfport, Miss., and received a briefing in New Orleans on preparations for Hurricane Rita.

Bush also appeared with Nagin amid tensions between the mayor and the federal government's top official in the city, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, over who is in charge, and conflicting information on whether people should come or go. At one point this week, Nagin said Allen apparently regarded himself as "the new crowned federal mayor of New Orleans."

Reid: 'Roberts delayed civil rights movement'

narrowness of the decision in remarks that nonetheless pleased women's groups and civil rights organizations that had feared he would support Roberts.

"This is a very close question for me. But I must resolve my doubts in favor of the American people whose rights would be in jeopardy if John Roberts turned out to be the wrong person for the job," he said.

Referring to publicly released memos that date to Robert's tenure as a Reagan administration lawyer, Reid said they showed the young attorney "played a significant role in shaping and advancing the Republican agenda to roll back civil rights protections."

"No one suggests that John Roberts was motivated by bigotry or animosity toward minorities or women," Reid added. "But these memos lead one to question whether he truly appreciated the history of the civil rights struggle. He wrote about discrimination as an abstract concept, not as a flesh and blood reality for countless of his fellow citizens."

Reid also said Roberts followed a "disingenuous strategy" at last week's confirmation hearings of suggesting that the views in the memos were not his own.

Democrats have tried without success to persuade the administration to release documents from Roberts' tenure as principal deputy solicitor general, a senior Justice Department job he held in the administration of the first President Bush. White House claims to shield the documents are "utterly unpersuasive," Reid said, adding that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had refused to meet with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., to discuss the papers.

"The failure of the White House to produce relevant documents is reason enough for any senator to oppose this nomination. The administration cannot treat the Senate with such disrespect without some consequences," Reid said.

Welfare, a focus on Beacon Hill

BY THEO EMERY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON - In the winter of 1995, Melissa Gilbarg was a pregnant teenager when welfare activists packed the hallways of the Statehouse, chanting and shouting to protest the state's new strict work requirements for recipients.

On Tuesday, Gilbarg drove to the Statehouse from her New Bedford home to convince lawmakers to keep benefits in place for thousands more people who, under federal guidelines, would have to go to work to keep their assistance.

"We're always fighting over the crumbs," said Gilbarg, 29, who now heads a New Bedford anti-poverty organization, the Coalition Against Poverty.

A decade after the state put into place some of the nation's strictest work requirements for welfare recipients, the wheels of reform have begun to turn quickly once again.

This time, lawmakers are rushing to meet an end-of-the month deadline to bring the state's program into line with the federal government's without cutting off benefits for thousands of people who rely on the assistance, such as teen parents and people with disabilities.

The intervening 10 years have bracketed huge changes in welfare in Massachusetts and nationally, said Christopher Jencks, a professor of social policy at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. While many people agree that able-bodied adults should work in exchange for benefits, he said, there will always be "pushing and pulling" about those that aren't.

"I think all these things are going to be contentious for years to come. We've had contention about who's disabled since as long as I've been around," he said. "It's a tough issue, and it should be a tough issue."

When the federal government gave then-Gov. William Weld permission to create strict new work requirements for welfare recipients that forced thousands of people off the rolls and into jobs, critics said the changes punished the poor. Protesters swarmed the Statehouse.

After the rules went into effect, the protests waned. Month by month, the state's welfare rolls dwindled, from 102,935 families receiving assistance to about 47,000 today.

After Massachusetts overhauled its law, the federal government put even stricter work requirements in place, and gave Massachusetts a 10-year waiver from the federal rules.

That free pass expires Sept. 30. If Massachusetts doesn't show that its welfare program is in sync with the federal government's, the state could lose about $459 million a year in federal welfare money.

"We are at a crossroads. We are presented with an opportunity to use what we have learned to engage our citizens and facilitate their transition to self-sufficiency," said Sen. Karen Spilka, D-Ashland. "At the same time, we must act to protect the Commonwealth from the potential loss of federal dollars."

About 14,000 people in Massachusetts who now get benefits wouldn't get them under the federal rules, including teen parents, people who are disabled or care for someone who is disabled, parents with kids younger than two, and pregnant women in their third trimester.

Gov. Mitt Romney has floated a proposal that closely mirrors federal rules, ending benefits for recipients who now don't have to work under state rules. That plan will likely go nowhere in the Democratic-controlled Legislature.

With Rita on the way, preparedness is key

New Orleans, in all the devastation that it is currently trying to sift through, may be facing yet another natural disaster, Hurricane Rita. As of now, Hurricane Rita is moving through Florida. While hurricane tracks can be hard to predict at times, we should all take a lesson from Hurricane Katrina and prepare for the worst.

Amherst College and the University of Massachusetts Amherst will be conducting fundraisers to help benefit the victims of Hurricane Katrina. College students, rightly so, are finally stepping up to the plate and realizing that a simple donation goes a long way. This act can also be viewed as taking preventative measures.

The Bush Administration has been continually criticized since Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans about how poorly they handled the situation. One of the best ways for the administration to cover all their bases and make sure this doesn't happen again is to anticipate the hurricane. The old saying "hope for the best but expect the worst" is one that this nation should adopt concerning natural disasters.

Katrina left a mark on this country and that mark is one that our nation as a whole will be trying to mend for a very long time. Now, the best thing we can do is to prepare New Orleans for the worst. The governor of Louisiana, Kathleen Blanco, in addition to already having to handle an extremely difficult situation, should minimize any potential threats to the state by organizing with emergency services, the Red Cross, etc. before anything disastrous happens. It is agreed across the board that New Orleans would not be able to handle another hurricane in its current state.

For students, doing whatever extra they can to help prepare the country for any future natural disasters will be extremely helpful when all those efforts are added up. The Red Cross is always looking for volunteers to assist with all the fundraisers and blood drives that they do, so if money is an object, then at least try and donate some time. Or, contact some of the non-profit organizations that are collected aid for the Katrina relief and see what you can do for them.

It's easy for college students to be absorbed in their own little world of classes, extracurricular activities and pre-real world drama. However, the thing that would be most helpful for the victims, and easiest for students, would be to discard that which you already know you don't need/want. For example, donating a pair of old sneakers or sweatpants that you've been trying to justify throwing out for months to a charity organization will mean a great deal to the sick and tired victims of New Orleans. It's not a lot to ask for and it's not a lot to do on students' parts. Either way, it's one small thing that can be done to make sure the country isn't blindsided by another disaster that leaves us scrambling at the last minute.

Facing the crisis of confidence

Andrew Freeman

Twenty six years ago, in the midst of an energy crisis and a standoff with Islamic terrorists, President Jimmy Carter stood before the American people and committed political suicide. In his televised speech, he noted that Americans were suffering from a "crisis of confidence," afflicting every institution from the church to the media to the government. We had forsaken hope and progress for consumerism and cynicism, he said. He called for conservation, for sacrifice, for faith in the nation and its people, declaring he knew that we could overcome the problem. Americans responded by voting Carter out of office.

Twenty six years later, we are in the middle of an energy crisis, with gas prices soaring, and we are threatened by violent Islamic fundamentalism. There is a war; a hurricane has destroyed one of our cities. There are innumerable issues and crises to be dealt with. But there will be neither speeches for conservation, nor criticisms of the American public.

It is an unspoken rule, nowadays, that no leader should suggest sacrifice for our society. When we were attacked on Sept. 11, George W. Bush told us to rescue America by continuing our frenetic spending. Despite our military's lagging recruitment, no effort has beenmade to reimpose the draft, because the political result would be disastrous.

Indeed, the whole response to Sept. 11, which showed a threat to the very survival of this nation, was subdued. National security became business as usual, with homeland security funding becoming fodder for pork-barrel projects, like bolstering security at ports in landlocked states. By pursuing our enemies abroad, we would not have to face them here, the president said, and we would not have to face our own demons here, his actions tell us. The underlying message is, calm down, relax and let the adults handle everything.

We have become a nation of children, our selfishness and immaturity shining forth through everything, from pandering politicians to our commercialistic culture.

We have become a nation of children, our selfishness and immaturity shining forth through everything, from pandering politicians to our commercialistic culture. We shun the world around us, overly fearful of our neighbors, while burrowing deeper into electronics - the omnipresent I-pods and televisions and computer screens. We desperately seek happiness in products and pixels, and society declines around us.

For when the public is dispirited, uninformed or disengaged, corruption thrives. It took Hurricane Katrina to reveal that Michael Brown, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency - the agency that ineptly responded to the disaster - was a political appointee with no experience in disaster management, but plenty with horses. But before Brown there was Bernard Kerik, the nominee for secretary of Homeland Security, who had tax and legal problems, including an outstanding warrant for his arrest, in addition to having two extramarital affairs and hiring an illegal immigrant as a nanny. Our leaders will continue to make mistakes unless we hold them accountable.

The problems facing America require more than sound leadership, however. They demand good citizenship, which means more than just casting a ballot every four years. We need to stay informed, to get involved in our communities and in charitable efforts. We need to break our addictions to television and electronics, not to mention damaging substances like drugs and alcohol. We must be prepared to bear inconveniences and make sacrifices to benefit others, as those who took in displaced victims of Katrina have done.

The hurricane, like 9/11 and the Asian tsunami, has provided Americans with an excellent opportunity to reevaluate themselves. Already there has been a burst of charitable donations and other efforts. If such activism extended beyond the immediate crisis, into our deeper crisis of confidence, then there is no limit to what we could accomplish. But if we fall into old patterns, losing interest in reality and turning to reality T.V., withdrawing into desperate lives of getting and spending, and tolerating corruption because we expect it, then there is no limit to how far America will fall.

Don't spread yourself too thin

Becky Martins

There comes a point when an over-active lifestyle becomes anything but rewarding.

It is quite easy to group people into a variety of personality types. There are those who are satisfied with doing the minimum to get by. These individuals often possess talents that go unnoticed due to their lack of life involvement and desire to do well.

Next, we have those who balance their everyday existence with relaxation and participation. Making up the majority of society, these people have ambitions, yet do not overextend themselves in pursuit of achieving them.

Finally, there are the extremists, or most commonly referred to as, the "over-achievers." We are all too familiar with these types, whose schedules make others exhausted by simply hearing of them. They often participate in sports, make the Dean's List, volunteer and work multiple jobs -simultaneously - but insist their lives are far from overwhelming. In fact, to one of these individuals, being busy is what we know. And yes, by "we," I am categorizing myself as one of them.

Growing up, emphasis was constantly placed on "succeeding," whether it was in the classroom, on the field or as an active member of society. At an early age, I came to believe my father who constantly instisted my fourth grade third term report card really could affect my college acceptance, among other things. Thus, from the start, I was almost programmed to take pride in my academic life.

I learned early on what it meant to prepare and do well, whether it was for a test, a piano recital or in field hockey games and track meets. But such rewards and constant compliments stopped coming for my achievement and success became expected. No longer was I forced to do well. I instead became terrified of failure and obsessed with perfectionism: a lethal combination.

Once in college, I thought my lifestyle would change. No longer would I be participating in every club, take highly-demanding courses and balance all this with an active social life. Yet, when freshman year came, I once again found myself signing up for whatever came my way. It was not long before my college schedule mirrored that of my younger years. Free time became sparse. Stress became an all too familiar companion.

It is safe to say everyone has a breaking point. We may feel we are impervious and always able to handle life's curveballs. However, regardless of how strong an individual may appear, even he or she has a weakness. Recently, I found mine upon learning I am not as invincible as I thought.

It is safe to say everyone has a breaking point. We may feel we are impervious and always able to handle life's curveballs. However, regardless of how strong an individual may appear, even he or she has a weakness.

Monday is by far my worst day of the week. I have classes between the hours of 11 a.m. and 8 p.m. as well as shifts working as a writing tutor at the writing center, ample homework and a Daily Collegian column due by midnight. Typically, there is little time left on weekdays for myself. Yet somehow, earlier this week, I found myself not only with a normal crazy Monday schedule, but three extracurricular meetings mixed in, as well. Of course, I didn't try to rearrange my plans to better accommodate myself, or more specifically, my sanity. Instead, I assumed the day would be stressful, but I would just deal.

Upon living out the day from hell, I realized I wasn't as good of a schedule-juggler as previously thought. I walked around campus in a daze: more attentive to my future day's plans instead of my current surroundings. I found myself skipping out of classes early in order to make all my appointments, feeling awful leaving classes that only meet once a week before their completion. When at my numerous meetings, my mind was elsewhere, thinking of excuses to tell my next professors why I was late. As the day progressed, I began to wonder why I did this to myself. My future plans didn't even immediately include graduate school or anything in need of an extracurricular-strong resume. Yet, I was acting as if I had something to prove, wherein reality, my shaky life was completely by choice.

Reading this over, it sounds strange to be taking an angle which discourages an over-active lifestyle. Far more people need to make use of their lives, get involved and find a passion. We, as UMass students, should make use of our school's ample activities, take the time to do well in school and challenge ourselves in all aspects of life. However, it is also important to remember other things suffer when people spread themselves to thin. We may intend to diversify our life with numerous interests, but realistic goals should be kept in the process. And as for all the "over-achievers' out there, we really don't have anything to prove. Perfectionism may be a driving force, but it should not lead us down a path of self-destructive behavior.

UMass: the good story

S.J. Port

In their efforts to improve the University of Massachusetts' reputation as well as improve school spirit, the administration promotes community members "telling the good story" about their UMass experiences.

When the Faculty Senate was first introduced to then Interim President Jack Wilson, on Oct. 17, 2003, he shared several stories about his attempts to always tell the UMass story wherever he was, whether it be at a neighborhood barbeque or a meeting with Senate President Robert Travaglini, as a strategy to improve the University's repute within the Commonwealth's critical eye.

Wilson's goal to share the wealth of positive experiences in order to improve the school's reputation is a valid, timeless and affordable yet invaluable public relations campaign.

However, while students shoulder most of the blame publicly for the University's reputation, due to flashy news images of riots and drunken misconduct, the administration has turned a blind eye to its involvement in disparaging the reputation of UMass.

Strangled by bureaucracy and idiocy, the administration itself is an immediate area of concern for anyone involved in UMass. Take transfer students for example: left to rot in ill-equipped, unacceptable housing arrangements they call home to friends and family to share their woes. Word spreads: "Don't go to UMass, you'll end up in a hotel for your first semester."

Wilson's goal to share the wealth of positive experiences in order to improve the school's reputation is a valid, timeless and affordable yet invaluable public relations campaign.

This spring as a friend prepared to transfer to UMass' we talked at length about the ins and outs of the University and how she could make the most of all it had to offer.

"Ashley" applied on time. All of her paperwork, from financial aid to housing, was in on or before deadline. She was set to go - that is, until she hit the administrative wall head on.

After she sent in her orientation request Ashley heard nothing and called to follow up. The New Students Program office told her that all regular orientation sessions were already full and that she should plan on attending the late session the day before classes started in September. Asking what she should do about registering for classes, Ashley was told to visit a professor in her department for help choosing courses.

Ashley drove the two hours, taking time off from work, met with the helpful faculty member and returned to her car. On her windshield was a welcome sign from parking services: her very first UMass parking ticket. Despite filling the meter she ran out of time while meeting with the professor. Frustrated she returned home to try her hand at SPIRE course registration, something most students do with the help of orientation guidance.

It was early August and Ashley had yet to receive any assistance from the University as to how to pick classes - she didn't think it prudent to wait until Sept. 6's late orientation date to register for classes as the person in the New Students Office told her to do via phone when she called them looking for more answers. Thus, she called the New Students Office and obtained the Registration Access Code needed to register with SPIRE.

A few days later she received a letter from the University that was supposed to contain her RAC number. She realized that while the paper said, "The number in brackets below is your RAC ID," comically, the brackets below were empty: the mailing had been sent without applying a number.

At this point Ashley managed to navigate SPIRE on her own, despite the University not yet having completed the evaluation of her transcripts from her former school. These transcripts were given to the University in May; however even at the end of August they were not evaluated and transferred to SPIRE, leaving Ashley guessing at what requirements had been fulfilled and what had yet to be done. She was sure of only one thing: 36 transferring credits made her a sophomore.

It was Aug. 4 when the University finally called Ashley - for a change. It was University Housing calling and although they admitted to legally being required to house Ashley due to her sophomore status, they sent Ashley into a tailspin by announcing they did not have any available housing - permanent or temporary - for her. This was the breaking point: where would she live? Moving from a private campus of 2,000 to a public campus of 20,000 was terrifying enough; not having a place to call her own was outright devastating.

The woman Ashley spoke with said singles might become available but that they would add an additional cost to her bill since singles cost more than doubles. Ashley's parents agreed to help her scrape together the last minute extra money if the University could find a single for her, but when she called back first thing the next morning the next person she spoke to in Housing said she was unlikely to be placed in a single, let alone get housing. It was suggested by Housing that Ashley wait until the day before classes when they had figured out who dropped out last minute and what space they had.

Ashley wondered how they expected her to seek housing on Sept. 6 as well as attend the all day late orientation session. She was reassured that if they did find her temporary housing they hoped to have students moved out into permanent assigned rooms before the end of five weeks.

This kind of poor organization, dearth of communication and lack of sensible preparedness among important administrative groups, such as Admissions, Housing and the New Student's Program, does not tell the "good story" about UMass. In fact it contributes seriously to the dis-reputation of the University at large. How can the University administration expect new students to feel welcome and spirited about their new school - to go out and spread the good word about UMass - when the administration stands in such a stark contrast to anything Wilson is trying to convey across the Commonwealth? Unfortunately, most students' first official orientation with the University is the administration, leaving a bitter taste in their mouths making it almost impossible to spread that good word.

Different faces of UMass students

Duncan Devlin

There are basically five social classes at UMass: the Brains, the Athletes, the "Hobbyists," the Mindless Wanderers and the Effort Challenged. All of these groups contend with each other for some sort of domination of the social structure of the school, though no one is really willing to admit to it. Instead, everyone claims to not care and stick to their own little groups in some sort of hold-over from high school, paying little more than lip-service and dirty looks to anyone not following their norm. Here is a short list of their attributes; maybe you can find where you fit in.

The Brains.

Do not even bother competing with them. These are the students who seem to know absolutely everything about any given subject without ever having learned it. In freshman math classes, they are the ones who are already knowledgeable about graduate math, and in English classes, they seem to have already published a book or two. They may be nice people, willing to offer their expertise to help in any way possible, or they may be quite snobby, being much too good to help (or be seen with) lowly undergrads. In any case, these people fit perfectly into college life.

The Athletes.

I do not use the word, "jock," here. Most of them did not make the cut for UMass. I am referring to the people who seem to care enough about their bodies to exercise every day, eat healthy and often still maintain a respectable GPA. A bit of genetic blessing does not hurt in getting a spot in this category. By December, most of the athletes are easily recognizable, taking the same routes at the same times every day, and also by their impressive bodies, which they often find a way to show off in any weather. They often become the envy of those around them, who wish they could have the same kind of bodies, but just cannot find the time (or effort) to work out.

The "Hobbyists."

This is a catch-all term, referring to those who have found something constructive to do with their free time. They are the ones who set up tables in the campus center, that kid down the hall who plays guitar all the time or any member of just about any club on campus. Those who study hard, though not necessarily being Brains, fit here nicely. A shy person who builds matchstick houses does too. A kid who can pound a keg in two minutes (as a "hobby") does not. In general, these people have some sort of purpose in life, even if others fail to understand it.

The Mindless Wanderers.

They are the ones wandering all over campus or through dorm hallways, showing up anywhere from half an hour early to half an hour late to class for lack of anything better to do. The two primary concerns for this individual by college have become sex and alcohol, though food comes in a close third (primarily Wings). Rather than pay attention in class, they can often be heard talking about last Friday's party, beer-pong or some hot girl they can only identify by chest size, often using half-syllables and a barely understandable speaking manner. Many of you are probably reading this column in the back of some lecture hall right now. These people will come to hold the same position in life that they do at UMass: nobodies.

The Effort Challenged.

Due to some circumstance early in life, these people have been rendered unable to exert even the smallest amount of effort in any way. Homework is too time consuming (not that they are doing much else anyway), reading is too difficult and classes are too far away. They can usually manage to operate a remote control or video game console without too much of an issue, but do not expect too much beyond that. Thankfully, we find rather few of these people left at UMass by the end of their freshman year, as a semester-long binge of drinking, smoking and F's usually brings them to a lifelong career at McDonalds.

I offer this only as a guide. Not everyone fits perfectly into any one group, and many span two or three. We do not see too many Brains who are Effort Challenged, but certainly being a Brain and an Athlete is not out of the question (time permitting), and many Hobbyists keep themselves in shape while indulging themselves. We all manage to mindlessly wander from time to time, and there are those days when even the most motivated of people just do not want to get out of bed. Do not seek me out to ask if you are a Mindless Wanderer or Effort Challenged; if you have to ask, you already know.

Who needs the metric system?

Gilad Skolnick

We are living in an island of sanity surrounded by a world not governed by our simple rules of freedom but by logic incomprehensible to our minds. After spending the past year studying abroad in Jerusalem, Israel, and traveling around Europe and the Middle East, I repeatedly suffered from the primitiveness of the far inferior measuring system of the rest of the world, the metric system and international system.

They love to gloat about their new metric way of doing things, but if there is one thing that I learned over the past year, it's the superiority of the U.S. Customary Units, also known as English or Standard Units, such as inches, feet, yards, etcetera. There's a clear reason why there's one super power in the world, the most successful country ever, the U.S., and that is it's unwillingness to blindly follow the metric system, as the rest of the world has.

America is not a sheep, and I simply cannot sit idly by while the ignorant speak fondly of a way to measure things that baffles the mind. Most Celsius loyalists can only argue that zero, being freezing, is easier to remember than Fahrenheit's 32, and 100, being boiling, is easier to remember than whatever it is in Fahrenheit, but anyone who can't remember a few simple numbers isn't worthy of my respect.

Furthermore the Fahrenheit temperature scale is "people-friendly." Zero degrees F. (-18C) is "very cold," while 100 degrees F. (38C) is "very hot," something most people would agree with, and what would Michael Moore's latest film Fahrenheit 9-11 be called if it wasn't for our beloved system? Celsius 488.333333333333? A lot less people would have seen the film and the Democratic Party would have suffered even more so.

A common criticism of the U.S. Customary Unit system is that it is not on a base 10, which some state is easier to remember, but we forget that time, of all things, is on a base six, and only the fools amongst us cannot figure out how to read a clock. Not to mention that Anders Celsius, who some would say was a rampant alcoholic and a womanizer, is not a role model that we should have. I much prefer Daniel Gabriel Fahrenheit, an educated hard working honest man and a lover of freedom, as a person to trust for my temperatures.

Leave the metric system for the scientists and mathematicians to meddle over, but it is plain sadistic to try to dump such a system on us. Perhaps we should all learn nuclear physics as well?

Leave the metric system for the scientists and mathematicians to meddle over, but it is plain sadistic to try to dump such a system on us. Perhaps we should all learn nuclear physics as well?

So why have such countries chosen the pitiful metric system, you ask? When it comes to measuring areas, it seems clear, that this was pushed on by imperialist colonialist evil European countries, which are much smaller. Clearly 31 miles sounds smaller than 50 kilometers, a system with bigger numbers boosts the ego of these pathetic smaller countries.

Our American system is also always full of delightful new surprises certain to brighten any boring afternoon, with many units of measurements that are waiting to be learned by you. They also allow for creativity, as rather than saying that you live three miles from here, you could simply take a more creative angle and state that you live one league from here, or if you are feeling daring, 24 furlongs from here, or better yet, 240 chains away, the equivalent of 960 poles, each pole being a quaint 5 1/2 yards.

Each one of our units is a perfect size, ideal for everyday use. They're easier to pronounce. Fahrenheit is a more precise scale, and with the average highway speed of 60 mph, one can instantly make the conversion of a mile a minute, to easily figure out how long it will take you to get there. This is an obvious ploy by the imperialist capitalist European powers who have forced the metric system on the world to limit the amount of information that people have on where they are and where they're going: keeping the masses confused.

Perhaps this doesn't concern you? Many of you are selfish individuals who don't care about the evil that is plaguing our planet. For the rest of you all, simple measures can be taken such as burning all rulers with the metric system on them, smashing those centigrade ridden thermometers, and embracing the system of measurements that our great presidents fought so valiantly to keep, such as Washington, Lincoln and Harding. The metric system is simply anti-American, anti-freedom and anti-liberty. It's full of annoying decimals and has no place in our homes. In fact, the only people in the world to set foot on the moon were brought up and back down safely by the U.S. using U.S. customary units, not metric. If it's good enough for winning the space race against the Russians, it's good enough for me.

What happens while not looking

Mike Anmuth

Anyone who has had a conversation with me for longer than five minutes knows that I was a transfer student to UMass in the fall of 2004. But, this column isn't about where I came from. This column is about college in general, and about the fact that college might not be everything you think it will, but it might turn out to be much better.

I'll be the first to admit it, I was an idealistic guy back in high school. I had the perfect plan for college set up in my mind - I was going to live off campus with some buddies, I would get involved in my university through extracurricular activities like I had done in high school, and I would be able to fit perfectly between classes, work and having a social life. Of course, none of these things happened to work out quite the way I had pictured in my mind and so I was left with a very empty college experience.

Somewhere in the middle of this story, people usually stop me and ask, "So what did you do at that point?" Considering that point lasted for the first two years of my college experience, obviously the answer is not much. I yearned for a better college. I did mathematics in my head of how many credits I was willing to give up to transfer elsewhere. I looked at different places to live and different campuses of the school from which I transferred, but none of it seemed right inside my mind.

I had my feet firmly planted on the ground, but my head was in the clouds in regards to the ideals I had set for college. Since my current college didn't fit my idea of what a college life should be, (that is an idea from watching movies and television and listening to friends who went far away to college tell me their raucous adventures on Saturday nights) I felt that I needed to be like "every other college student." I remember telling my parents that "every other college student" must be living that lifestyle, so my decidedly anti-lifestyle school just had to go.

I yearned for a better college, I did mathematics in my head of how many credits I was willing to give up to transfer elsewhere, I looked at different places to live and different campuses of the school from which I transferred, but none of it seemed right inside my mind.

By this point, people are generally tired of the building up and promptly ask me, "So that's how you ended up at UMass?" Well, somewhat. I took time off to travel. I did a lot of driving. I visited a lot of potential schools. I listened to a lot of country music from a lot of different radio stations, and I formed ideas that I would use later in writing columns much like this one. I kept the ideal of college in my head while the idea of college lost practicality somewhere on the open road. If "every other college student" was living the life I wanted, then I had to find a school which would support such a lifestyle.

When I arrived bright-eyed and bushy-tailed to the UMass transfer student orientation, I felt too old for orientation (I was 21 at the time) and that I was an old pro at this college stuff. I read about the many student organizations. I tried to cipher out the difference between Dickinson Hall and Dickinson Dormitory. I went to random bars uptown. I looked for that ideal every place I could, and I still didn't find it.

My friends, the same ones who had told me those raucous stories about their Saturday nights during freshman year, told me that the experience didn't exist. I had come in as a transfer, not a freshman. I had decided to live off campus again as a transfer rather than living on campus, plus my activities that I had enjoyed at my previous school weren't conducive to the Animal House image that was so deeply ingrained in my psyche.

I told them that I was outgoing. I would meet people and party all of the time. I would be in the situation which I imagined since I had began college as a freshman. I did meet people and I have absolutely wonderful friends here, but all of that searching, all of that seeking, and I have found that to enjoy college, you don't need to model it after an ideal, but rather you need to enjoy your experiences.

I won't tell you that I learned this lesson instantly, it did take some time. It blindsided me on a random Tuesday and while I was searching for this "wonderful college life" inside my head, fate took hold of me and gave me great friends and good experiences. That, my friends, is the true ideal, and this columnist knows first hand how superior it feels when the idea of college and the ideal of college are the same.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BETTER POLICING OF POLICE

The fact that a UMass police officer reports to the FBI, as discussed in Kelan Steel Lowney's recent column ("Student surveillance still here," Sept. 19), is no new revelation. It was widely covered, including in The Collegian, when it was discovered about three years ago. That the officer in question is on the university's payroll, that he has been involved in profiling foreign faculty members, and that in his work for the FBI there is no accountability to his superiors either in the police department or in the campus administration are all points of fact. That after the outcry that greeted these revelations, the issue has fallen out of our consciousness, is cause for concern.

The few who are acquainted with the history of the FBI will appreciate that Police Chief Barbara O'Connor's decision to voluntarily cooperate with the Bureau is a (perhaps uncharacteristically) atrocious judgement call. Those who are not so acquainted are referred to two studies of declassified FBI documents by scholars Ward Churchill and Jim Vander Wall. Though heavily censored, the documents reveal a history of harassment and intimidation of organizations engaged in constitutionally protected political activity, hounding, threats and sometimes murder of individuals not accused or even suspected of any criminal involvement; and perhaps most shocking of the FBI's known activities, the operating of death squads on Indian reservations, which murdered dozens of American Indian activists in the 1970s.

If we are to challenge the federal government for spending money to kill Iraqis instead of taking care of our nation's needs, and our governor for prattling about wiretapping mosques instead of funding the contracts of UMass workers, we should also challenge the university administration on its decision to have campus police personnel work with a terrorist organization in place of serving and protecting the UMass community.

COLLEGE FUNDING IN DANGER

This coming month, in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Congress will be deciding their budget. Monday's article ("Federal Spending Cuts in View") quoted U.S. Representative Spence as saying, "We need to rebuild." "We can find the cuts in Washington, D.C. to do that, I really believe that." Apparently, Mr. Pence and others in Congress believe those cuts can be found in higher education.

Congress is proposing a $9 billion cut to college students, the largest cut to student aid in our nation's history. This will increase the average student's debt by $6,000. Think of it, every friend you know who takes out loans will have to pay an additional $6,000. This is not a solution to our budget problems. Our representatives and senators have to reject this budget and come up with one that makes education affordable.

The first thing you can do is call your representative (Congress' switchboard number is 202-224-3121) and tell them to vote against this budget. After that, you can take action with MASSPIRG. We're working with a national campaign to fight this budget (check out studentsagainstcuts.com). Students need to stand up and defend their education because if we don't, no one will.

BIG GOVERNMENT'S DOWNFALL

It's now official: the Republican Party has officially become the party of Big Government.

As noted by the non-partisan, libertarian Cato institute in its study "The Grand Old Spending Party," since 2001, government spending has gone up from $1.86 trillion to $2.48 trillion, a 33 percent rise in four years.

Government Spending in terms of GDP has grown from 18.5 percent at the end of the Clinton/GDP split government years to 20.3 percent under the total Republican hegemony. That may not seem like much of an increase, but keep in mind that when Clinton entered office, government spending was 21.4 percent. That means under a supposedly liberal executive branch, government spending was cut by nearly four percent in eight years. It has grown three percent under an allegedly conservative government in less than five years.

GOP apologists will undoubtedly make the argument that the necessary costs of terrorism defense and homeland security (as well as the costs incurred for our disastrous adventure in Iraq) are the main culprits of government growth. Yet how can they explain the fact that even with defense expenditures taken out of the equation, the average growth of domestic government expenditures under Bush is five percent - more than any president since Lyndon Johnson.

And just what have we, the taxpayers, gotten for the largest government in over 40 years? For starters, the biggest federal debt in history, currently estimated at $7.9 trillion. There's also the million-dollar traffic light in California, and the $223 million bridge being built on an island in Alaska that will service a total populace of 50 people.

What our new big government has not gotten us, as clearly evidenced by the Gulf Coast devestation, is effective solutions to real problems. Emergency management and homeland defense funds have been sliced, diced and utilized on everything except disaster prevention. Despite sharp increases in entitlement spending, largely on healthcare, more Americans lack insurance now than ever before.

With the GOP no longer interested in smart fiscal stewardship, it is incumbent upon Democrats to take up the mantle fiscal responsibility, resisting the temptation of "me-toism" and demanding real sacrifices, by the wealthy in terms of tax increases and by the middle class and poor in domestic spending freezes. Progressives will undoubtedly balk at the latter suggestion. But we must remember that you cannot pay for a welfare state with a bare cupboard, which is what we will have if the Grand Spending Party continues its pork feast.

'Brace yourself' for Howie Day

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

Yes folks, it's true. It's no longer just a rumor circling throughout the Facebook and Livejournal, or an obscure bulletin board in the Campus Center. Howie Day is coming to UMass. Ladies, get yourselves ready and made up, and gentlemen, don't roll your eyes just yet at another "pretty boy guitar player." One of the most underrated singer/songwriters of the day is set to take UMass by storm this weekend at the (relatively) intimate Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Howie Day
Fri. Sept. 23
8 p.m.
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
UMass
$10 for UMass students

After spending the summer touring and opening for various artists, including a stint with the Dave Matthews Band which brought him to Hartford in June, Day hits the road solo this fall. Day will embark on a 15 campus tour, which kicks off the 22nd of September at Boston University, bringing Day back to his roots. After BU and UMass, the tour will continue to various other East Coast universities throughout the upcoming months.

It's been an outstanding year for Day, his latest album, "Stop All the World Now," went gold, he had a monster hit this summer, a little song called "Collide" (perhaps you've heard of it), and was recently nominated for three Boston Music Awards, including Act of the Year, Male Vocalist of the Year and Song of the Year ("Collide".) It's hard to imagine how Day can top himself in the upcoming year, but he undoubtedly will.

Die-hard Howie fans know the story behind his rise to fame, but for newcomers to the Howie Day phenomenon, here's a brief history. Born in Bangor, Maine in 1981, Day grew up writing songs, playing both piano and guitar and relentlessly playing gigs at clubs in and around Boston throughout his teens. In 2000, he released his self-financed debut album, "Australia." A year later, the album sold over 10,000 copies, Day was soon signed by Epic Records and the rest, as they say, is history.

With his latest album, "Stop All the World Now," Day proves that he's not just a pretty face, but he has immense talent to back up his boyish good-looks. The album has garnered both critical and fan praise, and has done pretty well in sales department. Most of the songs on "World" have a mellow feel to them, and deal a lot with love, relationships and loss. "Collide" has been the most accessible, but there are other outstanding tracks on the disc, including "Brace Yourself," "Perfect Time of Day" and "I'll Take You On." The campus tour will, no doubt, feature music primarily from "Stop All the World Now," but will also probably include a few tracks from "Australia."

Opening for Day on Friday night is local artist, Brandi Carlile. Friday night's show marks the second UMass concert for producers Verizon Wireless Music, after the hugely successful Maroon 5 show at the Mullins Center last spring. Tickets for the show are now on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, and prices are $10 for UMass students, and $15 for 5 College students and the general public. Hurry, now is the "perfect time of day" to get your tickets to what is sure to be one of the hottest events of the fall.

Billy Collins shares insight on 'The Trouble with Poetry'

By Kelly Kraemer
Collegian Correspondent

There is a reason why good poetry only equates itself to a select few well-known poets like William Shakespeare and Robert Frost. The progression has stopped briefly to mingle with modern poetry in high school lessons and personal journals, which are quite often depressing, petty and monotonous. A silent evolution of miserable poetry has perhaps stopped itself at the mere title of Billy Collins' straightforward, humorous and heartening volume, making "The Trouble with Poetry" closer to a state of being than a state of wonder.

"The Trouble with Poetry"
By Billy Collins
Random House

It is perhaps the clarity that Collins leaves his readers with that celebrates poetry rather than hides it. Instead of searching for insight from a few words that mock a personal experience, his poetry conjugates ideas into stories. Collins' style of poetry is a base to the variety of topics he explores. "The birds are in their trees, / the toast is in the toaster, / and the poets are at their window," and through passages such as these in "The Trouble with Poetry," he pursues the theme of seeing poetry through a window. From a visual perspective, he is standing in front of a window, transforming the beauty of his own front yard to the composed aural stimuli felt throughout each piece.

Billy Collins' eight other notoriously light and often sarcastic collections of poetry have earned him the prestigious position of Poet Laureate for 2001 through 2003. As a Professor of English at Lehman College of the City University of New York, Collins' most famous work is that which he does with Poetry 180, a program in which schools encourage students to have knowledge of reading and writing poetry. His understanding of poetry has allowed many students to write poetry through their own windows.

The newest collection has its own style while still fighting the heavy pathos associated with contemporary poetry. "With its spiraling metal body / and white pages for wings, / my notebook flies over my bed while I sleep." The tiniest parts of life, often overlooked, are personified into quirky verses. Collins has a way of gripping a simple concept and twisting it into a profound stanza. Contradictorily, he can present a universal concept and eliminate the complexity of the issue. "At the end of a dark tunnel, / a region of silence except for / the occasional beating of wings." He travels deep through beliefs - like he did with those relating to death - without masking them, but rather opening the trivial unknown into what is outwardly common sense.

Collins enlightens readers by letting them see death, love, relationships, growing up, time and writing through his window. His ability to leave a feeling of contentment is what has linked his poetry to that of Robert Frost. It is Collins' ability to blend what truly exists with what he envisions in his head that has made him such a famous poet. Through his new work this is evident, as he continues to write poetry that lives in the present, only visiting the past and future momentarily to explain why the present is so good.

Perhaps it is time that the trouble with poetry was discovered, that the baffling depression that embodies stereotypes of poetry was destroyed. Readers can not help but grow a relationship to Collins' poetry; they can only hope that he will never run out of comparisons and wit. He has created a reason for poets and writers to dust off their journals and imitate his genuine style. The feeling that compels fans and casual readers of Collins also assures the success of his new work. When they finish "The Trouble with Poetry," readers will be left to pause and wonder why their window never spoke to them the way it did to Billy Collins.

Former poet laureate Billy Collins continues his illustrious career with his latest volume of poetry, "The Trouble with Poetry."

How to save a new relationship from the temptation of ex appeal

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Life's funny. Anytime you finally commit to a relationship, all the hot guys or girls suddenly think you're the best thing ever, but despite all of the attractive people you formerly didn't know about, life also seems to like to play another of its little jokes through previous love interests.

Previous interests are a more dangerous attraction than most because they have ex appeal. And no, I didn't miss a letter. Ex appeal: it worked at one point, we all think, why couldn't it work again? There are a lot of good memories. And hey, talk about "ex" appeal - he (or she) looks good.

Exes are always a nice-looking option because it's just plain easy. You already know them, you're already comfortable with them, you know their tricks for the most part and you know what to expect in bed. It's a no-surprises deal, unless someone picked up some new talents somewhere along the way.

Should you go for a little blast from the past action? Sure, as long as you're not thinking past the next morning. In my experience, things don't work out for a reason. People generally don't change that much, so if your break up was due to some irreconcilable differences, then although there's the romantic thought that maybe it's truly meant to be since it's coming back around, with a little time you'll find that it was a mistake.

Example: I dated a guy my sophomore year of high school, and he ended up being a jerk. We didn't talk for two years due to the supreme extent of his jerkiness. A few years later we met up again at a random party. He learned, and he missed me. True, it was amazing at first, but two months later we ran into the same problem that we had originally - although, to his credit, he was less of a jerk this time around.

A few months later, who should IM me but that same guy? This time it was, "I miss you, there's no one else out there like you." I was sitting there thinking, "It would have been nice if you figured that out the first time - or even the second time, buddy." After a lot of thought I decided "three-peat" of our relationship was not in the cards. It would never be the same. I could no longer say that I trusted him with my feelings. And if you can't trust someone with your feelings, you're talking about investing a lot of time and energy until the two of you have managed to recapture the innocence of the first time.

Unless you're sure the person is "the one," that's a lot of time. Especially if your best friend tells you that he will no longer be your friend if you go back to that person.

However, I don't believe that anyone should ever be written off completely, as just because a relationship didn't work out, it doesn't mean that friendship can't. Which leads me to the age old question: can exes really be friends?

I don't believe exes can be friends if either one still has feelings. My reasoning? It's not a true friendship. Sure, you can be nice to each other, but with a true friendship, you can talk about other guys or girls in your life and be genuinely happy for your lover-turned-friend when they meet someone who they think is as amazing as you are (even though you were pretty sure it would never happen). And if one person still has feelings, chances are they're casually waiting for you to come back around.

The best scenario, which is rare but possible, is when circumstances like location change so that there's no possibility of any relationship, or even a close friendship, but you stay in contact. Eventually you realize your ex is a best friend, who you can tell anything to, and who truly cares about you in the highest sense.

The other part of the ex-factor is what to do with those exes come a new relationship. Do you cut them off and never talk to them again now that you've found someone better? I'd hope not. Do you stay close friends, waiting for the right time to tell him or her that you're with someone new? Talk about awkward with a capital A! As for the new girl or guy, he or she will probably have some concern with your friendship. The best thing to do in this situation is, when you're wrapped up in each other's arms late at night, look into the person's eyes and explain that you simply don't have feelings for the ex anymore. And if the ex has feelings for you, you can't really help that, and they can't really blame them? But in that case, it's still not a true friendship, and then it's respectful to your new relationship to give the old relationship as much distance as necessary to really drive the point home. You've moved on.

Husband and wife provide fresh look at New York City in film

By Pete Corbett
Collegian Correspondent

Svetlana and Igor Kopystiansky, along with some of their artwork, made a stop in Amherst on Saturday at the opening of their exhibition in the University Gallery. They have four pieces on display here until October 30. "526," a six screen slide projection, was created with this exhibition in mind.

"Incidents," a twenty minute video projection, is also on display, as is "Fog," a 30 minute video. These video productions are not films, although easily confused as such, but a completely different art form. The Kopystianskys used only a handheld camcorder, like many people use to create home videos. They didn't use any fancy filming equipment, not even a tripod. The pieces have no beginning, middle or end, and they loop in the gallery so you can't tell where the actual tape starts. Plot line is ignored, and the only noises are ambient sounds. They are more like moving photographs than a storytelling medium. The effect is that the viewers feel like they are in New York City, noticing minute detail that they would normally overlook.

The still frames also provided some insight into daily city life, the information that usually slips through the cracks. "526" was created with an average, handheld point-and-shoot camera, and the images were taken from the window of the Kopystiansky's studio. It shows images of fifteen to twenty minutes of activity on a city street. The way some of the slides are reversed has a strange way of telling the viewer exactly what's going on.

"The Day Before Tomor-row" is also a still frame piece, but there are 216 rotating slides, two at a time, one on each screen. Each pair of slides was taken a split second apart, from slightly different angles. This piece shows two perspectives of each of the 108 occurrences. Keeping with the theme of the exhibit, "The Day Before Tomorrow" makes the viewer look deeper into the people of New York City.

The entire exhibit was interesting, but certainly not mainstream. As one gallery visitor remarked, "I like this stuff, but if I made a movie about fog no one would call it art." People with predefined concepts of what art should or should not be may not enjoy this show, but if one likes artists that push boundaries and encourage other perspectives, the Kopystianskys should be looked into.

Many art fans around the globe appreciate their work. One can tell this by merely looking at a list of their past exhibitions. Currently, they also have work on display in a Russian artist's exhibition at the Guggenheim in New York. Their work has also been in the Venice Biennale Aperto in 1988, the San Paolo Biennial in 1994 and the Johannesburg Biennale in 1997. These are just a few of the many many international exhibitions that these artists have displayed pieces in. In 2000, Svetlana won the Kaethe-Kollwitz-Preis of the Academie der Kuenste in Berlin.

Igor and Svetlana split their time between Berlin and New York City, but New York is where their studio is, and where they draw much of their inspiration.

The University Gallery hours are Tuesday through Friday 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and Saturday and Sunday 2 to 5 p.m. The Gallery is closed Mondays.

Svetlana and Igor Kopystiansky have four pieces on display in the University Gallery until Oct. 30. Their abstract film shows minute details of New York City that most people would overlook.

Athletes sound off on the web

By George Diaz
Knight Ridder

Courtesy Knight Ridder

Eagles widout Terrell Owens is just one of many professional athletes that voices his opinions and thoughts through his personal Web site. Others include Miami widout Chris Chambers and San Francisco home run king Barry Bonds.

ORLANDO, Fla. - Peek into sports cyberspace and click on to barrybonds.mlb.com, where Bonds sends a shout-out to his buddy Todd Zeile and his new movie, Dirty Deeds. "I saw it last week, and it was hilarious," Bonds said. " It reminded me of a cross between Animal House and American Pie."

Check out terrellowens.com, whose high-tech Web site includes a flash-enabled theme song celebrating the greatness of "T.O." It also allows Owens to reach out to his fans and explain why life was so tough making only $49 million over seven years with the Philadelphia Eagles.

Visit chrischambers84.com and read the "open mic" telling fans that if Chambers had his choice of quarterback, "it wouldn't be bad to hook up with Dan Marino. It seemed like they threw the ball 90 percent of the time when he was at the helm."

We assume Miami Dolphins fans agree despite the surprising start for Gus Frerotte against the Denver Broncos last Sunday.

No longer limited to conventional means of communication, athletes have formed fabulous partnerships with the Internet.

It allows current athletes to bypass the media and tell their stories in their own voices. It promotes retired athletes, affording them the opportunity to reach out to their fans and engage in meet-and-greets. And it gives all of them the opportunity to market their memorabilia, cutting out the conventional go-betweens in stores and shopping malls.

Pick any athlete and do an engine search. Chances are that they have their own Web site, serving altruistic to profitable purposes. Bonds and Owens often use the Web as the only means of communication, however contentious and self-absorbed it sounds at times.

Although Bonds was congenial with the media recently as he prepared to play again this season, much of the previous information on his rehabilitation from knee surgery was restricted to his Web site.

The Web also can work as a Band-Aid to heal relationships gone bad involving athletes. Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban posted an open message on his site (blogmaverick.com) to New York Jets quarterback Chad Pennington, whose relationship with the media soured last season.

"You need a place where you can explain yourself," Cuban wrote. "You can write as much or as little as you would like, but the words will be all yours. You can create the context. You can make sure that all issues are addressed. You can take issue with individuals or the media as a whole. Your words, your message."

There are more benign ways to stay in touch.

Chambers uses it to sell memorabilia and promote his foundation. Rocco Baldelli of the Tampa Bay Devil Rays set his up to help charities via the Catholic high school he attended in Warwick, R.I. Rickie Weeks Jr. of the Milwaukee Brewers can boost his exposure as a rising standout in Major League Baseball.

"I'm not really an Internet guy," said Chambers, a Dolphins wide receiver. "But I set it up, and I try to get on it as much as possible because that's how the world is moving."

Promotional advantages are reflected in the recent startup of antonio-tarver.com, which plugs Tarver's upcoming fight against Roy Jones Jr. on Oct. 1 in Tampa. It includes a fight trailer labeled "No Excuses," recent news, fight gear and a link to help victims of Hurricane Katrina. A number of components are in Macromedia Flash, which gives the site more high-tech bells and whistles.

"It's all about marketing and branding," said Norman Horton, the publicist who set up the site with the help of Elemental Studios Inc.

Athletes and Web sites began to click about three to four years ago, spawned by the tremendous popularity of cyberspace. The new outreach also brought into prominence companies that serve as go-betweens for athletes, such as Chambers, who aren't Internet-savvy.

It opened entrepreneurial doors for Ryan Totka and Ernie Falco, two Central Florida friends who formed TornadoPromotions.com Inc. in May 2001.

Although they serve other clients, including private jet and yacht charters and law firms, sports is their passion, particularly for Totka.

Now 27, he has accumulated more than 3,500 autographs, dating back to when he used to go to spring training as a child and identify top prospects. His home in Apopka, Fla., includes framed and matted jerseys of Daunte Culpepper, Marvin Harrison, Michael Vick, Torry Holt and Deion Sanders.

A number of athletes whose jerseys he owns are clients. TornadoPromotions.com has built and/or marketed sites for 23 athletes, including NFL standouts Holt and Marshall Faulk, NBA standout LeBron James and a batch of retired athletes, including Boston Celtics Coach Doc Rivers and NFL running back Ricky Watters.

"Having played for 11 years and for three NFL teams, I have accumulated fans from all over the world," Watters said. "Rickywatters.com makes it easy to keep in touch with my fans, no matter their location."

Blahoski has traveled a long road to success

By Tom Powers
Knight Ridder

ST. PAUL, Minn. - In 1998, she was an important member of the women's gold medal-winning hockey team. Being a part of that group, which inspired a generation of girls to play hockey, put her on top of the world.

In 2002, the only way she could get to the Olympics was to hook on as an intern with NBC Sports. Her first assignment: physically lug Port-O-Potties into position for the crew. That was about as low as she could get.

At the Torino Games in 2006, she again will be an important part of Team USA. This time she will be serving as an assistant coach to Ben Smith.

Up and down and round she goes. Welcome to Alana Blahoski's world.

"I'm very fortunate," Blahoski said. "Things have worked out for the best. I'm 31 years old and much of my life still revolves around hockey. I never dreamed it would be that way when I was chasing pucks around the rinks in St. Paul."

There are a lot of things she never dreamed would happen.

"I did not imagine moving Port-O-Potties around either," she said with a laugh.

Salt Lake City was a difficult place for her in 2002. No more hanging out with her teammates. No more being a part of that trailblazing group. No more fierce battles with those no-good, so-and-so's from Team Canada.

Yet she felt she still had to be there. Just because.

"It definitely was very emotional for me," said Blahoski. "The first few days were very difficult. My mother accompanied me to Salt Lake City at my request.

"The first person I spoke to was the equipment manager. Then I saw a few of the girls, and then more and more."

Things got better, probably because they couldn't get much worse. Who goes from the winner's podium to latrine duty in back-to-back Olympics?

But once the competition began, she worked as a spotter for NBC, wearing headphones and pointing out interesting things to the producer. From there her professional life began moving upward again.

She has it all working for her right now. She has moved to New York City, which always was one of her goals, and teaches ice skating in Manhattan. And over the past three years she has become involved in coaching the national team.

The key move may have been when she turned down an invitation to Team USA's camp the summer after the Salt Lake City Games.

"I called coach Smith and told him I wasn't fully committed as an athlete," she said. "I didn't think my heart was in it as a player any more. I always gave 100 percent through the highest of the highs and the lowest of the lows.

"I wanted to live in New York City and have the opportunity to travel. I couldn't give a hundred percent to training."

Blahoski did mention that she might be interested in coaching and asked Smith if he had any contacts.

"You just spoke to the right guy," Smith replied.

But first he made her come to camp as a player, no doubt to make sure she had it out of her system. Then he added her to his staff.

It was an interesting move. When Blahoski was cut by Smith before the 2002 Games, she was devastated. The move caught her by surprise and although she did not burn any bridges, she clearly was rankled by Smith's decision.

"When I was cut in 2002, I tried not to make it a personal issue," she said. "I didn't blame anyone other than myself. I thought about what I could have done better during tryouts."

She recently returned from coaching in a tournament in Europe and says she continues to be astonished at how the women's game has changed.

"I looked around and, wow, the girls were so much faster, so much stronger than when I started," she said. "It's an amazing game to watch."

Blahoski and the U.S. national team will be in town Sept. 30 to play the WCHA All-Stars at Xcel. It's part of the training schedule as the squad gears for Torino in February.

The Big Green is coming

crushed.

"This is going to be like UConn," coach Jim Rudy said. "You can get scored on by teams you're even with, but when dealing with a top 20 team what do you do then? You really have to take advantage when you can. This will be another test for us, another part of our aging process."

As previously mentioned, Dartmouth fields players literally from all over the national field. With the departure of Ken Lardis as coach, many of their problem players are out of the program, and in are dynamic players that are dead-on with their shot accuracy.

How dead-on? The Big Green wield a .619 shot percentage. More specifically, of their 63 shot attempts, 39 have reached the goal; and of those 39, ten have hit the back of the net. So when it boils down, 25 percent of their shots on goal turn into goals.

Leading the scoring charge is perennial All-Ivy senior forward Sarah Johnson. A native of Minnesota, she currently leads the Green with three goals and two assists for eight points, more than double what any other player has.

On Monday, Johnson was named the Ivy League's Player of the Week for her efforts at the Adidas/Hypertherm Classic. Against the Gophers, she scored a go-ahead goal in the 71st minute and after Minnesota tied it up again six minutes later, she set up the game-winning goal in the 97th minute. On Sunday against ASU, she netted her third goal of the season in the overtime win.

To stop the scoring barrage on Johnson and the likes of Jennie Tonneson, Christina Ferraris and Monica Martin de Bustamante, the Minutewomen need to score when the scoring opportunity comes, as it did so many times last weekend.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Tina Rodriguez and the UMass women's soccer team will face Dartmouth today at home. Rodriguez has started all seven games for the Minutewomen.

Against Vermont on Sunday, the Minutewomen both outshot the Catamounts (23 to their seven) and had triple the amount of corner kicks (12 to their four), yet only came away with one goal in the 38th minute in spite of ten shots on goal.

Meanwhile, the Catamounts mounted two quick goals in the last five minutes of the first half, and UMass never rebounded.

A better final third is something the Minutewomen need to improve upon if they are to survive. However, UM has had only day to prepare, due to a mandatory day-off on Monday. It will be interesting to see what Rudy has in store.

"I think where we're at is we've got to take care of our own business," Rudy said.

Homers at a minimum in 2005

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Baseball power dimmed this season, with home runs dropping to their lowest level in eight years and some linking the power outage to tougher steroid testing.

"A lot of guys who were hitting them haven't been hitting them," Florida's Lenny Harris said. "I think the drug policy had a lot to do with it. It changed a lot of guys' diets. There are too many people having off years."

An average of 2.06 homers per game were hit through Monday, according to the Elias Sports Bureau, down 8 1/2 percent from last season's final average of 2.25. The figure hasn't been so low since it dipped to 2.05 in 1997.

"I think it's cyclical," baseball commissioner Bud Selig said. "It's very hard to determine what variables are at work here. I don't think anyone really knows, and it's hard to draw a conclusion."

Some players point to the first year of steroid testing with penalties for first offenders. Nine players have been suspended for 10 days each for violating the major league policy, including Baltimore's Rafael Palmeiro.

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the players association, said linking steroid testing to the home-run average is too simplistic and pointed out that this year's level is only slightly lower than the 2.09 average for 2002.

"The numbers are essentially the same as they were three years ago, before there was testing, and in those three years players have been tested a massive number of times," he said. "You might want to consider other possibilities for home run production: the players are bigger because of training regimen, the ballparks are smaller, bat manufacture and design is different. There can be a slew of reasons."

Boston center fielder Johnny Damon cites better pitching.

"We haven't really faced too many chumps for pitchers this year," he said. "Young guys coming in have got some unbelievable stuff."

Several stars had huge power drops, many because of long-term injuries. San Francisco's Barry Bonds went from 45 to two, Philadelphia's Jim Thome from 42 to seven and St. Louis' Scott Rolen from 34 to five.

"If I hit 12, the ratio would still be down," Bonds said.

Among those players who've been mostly healthy, Seattle's Adrian Beltre has fallen from 48 to 18, the New York Mets' Carlos Beltran from 38 to 15 and Washington's Vinny Castilla from 35 to 12. All three were free agents last winter and switched teams and home ballparks.

Texas has done its part to ensure the home-run average topped 2.0 for the 12th straight season _ a figure reached only once in 25 years before the current boom began in 1994. The Rangers have 152 homers at Ameriquest Field, a record for a home ballpark, and lead the major leagues with 252 overall , 12 shy of the mark Seattle set in 1997.

Bucking the trend are Houston's Morgan Ensberg, who has gone from 10 homers to 35, Atlanta's Andruw Jones, up from 29 to 50, and the New York Yankees' Jason Giambi, recovered from illnesses and back to 30 after hitting 12 last year. Jones is the first major leaguer to hit 50 since Thome and Alex Rodriguez in 2002.

"I know they've been saying a lot of stuff about a lot of people using illegal products to make themselves feel strong, but the game is still the same," Jones said.

"All the guys still look strong, and there's no doubt in my mind they can still hit home runs, 50, 40 home runs."

Braves general manager John Schuerholz thinks some players look smaller, but added, "It's not scientific at all."

"There may have been some relationship. I have no data on that," he said. "Obviously, all of the supposition is that performance-enhancing drugs allow you to perform at a higher level physically, whether it's speed, arm strength or power."

It's hard to discern whether increases and decreases in size are related to steroids. Tigers coach Lance Parrish talked about All-Star catcher Ivan Rodriguez.

"The only guy on this team who's really lost any substantial weight on this team is Pudge, but I think that was by design on his part," Parrish said. "People accuse him of being on stuff and then getting off it, and who's to know? But I know just from watching him from the first day of spring training, he's been on an unbelievable running regimen, diet and workout programs that are second to none. So I can see why he lost so much weight."

Paterno has a lot to prove

read the papers. I haven't got the time to read them. I don't even have an e-mail address. I've just tried to put myself in a position to just focus on what I think is right and wrong and not get involved in what the public thinks. I don't know if it's a lousy answer, but it's the one I have."

So far, the fans have shown they're not completely ready to jump back on the bandwagon. The first two weeks of the season, attendance at Beaver Stadium was in the 90,000s- well under the stadium capacity of 107,282. The Nittany Lions drew more than 100,000 for the first time this season against Central Michigan, but it still wasn't a sellout.

"No offense, but we've had two losing seasons in a row," Paterno said. "You're right, we've been under 100,000, but just under. If I had a couple of extra bucks in my pocket, I probably could have bribed the ticket man to say we had 100,000."

Even though he's 78 and has won two national championships, Paterno has more to prove this season than any other. He has talent, but what will he do with it?

"I think we need to make a statement that this is Penn State," Robinson said, "and we're on our way back to prominence."

White Sox walking a thin line

By Rick Gano
Associated Press

CHICAGO - Down at Jimbo's, the mood is decidedly different these days.

Jammed earlier this season with families and friends pumping up the White Sox, the bar-restaurant just two blocks from U.S. Cellular Field is now full of worry warts.

"It's like they lost their chemistry," patron Sarah Grady said.

Rarely do baseball fans on the South Side dare to dream. Resigned to being second place in their own city, and without a World Series title since Shoeless Joe Jackson helped them win in 1917, they believed this season was going to be different - until the White Sox headed toward a record collapse, the kind usually seen by the crosstown Cubs.

Leading the AL Central by 15 games on Aug. 1 and on the verge of a runaway, the White Sox find themselves hanging on with two weeks to go, trying to hold off the hard-charging Cleveland Indians.

Chicago still tops the league in wins, but a 7-5 loss to the Indians on Monday night cut its edge to 2 1/2 games. It was the eighth loss in 11 games for the White Sox and suddenly, instead of the playoffs, there's talk about them blowing the biggest lead ever.

The 1951 Brooklyn Dodgers squandered a 13-game lead on Aug. 11, beaten when Bobby Thomson's homer doomed them in a playoff with the New York Giants for the NL pennant. The 1978 Boston Red Sox wasted a big edge over the New York Yankees and the 1964 Philadelphia Phillies blew it in the final week.

White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen can tell how things have changed from the tone of the e-mails he gets. After guiding Chicago to the best record in the majors for much of the season, he's under assault from angry critics and frustrated fans.

"A lot of nasty ones," Guillen says. "'It's your fault. You stink. I know you are going to choke.'"

The Indians, meanwhile, won for the 13th time in 14 games Monday night.

COURTESY KNIGHT RIDDER

The Chicago White Sox have lost eight of its last 11 games. The White Sox led the AL Central by 15 games in Aug.

"Everybody wants to put the blame on us and say this and that. We haven't played our best in the second half or since August or whatever," White Sox first baseman Paul Konerko said. "But at the same time, I tip my hat to them."

Sounds like a collapse that usually happens on the other side of town, where the Cubs - under the so-called curse of the Billy Goat - haven't been to a World Series since 1945 and haven't won one since 1908.

The Cubs led most of the 1969 season before a late swoon - and, some say, the appearance of a black cat on the field - helped the New York Mets win the pennant.

And the Cubs were live outs from the World Series two years ago when a fan interfered with a foul ball at Wrigley Field, fueling a Florida Marlins rally that led to an eventual World Series title.

Don't forget, too, that the White Sox haven't been to a World Series since 1959, so years of baseball futility in this city is not limited to one side or the other.

The Cubs always outdraw the White Sox, regardless of the records, mainly because of the appeal of Wrigley Field and the surrounding saloons, although White Sox attendance this season has surpassed 2 million - with 38 crowds of more than 30,000.

Sitting on a porch on a side street near U.S. Cellular Field, 89-year-old retiree Nick Bertucci, who once worked for the White Sox and sold hot dogs, said he's doing everything he can to help the team snap out of it.

"I make all kinds of signs for them to get hits. Sometimes they work and sometimes they don't," he said.

His daughter, Ava Bonomo, said it's been difficult watching the team's season crumble.

"It's heartbreaking, but they're still our Sox and we love them," she said.

The strong starting pitching that had been the centerpiece of a team that started 27-9 has faltered recently with All-Star Mark Buehrle, Freddy Garcia and Orlando Hernandez struggling.

Jose Contreras, the most inconsistent starter for the first half of the season, is now the best pitcher on the staff with a 9-2 record since the All-Star game. He's the only White Sox starter with a winning record since the break.

The bullpen also has been a mess, having allowed nine earned runs in its last 18 innings.

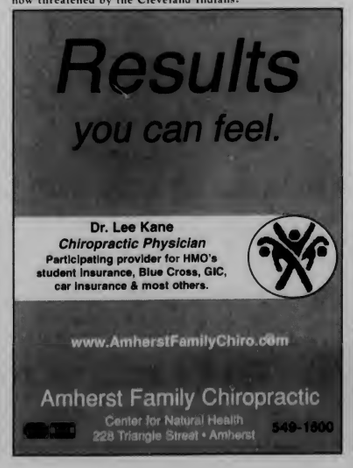
After jettisoning run producers such as Carlos Lee and Magglio Ordonez in the offseason and relying on Guillen's preferred small-ball attack featuring speedy leadoff hitter Scott Podsednik, the White Sox have struggled during stretches to score.

Last week, as the Indians continued on their tear, the White Sox dropped two of three in Kansas City - the worst team in the majors - and prompted the always opinionated and outspoken Guillen to proclaim: "We really flat-out stink."

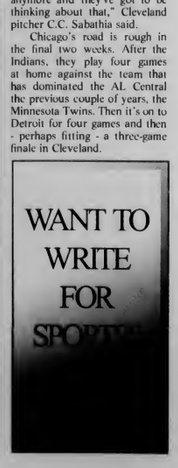
"When I say my team stinks and doesn't play the way it can play, I don't want to hear it from anybody else because they can hear it from me," Guillen said.

The Indians are amply aware the White Sox are wobbling.

"They don't have that big lead anymore and they've got to be thinking about that," Cleveland pitcher C.C. Sabathia said.



Chicago's road is rough in the final two weeks. After the Indians, they play four games at home against the team that has dominated the AL Central the previous couple of years, the Minnesota Twins. Then it's on to Detroit for four games and then - perhaps fitting - a three-game finale in Cleveland.



COURTESY KNIGHT RIDDER

Although they began the season on top, the White Sox are now threatened by the Cleveland Indians.

UMass prepares for Wildcats

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The conclusion of a triumphant homestand last weekend, where the Massachusetts men's soccer team won two straight games against Navy and Cornell to bolster its record to 3-3-0, has led to a new-found confidence, something that it will need to deal an undefeated New Hampshire squad (5-0-1) its first loss.

In preparation for this afternoon's match up with the Wildcats, the Minutemen - in their fifth road match of the season - are keeping their goals simple.

UMass coach Sam Koch said yesterday that "making sure everyone's going to get to the bus on time so we can all leave together" was the team's number one priority.

The road hasn't been kind to the Minutemen this season, as the first four matches were away from Rudd Field and did not yield ideal results for the Minutemen; UMass was 1-3 in that stretch, losing to Michigan State (2-1), Maine (2-1) and Hartford (1-0).

The Maroon and White will travel to UNH tomorrow afternoon for a 4 p.m. start against the Wildcats, who have lost two straight decisions and four out of the last five matches to the Minutemen.

"We have to continue to do the things we need to do to get the results that were striving for," Koch said. "We need to keep pressure on the backs. Can we play simple in the back and make sure were not giving any silly mistakes away? (Something that) we have improved a great deal on.

"Were going against a team where if you make a couple of mistakes they'll punish you," he added. "We give the ball away more than we should. We still got a lot of things to improve on. We're getting there; it's not going to happen overnight. If we think it will, we, as coaches, are fooling ourselves."

The Minutemen stifled a potent offensive attack from the Midshipmen on Sunday, shutting them out in a convincing win. UMass was without senior captain Oral Bullen and senior captain Craig Canavan, and has been captain-less since Cornell last Friday.

With eight freshmen getting playing time last weekend, all playing significant roles in the two wins, Koch believes that getting collective leadership will be key to the Minutemen's continued success.

"I think (senior) Tim Kitchell has stepped forward," he said. "(Redshirt freshman) Chris Brown and (freshman) Zach Simmons have done a good job in leadership positions. (Sophomore) Kenny Cook does a very good job communicating and has kept us solid (in the backfield). Everyone is doing their part."

UMass will need every bit of last weekend's magic against the Wildcats, who come into this afternoon's match undefeated in six matches this season. UNH goalie Brian Levey is off to a blistering start: at one point he held a shutout streak of 550 minutes and has been named America East Player of the Week.

The UMass goalie situation hasn't gotten easier for Koch, as junior Nick Billman will soon return to full strength from his preseason injury, giving Koch two goaltenders that are both capable of the starting role. However, Simmons has been solid in the net and it does not look like he will lose his spot to Billman anytime soon.

"He came into the preseason injured," Koch said of his junior goalie. "He wasn't able to train at all for first few weeks of preseason. He's getting back into game fitness. He's almost there. The tough thing is Zach is playing well. Right now Zach is our keeper and Billman's the backup."

The men's team came home to Rudd Field last weekend for the first time and didn't disappoint. But being on the road against an undefeated opponent today and with the conference schedule looming, it looks like the real tests are yet to come.

UM soccer awaits DC

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It's been a tough uphill climb so far for the Massachusetts women's soccer team, steamrolling over some opponents while getting rolled by others.

The terrain just got steeper.

UMass (3-3-1) opens up this afternoon with the first of five consecutive games at home, as well as six of the next eight, against the Dartmouth Big Green (4-2), a team that historically they own (15-3-1 all-time against the Green).

But history is merely that - history. The two haven't met since 1996, when the Minutewomen were a dominant team in the northeast and Dartmouth was just starting to break ground.

Now it's the other way around. The Big Green have peeked inside the top 25 at several points this season, placing in the "receiving votes" column in yesterday's latest USA Today poll, while the Maroon and White are stuck trying to regain that form from more than a decade ago that produced a Final Four team and one of the greatest goalkeepers in the history of women's soccer (Brianna Scurry).

After coming up short on the west coast to both Cal-Berkeley and St. Mary's, two prominent programs, the Green rebounded with nice wins over Minnesota and Arizona State last weekend at the Adidas/Hypertherm Classic on their home field in Hanover, N.H.

Not to be forgotten either is the recent $4.5 million donation from Stanley Smother, a 1934 graduate of Dartmouth, towards a new soccer facility, which will most certainly attract better recruits to a program that already boasts a roster from all over the nation.

The Minutewomen know about facing Top 25 programs all too well, it's just that lately they haven't fared so well. Getting thumped 4-0 by UConn two weeks ago is an example.

Now, Dartmouth is the UConn, another competitive team on the schedule with a Catch-22: to become an upper-echelon team, you have to play the upper-echelon talent-but don't get

Basketball schedule released

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team can officially begin preparing for its opponents for the 2005-2006 season, as the schedule for the upcoming season was released yesterday. The Minutemen are slated to compete in 17 games against teams that participated in either the NCAA or NIT tournaments during the previous two seasons.

Among those difficult teams, seven of them (Boston College, Charlotte, Connecticut, George Washington, UAB and Xavier) were included in ESPN's Preseason Top 50.

UMass will take on the UConn Huskies on Dec. 8 in a rematch of the 2004 upset at the Mullins Center, in which the Minutemen shocked UConn 61-59. This season's contest will take place at the Civic Center in Hartford, Conn. At 9 p.m. and will be televised on ESPN2.

Following that match up, the Maroon and White will return home to face Boston University on Dec. 12 and then will face Siena the next day.

January will begin conference play for UMass, but not before it takes on Boston College in Chestnut Hill, Mass., a team that the Minutemen lost to last season.

Among the most challenging conference-foes includes St. Joseph's on Jan. 11 and Saint Louis on Jan. 15. The Hawks competed in the NIT Tournament in 2004-2005, making it all the way to the finals.

The Minutemen will take on two more opponents at the Mullins Center - Fordham on Jan. 18 and Temple on Jan. 21.

The latter portion of the season will feature more tough opponents, with UMass taking on Florida State on Feb. 12, George Washington on Feb. 15 and then Charlotte on Feb. 22.

The first regular season contest of the 2005 season is against Hartford on Nov. 18 at 7 p.m., and will be played at the Mullins Center.

Times have changed for Paterno and media

By Jemele Hill
Knight Ridder

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. - Stuck in the 1950s, but held to millennium standards.

At times, it's an uncomfortable mix for Joe Paterno, who is only the fifth person ever to coach 40 years in college football and just the second to do so at one school.

Paterno used to have a couple of beers with reporters the night before home football games. But these days, Paterno would feel uneasy drinking water with the media around.

"That part of my coaching experience is gone," the Penn State coach said. "You are in a world that is a little different if you are a newspaper writer. You have to have a lead and you have to do something. I'm not naive. I certainly hope that I am never going to be at the point where I don't appreciate young people trying to establish themselves in a profession, but having said that, I don't want to hang around with them on Friday nights. It is as simple as that. I used to love to hang around with them. I just don't like it."

If Paterno wants to play the remember-when game, he also probably can recall a time when a 3-0 Penn State start would garner enormous adulation. That, like his relationship with the media, also is a thing of the past.

The Nittany Lions haven't gotten off to a start this good since 2002, but the fashionable millennium impatience has cast a wary eye over the unblemished start.

A healthy bit of skepticism remains over the Nittany Lions because they've only beaten weaker opponents South Florida, Cincinnati and Central Michigan.

Judgment about how good Penn State is will begin this week when it opens Big Ten play at Northwestern. And of course even more conclusions will be made when Penn State faces Ohio State and Michigan later in the season.

"We haven't been 3-0 around here in a long time," Penn State quarterback Michael Robinson said. "I think it'll generate a lot of excitement, but we haven't really gotten into the Big Ten schedule yet."

Penn State has the potential to be a dark-horse challenger for the Big Ten championship this season.

The Nittany Lions' defense is undeniably good. Just last week against Cincinnati, the defense saw its 12-game streak of holding opponents to 21 points or fewer end, but it is certainly talented enough to continue to consistently dominate other offenses.

The offense is still not as strong as the defense, but it seems to no longer be a considerable weakness, either. Robinson is finally playing quarterback full time and receivers Justin King and Derrick Williams - two of the most sought-after recruits in the nation - have given the offense an element of surprise.

The three have helped the Nittany Lions put up impressive offensive numbers in the non-conference season - an average of 422 yards of total offense and 35 points.

"I don't know if that validates anything or not," Robinson said. "I still think people try to test our offense and come after us."

But no matter if this is Penn State's revival season or not, Paterno still sounds very much like a man intent on returning for his 41st season-and possibly beyond.

He will likely never catch Bobby Bowden-the only major-college coach who has more victories than Paterno - and he seems even more determined to stay a part of a college football culture that sometimes can be frustrating for him.

"It's hard for me to think about football season without my having some involvement in it," Paterno said. "Everything that's involved in college football has been really good and I enjoy it. The minute it ceases to be fun, I'll get out of it."

Obviously, Paterno must be made of sterner stuff than given credit for since one would have thought the fun might have stopped by now.

Not only are the Nittany Lions coming off two consecutive losing seasons, but the cries for Paterno to retire haven't exactly quieted. Paterno, of course, claims to have no knowledge of who supports or dislikes him.

"It's always difficult for me to say this because I don't think people believe me," Paterno said, "but I don't

Rookie experienced Hurricane Katrina

By Neil Hayes
Knight Ridder

OAKLAND, Calif. - Monta Ellis knew he was embarking on an adventure of a lifetime. He just assumed it would begin after he left his hometown.

Ellis, the Warriors' first of two second-round draft picks in June, rose in the predawn darkness on the morning of Aug. 29 to catch a 5:30 a.m. flight from Jackson, Miss., to the Bay Area. Even though it was windy and raining, he and his mother, Rosa, didn't comprehend the ferocity of the storm until they saw the city lights go dark on their way to the airport.

By the time they returned to their neighborhood after learning that flights had been grounded, what had begun as an inconvenience was quickly developing into the storm of the century. It was raining sideways, and the wind was howling. A fallen tree blocked the road.

The start of his NBA career and Hurricane Katrina were about to collide.

"About 7 that morning it got real ugly," Ellis said. "That's when the wind started blowing and knocking trees down and the power out."

The experience would've given Ellis a healthy dose of perspective had he needed it. He grew up in the toughest section of Jackson, where gang members loitered on the corners and driving a new car meant you must be a drug dealer.

He idolized his brother Antwain, who many believed also was destined for the NBA after he led Lanier High School to a state title. Watching Antwain choose the street life over basketball only made Ellis more determined to succeed.

He would nail trashcans and milk crates to poles and shoot baskets.

"I could've went the same route he went, but I saw what happened to him and how it hurt my mother and how it changed her," Ellis said. "When I first started to play basketball she said, 'Don't let people do to you what they did to your brother.' So when people came to me like they came to my brother, I heard my mother's voice in my ear and I stayed to myself."

Ellis told his story after a workout at the Warriors practice facility last week. Next to him was an NBA preview magazine in which one NBA scout calls Ellis the "steal of the draft." Another scout said there are five or six point guards in the NBA right now "who can't play with that kid."

The Warriors hope Ellis, 19, can make the leap from high school to the NBA and eventually live up to the high praise. There's no big hurry since the Warriors already employ veteran point guards Baron Davis and Derek Fisher.

An overtime thriller

The UMass field hockey team fell to the Boston University Terriers at Garber Field yesterday. The Minutewomen held onto a 1-0 lead going into the second half, but BU rallied, evening the score at 1-1 and then finishing the Maroon and White off in the overtime period. Katelyn Orlando scored the sole goal for UMass in the first half.

Autumnal Equinox celebrated at wheel

Students are invited to celebrate the Autumnal Equinox by joining Dr. Judith Young tonight at 6 p.m. to watch the sunset through the UMass Sunwheel.

The Autumnal Equinox marks the first day of fall in the Northern Hemisphere. Its name, equinox, is derived from words meaning "equal night" because on this day there are exactly 12 hours of light and 12 hours of darkness. After the equinox, the days will continue to get shorter until after the winter solstice, when the process reverses. Although many students might not see the coming of shorter days a reason to celebrate, the equinox should be seen more as a return to balance than as losing daylight.

The UMass Sunwheel was created in the tradition of Stonehenge, using stones to mark the locations of the sun during different times of the year. On the UMass Sunwheel, the four cardinal directions (north, south, east and west) are marked by two large stones set side by side to create what looks like the remains of a door or a gate. During the equinoxes the sun will rise through the east "gate" in the morning and set through the west "gate"

UMass groups 'Skip-A-Meal' to help hurricane victims

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Staff

In response to Hurricane Katrina, University of Massachusetts Dining Services and MASSPIRG will work together to mobilize thousands of students in the second annual "Skip-A-Meal" program to benefit disaster victims.

On Thursday, Sept. 29, any student with a meal plan or YCMP who chooses not to use a "swipe" from their meal plan balance from 5 to 9 p.m. will be making a small contribution to what could potentially be a massive donation from UMass.

One meal at the dining hall, a $2 retail cost, will be deducted from a student's current balance and given to OXFAM America, a Boston-based international development and relief agency. OXFAM America has launched an emergency operation within the U.S. to respond to the widespread devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina.

Last April, Dining Services raised approximately $2,000 through a similar effort for tsunami relief.

According to Ken Toong, Dining Services Director, about 700 students participated in last year's "Skip-A-Meal" program. He anticipates twice as many this year.

"We expect a bigger turnout because we had more time to advertise. To promote awareness, we have campaigned in advertisements in The Daily Collegian, on the Dining Services Web site, and with flyers in the dining halls and residential halls," said Toong.

Sophomore Sylvia Das Chagas, a biology major, was optimistic about the fundraiser's potential. "I think we can raise more than $2,000 for the hurricane victims," Das Chagas said.

Rita Contardo, a sophomore sociology major, said that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina students feel more of a responsibility to help out than in the past. "I think this time Dining Services advertised better, and it was a disaster that hit close to home," Contardo said.

Toong said the Dining Services came up with the "Skip-A-Meal" idea principally because UMass has the fifth largest campus dining service revenue in the nation. "With 12,000 students who have meal plans, a donation from UMass could really make a difference," said Toong.

Students must sign-up in the entrance of any dining hall location on campus from Monday Sept. 26 through Wednesday Sept. 28 so that Dining Services may order food accordingly for the Sept. 29 "Skip-A-Meal" date.

According to MASSPIRG campaign director Akil Williams, the organization has been brainstorming other possible ways UMass could raise money for Hurricane Katrina victims.

One such effort in the works is a dodgeball tournament scheduled for the week after homecoming. The event, to be held on campus, already has the support of fraternities, sororities, and ROTC, among other registered student organizations.

Williams also said that MASSPIRG is working to get a representative from Habitat for Humanity to talk to UMass students about possibilities to volunteer and help rebuild areas ravaged by Katrina in the upcoming months.

"We got involved because something urgent needed to be done. We are looking for ideas from UMass students for ways we can help organize fundraiser events," said Williams.

Gulf Coast prepares for Hurricane Rita

By Pam Easton
Associated Press

GALVESTON, Texas -As many as 1 million people were ordered to clear out along the Gulf Coast and hospital and nursing home patients were evacuated Wednesday as Hurricane Rita turned into a Category 5, 165-mph monster that could slam Texas by the weekend and inflict more misery on New Orleans.

Forecasters said Rita could be the most intense hurricane on record ever to hit Texas, and easily one of the most powerful ever to plow into the U.S. mainland. Category 5 is the highest on the scale, and only three Category 5 hurricanes are known to have hit the U.S. mainland - most recently, Andrew, which smashed South Florida in 1992.

All of Galveston, low-lying sections of Houston and Corpus Christi, and a mostly emptied-out New Orleans were under mandatory evacuation orders same day after Rita sideswiped the Florida Keys as a far weaker storm and caused minor damage.

Having seen what Hurricane Katrina - a Category 4, 145-mph storm - did three weeks ago, many people were taking no chances as Rita swirled across the Gulf of Mexico.

"After this killer in New Orleans, Katrina, I just cannot fathom staying," 59-year-old Ldyyan Jean Jocque said before sunrise as she waited for an evacuation bus outside the Galveston Community Center. She had packed her Bible, some music and clothes into plastic bags and loaded her dog into a pet carrier.

"I really think it is going to be bad. That's really why I'm running. All these years I've stayed here, but I've got to go this time," said 65-year-old Barbara Anders. "I don't have but one life, and it is time for me to go."

The federal government was eager to show that it, too, had learned its lesson after being criticized for its sluggish response to Katrina. It rushed hundreds of truckloads of water, ice and ready-made meals to the Gulf Coast and put rescue and medical teams on standby.

"You can't play around with this storm," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said on ABC's "Good Morning America." He added: "The lesson is that when the storm hits, the best place to be is to be out of the path of the storm."

By early afternoon, Rita was centered more than 700 miles southeast of Corpus Christi, drawing strength from the warm waters of the gulf. Forecasters predicted it would come ashore Saturday along the central Texas coast between Galveston and Corpus Christi. But even a slight rightward turn could prove devastating to New Orleans.

Altogether, as many as 1 million people in the Houston-Galveston area were under orders to get out, including all of Galveston County, population 267,000. authorities said. About 10,000 people in vulnerable sections of Corpus Christi were also warned to get out. Along the Louisiana coast, some 20,000 people or more were being evacuated or were told to leave.

Alliance for Israel meeting a success

By Alana Melansson
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Alliance for Israel held their first meeting of the year Monday night at the UMass Campus Center, attracting what its president called "the biggest turnout at a general meeting since we became an RSO."

About 20 students came for the meeting, almost doubling the number usually in attendance.

"This is good," said President Elena Zaurova, a senior mathematics major. "I'm excited about this year."

Founded in 2001 by Dan Yagudin, a former UMass student, and a small core group, the Student Alliance for Israel has been a recognized registered student organization (RSO) since 2003. SAFI, as members abbreviate the organization, is dedicated to giving a voice to pro-Israel members of the UMass community, which, according to Zaurova, seems to empathize more with Palestinian sentiment than Israeli.

"Israel has had some bad press coverage in the local media," said Gilad Skolnick, a senior communications and history major and SAFI's vice president of communications. "I feel that this is unjustified, when no country is going to be a utopia. No country is perfect."

Vice President of Political Affairs Andrew Fretwell agreed with Skolnick.

"We don't pretend it's perfect. That's not what this is about," said Fretwell, a sophomore English and STPEC major. "We want to portray Israel in a fair and balanced way. We need to get away from the spin ... and advance the truth."

According to their official charter, the goal of the group is "to educate and encourage political and cultural awareness of Israel, as well as to promote and explore Israel's diverse cultural heritage through cultural, educational, political and social programming."

The creation of SAFI coincided with the occurrence of the Second Intifada, the wave of violence and political conflict that began in September of 2000 between Palestinian Arabs and Israelis. "Intifada" is an Arabic word for "uprising."

The first Intifada began in 1987 and continued into the early 1990s, with Palestinian Arabs of the Gaza Strip and West Bank protesting continued Israeli occupation of these territories. Both groups have religious and cultural ties to the land. On September 11, 2005, the Israeli cabinet formally declared an end to 38 years of military rule of the Gaza Strip.

The next event being sponsored by SAFI will be "Israeli Culture Night Under The Stars," scheduled to take place on Wednesday, Sept. 28, 2005 at 7 p.m. on top of the Campus Center steps, pond side. In case of rain, the event will be held in Campus Center room 917. One of Israel's most popular and newest movies, "Walk on Water," will be shown with subtitles.

"It's going to be a laid back event, with music and people just hanging out and having a good time," said Vice President of Long-Term Affairs Talya Mazor, a senior psychology and sociology major. All are invited to come and participate, regardless of their backgrounds or any ties to Israel.

Mazor also added, "SAFI would love to build relationships with other RSOs and plan events together, in order learn more about our traditional cultures, and to enhance awareness of diversity."

SAFI usually meets at least twice every month on Wednesdays. For more information, visit StudentAllianceForIsrael.com.

Landing gear gives JetBlue flight a scare

LOS ANGELES (AP) - A JetBlue airliner with faulty landing gear touched down safely Wednesday at Los Angeles International Airport after circling the region for three hours with its front wheels turned sideways, unable to be retracted into the plane.

The pilot landed by balancing on the back wheels, then eased onto the front tires, which shot flames along the runway before tearing off. The metal landing gear scraped for the final several yards.

The landing was made at an auxiliary runway set apart from the main terminals. Fire trucks and emergency crews massed near the runway to help the 139 passengers and six crew members.

Within minutes of landing, the plane's door was opened and passengers walked down a stairway onto the tarmac, where buses waited.

No injuries were immediately reported, fire officials said.

JetBlue flight 292 left Bob Hope Airport in Burbank at 3:17 p.m. for New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, said JetBlue spokesman Bryan Baldwin.

The Airbus A320 first circled the Long Beach Airport, about 30 miles south of Burbank, then was cleared to land at Los Angeles International Airport.

It stayed in flight to burn off fuel and lighten its weight, said Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Donn Walker. The plane landed about 6:20 p.m.

JetBlue, based in Forest Hills, N.Y., is a five-year-old low-fare airline with 286 flights a day and destinations in 15 states and the Caribbean. It operates a fleet of 81 A320s.

Gulf Coast prepares for another monster hurricane

Thousands evacuate Texas, Louisiana

Galveston, situated on an island 8 feet above sea level, was the site of one of the deadliest natural disasters in U.S. history: an unnamed hurricane in 1900 that killed between 6,000 and 12,000 people and practically wiped the city off the map.

The last major hurricane to hit Texas was Alicia in 1983. It flooded downtown Houston, spawned 22 tornadoes and left 21 people dead. The damage from the Category 3 storm was put at more than 52 billion. Tropical Storm Allison flooded Houston in 2001, doing major damage to hospitals and research centers and killing 23 people.

"Let's hope that the hurricane does not hit at a Category 4 strength and let's hope the lessons we've learned - the painful, tragic lessons that have been learned in the last few weeks - will best prepare us for what could happen with Rita," Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu said in New York.

The death toll from Katrina along the Gulf Coast climbed past 1,000 Wednesday to 1,036. The body count in Louisiana alone was put at 799 by the state Health Department.

In New Orleans, the Army Corps of Engineers raced to patch the city's fractured levee system for fear the additional rain from Rita could swamp the walls and flood the city all over again. The Corps said New Orleans' levees can only handle up to 6 inches of rain and a storm surge of 10 to 12 feet.

"The protection is very tenuous at best," said Dave Wurtzel, a Corps official handling some of the repairs.

Engineers and contractors drove a massive metal barrier across the 17th Street Canal bed to prevent a storm surge from Lake Pontchartrain from swamping New Orleans again, and worked around the clock to repair the damaged pumps, concrete floodwalls, earthen berms and channels that protect the below-sea-level city.

In addition, the corps had 800 giant sandbags of 6,000 to 15,000 pounds each on hand, and ordered 2,500 more to shore up low spots and plug any new breaches.

The federal government's top official in the city, Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen, said the preparations in and around New Orleans included 500 buses for evacuation and enough water and military meals for 500,000 people.

Buses stood by at the city's convention center to evacuate the 400 to 500 residents Mayor Ray Nagin estimated were left in the main part of the city, on the east bank of the Mississippi River. Two busloads left on Tuesday. But almost no one showed up Wednesday morning.

Katrina's death toll soars over 1,000

By Adam Nossiter
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS - Searchers smashed through doors in New Orleans on Wednesday, bringing their hunt for the dead to homes that had been locked and to blocks hardest hit by Katrina's flooding. Behind those doors, officials said they expected a sharply escalating body count even as the overall death toll passed 1,000.

"There still could be quite a few, especially in the deepest flooded areas," said U.S. Coast Guard Capt. Jeffrey Pettitt, who is overseeing the retrieval of bodies. "Some of the houses, they haven't been in yet." Officials said searchers are beginning to find more children.

The death toll in Louisiana stood at 799 on Wednesday, an increase of 153 bodies since the weekend and nearly 80 percent of the 1,036 deaths attributed to Hurricane Katrina across the Gulf Coast region. Pettitt and other officials would not speculate on what the final tally could be. They said the effort could last another four to six weeks.

About 500 people are involved in the search of locked homes, the third and most intense phase of the recovery effort. Initially, authorities made a hasty sweep through neighborhoods to identify the living and dead. That was followed by a door-to-door search, though locked doors were off-limits.

Previously, they had not entered unless they saw a body or heard someone inside. Now, even a high water mark on the side of a home was enough to allow them to go in.

At one home, Capt. Edan Jacobs of the Miami-Dade Fire Department kicked at a door a dozen times, then used a sledgehammer. The searchers, wearing special masks to ward off the mold and stench, sometimes have to go to three different entrances before they find one not blocked by refrigerators or couches.

Police officers and National Guardsmen stood by, weapons ready, as emaciated dogs circled.

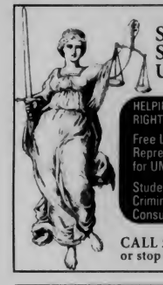
"We try not to destroy the homes, but we have to get inside," said fire department Lt. Eric Baum. "Drastic circumstances call for drastic measures."

Many homes are unsafe to enter, while others lay under piles of muck and debris. Some homes are so structurally unsound they are marked, "Do not enter," and seemingly every house has mold growing from every surface.

The difficulty of gauging the number of dead in those neighborhoods will delay a final count for weeks, said Dr. Louis Cataldi, medical incident commander for Louisiana.

"There's some folks out there we can't retrieve," he said.

He said the elderly appear to make up the bulk of the dead but that searchers also are beginning to find more children.



"That's tough," he said.

As the body retrieval from Katrina accelerated, the city prepared for a new threat from Hurricane Rita, which was barreling across the Gulf of Mexico toward Texas. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin renewed his plea for residents to get out of the city.

A mandatory evacuation order was in effect for the entire east bank of the Mississippi, and some 500 buses were standing by at the convention center, but few seemed to be taking advantage. Only one person showed up to be evacuated Wednesday morning.

The Army Corps of Engineers continued pumping the water left behind by Katrina and readying the city's fractured levee system, in case the new storm took a sharp turn and targeted Louisiana. Engineers warned residents that the patched-up levees can only handle up to 6 inches of rain and a storm surge of 10 to 12 feet.

Though much of New Orleans was no longer submerged, those parts reclaimed from the water were a dreadful sight. A neighborhood street below the 17th Street Canal levee that was just recently pumped of flood waters looked like a river bed, with boulders, mud and branches mixing with the debris of destroyed homes."

Celebrities perform in NYC to benefit Hurricane Katrina victims

NEW YORK (AP) - A constellation of music icons, celebrities and dignitaries gathered for simultaneous shows at Madison Square Garden and Radio City Music Hall to raise money for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

New Orleans was well-represented onstage at Tuesday night's "From The Big Apple To The Big Easy" concerts: The Neville Brothers performed, soul great Irma Thomas sang the appropriately titled "It's Raining," and jazz pianist Allen Toussaint backed up stars like Lenny Kravitz and Elvis Costello.

Others at the two shows included Elton John, John Fogerty, John Mayer, Joss Stone, The Dave Matthews Band, Jimmy Buffett, Simon & Garfunkel and former President Clinton.

Like other New Orleans residents, Toussaint is trying to comprehend how he'll rebuild - and proving that he hasn't been broken by Katrina.

"My spirit is high and I'm ready to go get started all over again, not only on my own possessions but anything I can do about my beloved city," he told The Associated Press backstage at Madison Square Garden.

Fogerty, who sang "Born On The Bayou," said he had to do more than write a check.

"My whole musical upbringing was greatly influenced by the South, particularly New Orleans, a place that I have loved to visit and even been honored by the confusion that people think I'm from there all the time," he told AP. "Oh that level, being able to help, it helps me to heal my broken heart I guess."

Elvis Costello said it was critical to keep the focus on the tragedy: "When the media attention switches away from this story onto the next thing that happens in the world, the circumstances will still be there."

Elton John waves to the crowd at a concert at Madison Square Garden held to benefit victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Except for a joke about President Bush by Bette Midler - which promptly got her booed - the evening's focus was not on the divisive politics of the tragedy, but on the music that has brought communities together in its wake.

"It was a call to arms, and we responded," Buffett said.

Bush steps up disaster plans before Hurricane Rita strikes

WASHINGTON - The government rushed hospital beds, rescue teams and evacuation buses to Texas on Wednesday in an urgent effort to brace for Hurricane Rita.

President Bush, pledging to be "ready for the worst," declared a state of emergency in Texas and Louisiana as his administration moved to improve on its lackluster early response to Hurricane Katrina. He pleaded with people in the region to comply with mandatory evacuation orders issued in New Orleans and Galveston.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency sent nearly 1,200 medical and rescue personnel into Texas as Rita grew to a Category 5 storm - the highest level - in its sweep across the Gulf of Mexico. FEMA also asked the Pentagon to send 2,500 hospital beds to potential disaster zones in Louisiana and Texas, and was sending 200 buses to the Lone Star State to move residents out of harm's way.

Officials said rescue teams and supplies already in Louisiana to deal with Hurricane Katrina's aftermath three weeks ago would remain there to respond to Rita.

"I urge the citizens to listen carefully to the instructions provided by state and local authorities and follow them," Bush said in a speech to the Republican Jewish Coalition. "We hope and pray that Hurricane Rita will not be a devastating storm, but we got to be ready for the worst."

Web drug ring busted by federal agents

By Suzanne Gamboa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Drug enforcement agents said they arrested at least 18 people and halted prescription writing by dozens of doctors and a pharmacist in a crackdown Wednesday on illegal sales of medications over the Internet.

Thirteen arrests were made in Texas and five in Florida. The Drug Enforcement Administration suspended the registrations of 20 doctors and 22 Internet pharmacies in the U.S., including Puerto Rico, to stop them from writing or filling prescriptions.

Agents also shut down at least 4,600 Web sites the suspects controlled, and seized 2,400 checks and money orders written by individuals for $200 each. They also seized seven luxury cars and boxes of cash that had not yet been counted in the yearlong multi-agency investigation dubbed "Operation CYBERx."

They have started legal procedures to seize several homes belonging to those arrested, valued at about $7.85 million.

"E-traffickers are just a modern way of saying drug dealers," DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said in a statement. The arrests were announced Wednesday in a news conference in Dallas.

The sting "puts out of business cyber criminals who were selling powerful narcotics without legitimate prescriptions to anyone with a computer and cash," Tandy said. "This operation makes more Americans aware that buying prescription drugs from these rogue Web sites is illegal and dangerous."

Those arrested largely operated Internet sites where orders were placed or handled.

Among the suspects were five people the DEA alleged were ringleaders. They were identified as Johar Sirian of Arlington, Texas; Gaston Blanchet and Gil Lozano of Miami; S. Ted Solomon of Orlando and Steve Rosner of Boca Raton, Fla.

DEA alleged Sirian operated 22 Internet "pharmacies" in the Dallas area, allowing him to order the controlled drugs in bulk without suspicion.

The agency also alleged Sirian sold codeine cough syrup to local drug traffickers from the back of his warehouses and in one year bought more than 70,000 pints of the syrup, used by high school and college students.

The overwhelming majority of the drugs sold were pain killers, anti-anxiety drugs such as Valium, and weight loss drugs, DEA said. Most of them cost far more than they would if purchased legitimately and were bought by addicted people. Electronic bulletin boards exist that list Web sites where people can go to buy such drugs without having a legitimate prescription.

A woman is seen smoking marijuana.

The DEA said drug orders were submitted online to thousands of Internet sites, then forwarded to a central site known as an Internet Facilitation Center. The central sites were run by the five people the DEA labeled as ringleaders.

The orders were placed on Web servers where doctors could sign in to approve them. Doctors were paid an average $20 per order.

The doctor's approval created the appearance of a doctor-patient relationship required in many states for drug prescriptions, DEA said. Doctors could make up to $1.7 million approving the illegal drug orders, the agency said.

All information was placed in a database used by pharmacies set up by those involved in the schemes to fill the orders, for a fee of about $10 to $15 a prescription for the pharmacist, DEA said. DEA said pharmacies could fill about 5,000 orders a day.

Orders were delivered to addresses that were actually empty buildings. The drugs were collected from those locations, then repackaged and distributed through a legitimate shipping service. One order placed as part of the investigation was delivered to the DEA building in Fort Worth, Texas.

A student's double major could help when seeking employment

By Rachel Weaver
Daily O'Collegian
(Oklahoma State U.)

STILLWATER, Okla. - Students at Oklahoma State University who graduate with double majors or with a minor may wonder how their extra work may look to employers. The truth is that it's going to vary upon each employer, but it certainly may help.

Amjad Ayoubi, director of Career Services, said he has a strategy about double majors and majors with minors.

"My philosophy is not to look at it as majors and minors as much as what are you doing when you add another major or another minor to your degree," Ayoubi said.

Ayoubi compares education to investments and stocks.

"If you look at your education as an investment, and you're investing in your education, then why don't you treat it as such," Ayoubi said. "One way to manage the risks for the future is to develop a well-rounded education."

Ayoubi said double majoring or minoring depends on a student and how much they want to handle, and on what an employer is looking for.

"Some employers ask for all majors, but most employers are very specific in what they're asking for. If the person does not have the major or the minor, they may not be included in that list of students (employers) will look at," Ayoubi said.

Taking the extra time to focus on classes beyond a major can help if there are no jobs available in the applicant's major.

"Sometimes an art major who would take management as a minor may be able to get their job based on their minor as opposed to their major," Ayoubi said.

Craig Robison, director of student services in the William S. Spears School of Business, said degrees depend on what the market bears out in society.

"It depends on the major and what minor you put with it," Robison said. "It doesn't mean that everybody has to have a minor."

Robison said there were some combinations that would not make much of a difference in the job market. He suggested business examples that could help job applicants, including psychology and marketing, and finance and accounting. "A major in finance with a minor in accounting is very valuable because a lot of finance graduates have to know some accounting, more than just the two courses we make all business students take," Robison said.

Robison added that "any business major with a minor in MIS, which is computers, is pretty valuable."

Robison said the way employers look at double majors depends on what the majors are.

"If you got a degree in journalism and a double major in elementary education, what are you going to with the journalism degree?" Robison said. "But if you got a degree in journalism and a double major in secondary education then you could teach journalism and things like that in a high school, so it depends on the goal."

Employers may be looking for a broad major or for something more specific like a double major or minor.

"It's more impressive if it fits what society needs," Robison said.

He suggests upperclassmen consider working for an MBA instead of a double major if it's close to graduation.

"An MBA is going to be more valuable in the job market, so if you stay here for a little longer, you walk out of here with a master's degree rather than a double major," Robison said. "It might cost you a little more time but it's worth it."

Robison said his opinions are all relative because different colleges at OSU will have different suggestions and requirements.

"Everybody has their own philosophy - they're looking for the best person to fill the position," said Missy Wilkie, coordinator of Career Services in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Wilkie said, as an example, a science double major may not add anything in the job search because they are so closely related. Instead, she said, it may be more beneficial to do "something that would advance you."

She stated that with added degree concentrations, students can connect two different subject areas that interest them and find ways to combine those into successful, fulfilling careers.

"It's only going to help your situation - it shows you're well rounded," Wilkie said. "They're really your way to show the employer that you've focused your attention on something else."

Companies will come to campus for job fairs and share what they look for upon hiring. Wilkie used Target as an example.

"Target is truly just looking for strong leaders. They're looking for strong, solid, well-rounded people," she said. "They're looking for students with leadership skills and good communication skills."

Wilkie said Target, along with other companies, will actively train employees after they are hired and will look broadly at different majors. Another company, Accenture, which is a global management consulting company, will look at any and all majors, and looks for a broad range of computer science, marketing, advertising, engineering and business backgrounds, Wilkie said.

American soldier body count in Iraq approaching 2,000

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The war in Iraq passed a sobering milepost Tuesday when U.S. officials reported 12 more Americans were killed - eight of them members of the armed forces, raising to more than 1,900 the number of U.S. service members who have died in the country since the invasion.

A Diplomatic Security agent attached to the U.S. State Department and three private American security guards were killed when their convoy was hit by a suicide car bomber Monday in the northern city of Mosul, the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad said. The four were attached to the U.S. Embassy's regional office in Mosul.

The announcements came as British and Iraqi officials issued stinging charges and countercharges about the storming of a Basra jail to free two British soldiers who had been arrested by Basra police. During the raid, British forces learned that Shiite Muslim militiamen and police had just moved the two men to a nearby house. The British then stormed that house and rescued the men.

British Defense Minister John Reid said his forces in the southern city were "absolutely right" to act. But a spokesman for Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari said the operation was "very unfortunate."

Britain's Foreign Office later released a statement it said was from al-Jaafari's office, insisting there is no crisis in relations between the two countries.

"In response to recent events in Basra, the Iraqi government wants to clarify that there is no 'crisis' - as some media have claimed - between it and the British government," said the statement from al-Jaafari's office, according to the Foreign Office. "Both governments are in close contact, and an inquiry will be conducted by the Iraqi Ministry of the Interior into the incident."

A British soldier jumps from a burning tank which was set ablaze after a shooting incident in the southern Iraqi city of Basra on Sept. 19.

The latest American deaths, which raised the overall toll to 1,907, included a soldier from the 18th Military Police Brigade killed in a roadside bombing 75 miles north of the capital Tuesday, the military said.

Four soldiers attached to the Marines died Monday in two roadside bombings near the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad. They were attached to the 2nd Marine Division, II Marine Expeditionary Force.

Three soldiers died Friday, but their deaths weren't announced until Tuesday: Sgt. Matthew L. Deckard, 29, of Elizabethtown, Ky., killed when a bomb went off near his tank during patrol operations; and Army Spc. David H. Ford IV, 20, Ironton, Ohio, and Army 1st Sgt. Alan N. Gifford, 39, Tallahassee, Fla., killed when an explosive detonated near their tank in Baghdad.

Before the eight military deaths were announced, a Pentagon count said 1,479 U.S. service members had died in hostile action in Iraq since the start of the war in March 2003. The toll includes five military civilians and excludes American service members who died from other causes.

Names of the victims were not released in Baghdad, but Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a statement issued in New York, identified the Diplomatic Security officer as Stephen Eric Sullivan. His age and address were not given.

"Steve's death is a tragic loss for all of us at the Department of State. Our thoughts and prayers are with Steve's family. We grieve with them in their loss and stand with them at this difficult time," the Rice statement said.

Oil prices rise as nation awaits storm

By Malden Read
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Crude-oil prices rose Wednesday as traders braced for the possibility that Hurricane Rita could smash into key oil facilities in Texas.

Workers fled oil rigs in the Gulf of Mexico less than a month after Hurricane Katrina tore through the same region. Rita strengthened into a Category 5 hurricane late Wednesday with sustained winds of 165 mph, the National Hurricane Center said, and is likely to hit Texas, the heart of U.S. oil production.

"Prices are going to be driven directly by the projected path of the storm," said John Kilduff, analyst at Fimat USA.

Light, sweet crude for November delivery rose 60 cents to settle at $66.80 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, after surging as high as $68.27 earlier Wednesday.

Heating oil jumped nearly 3 cents to $2.0387 a gallon, while gasoline surged more than 7 cents to $2.0531 a gallon.

On London's International Petroleum Exchange, November Brent crude oil futures gained 53 cents to $64.73 a barrel.

Oil prices slipped from earlier highs after forecasters said Rita would likely hit south of Galveston, Texas, which is near Houston. Traders had been worried about the already-ravaged oil facilities off the Louisiana coast.

"The chance of it turning north to Louisiana is getting slimmer," said Agbeli Amekio, managing partner at the Denver-based energy research firm Enercast.com.

Data showing that gasoline and distillate fuel inventories rose in the last week came as a surprise to analysts and also helped prices ease off highs, but the calming effect was limited.

"It's a silver lining, but it's not positive enough to get traders to stop staring down Rita," Kilduff said.

The U.S. Department of Energy said Wednesday the nation's gasoline inventories rose 3.4 million barrels to 195.4 million barrels in the week ended Sept. 16, still more than 5 percent below year-ago levels.

Inventories of distillate fuels, which include heating oil, rose 800,000 barrels to 134.1 million, more than 5 percent above year-ago levels.

Model's actions are neither condonable nor surprising

With a show like "America's Next Top Model," many aspiring young models have finally had something to turn to that emphasized the career in a positive light, not just the drugs and sex. However, Kate Moss will no longer be holding the "role model" title for those wanting to get into the modeling field. According to a New York Times article, Moss recently admitted to using cocaine after being exposed in a London tabloid. There is such an issue with image perception among young girls, especially within the modeling industry, that this should not come as a surprise or be taken lightly.

Whether Moss believed it or not, she did serve as a role model to people. Her name was one of the most recognizable ones in the modeling industry and, consequently, she became the model associated with mainstream beauty for a long period of time.

One of the pitfalls of celebrity is that you're constantly under the public eye. And while that may not always be welcome, it certainly comes with the territory. Knowing that you can be under such scrutiny at any given moment, it is even more imperative that you set an example, or at the very least, keep in mind what image you're portraying to your public and adoring fans.

However, throwing the fans aside for a second, Moss had another obligation, to her employers. H&M, the company that dismissed Moss from their November fashion collection by Stella McCartney, not only lost an employee, but also now has to get involved in all the negative press surrounding Moss' name.

Moss is not the first semi-celebrity to use drugs and get caught, nor will she be the last. It is also not surprising that she is sadly fitting into the stereotype that prominent models like Tyra Banks have been trying to fight and get away from for so long. Also, now the spotlight will be focusing more closely on other celebrity figures that undoubtedly don't need the excess attention or questioning.

H&M, along with the other advertisers that have booked Moss to be the face of their new fashion/product lines, will now have a very difficult time trying to get their line off the ground because they will be too busy dealing with the petty press inquiries. Now, their image is tainted because of Moss' actions.

Luckily, this will presumably rollover in the near future as the country braces for Hurricane Rita, so young girls who want to be models some day will not have to focus on the stupidity and embarrassment of Moss' actions.

Sox, booze and videotape

Jon Brandt

As another summer ends and another year of school begins, we once again find ourselves smack dab in the middle of a pennant race that will ultimately lead to a prime fall classic. By "we," I mean, of course, the 2004 World Series Champion Boston Red Sox. While many argue that after winning a World Series baseball will never be the same, every student on campus will nonetheless be tuned in come October, and tensions will be as high as ever.

As this beautiful time of year draws closer, I find myself feeling sorry for the class of 2009, who have grown up watching rallies and riots in and around UMass. I have a growing fear that these freshmen will be ready to go the minute the first game of the American League Division Series ends, headed out towards the pyramids in Southwest and looking for a riot.

I am in no way condemning this class as a bunch of troublemakers looking for an excuse to riot, and I am certainly not canonizing any other class by saying previous riots were good natured or innocent. However, you cannot ignore the fact that in recent years our school has gotten a reputation as one of absolute partying and mayhem. Just this year, UMass was reported as the ninth biggest party school in the country as rated by the Princeton Review. Combined with the media coverage of every riot we had last year during the Red Sox victories, I am afraid that the freshmen will assume they are required to go out and get drunk any day of the week, blow off classes simply because they have a large lecture, and rush out of their dorms as soon as the 27th out is recorded in the game.

This is not all our fault. Last year at most of the riots there was a camera crew ready to roll before the games even ended, almost coercing the students to run out and do something stupid to get on TV. Reporters were live on the scene, and camcramen were waving their arms to show the crowds they needed to be louder and crazier. I'm sure most high school seniors watching the news that night were excited at the prospect of coming to this school and the great times that would ensue. It seems as though these kids think it's all about the rioting, and have forgotten that we go outside to cheer and celebraie our teams' victory.

The problem lies in the fact that we go to school surrounded by nothingness, and when you collect thousands of students in a relatively small area who want to blow off steam and go somewhere, you are going to wind up with rowdiness and binge drinking.

The problem lies in the fact that we go to a school surrounded by nothingness, and when you collect thousands of students in a relatively small area who want to blow off steam and go somewhere, you are going to wind up with rowdiness and binge drinking. This is not the school's fault by any means, but if the administration wants to solve the problem, they need to understand it.

As most people would agree, part of the thrill of drinking when you are underage is the danger involved. The fact that you are breaking the law and getting away with it can be a rush, but when kids are being busted regularly every weekend for the same offenses and nothing seems to be helping to stop it, you have to wonder what else should be done. At Washington University in St. Louis, freshmen students are allowed to drink in the dorms, and are actually encouraged to have their doors open. This way RAs will know who is drinking and can monitor the situation.

It would be ridiculous to insist that UMass instantly adopt this policy, but it should be an eye opener that there are other ways of dealing with this situation. While it is still illegal, the police force has recognized that students will be drinking anyway, and with this method in place, the level of incidents in and around the Washington University campus have dropped dramatically. Where am I going with all of this? While fans did celebrate the Cardinals' advance into the World Series, there were no riots that required the police to disburse the crowds.

What it all comes down to is that we live in a community that centers on the weekend, the drinking and the Sox. When all three are put together there can be great times, and there can be displays of primal urge to go out and scream for an hour in honor of your favorite team. I just pray that the freshmen will understand that it's about baseball, and enjoy the game itself instead of waiting for the post-game.

The future of medicine shaky

David Shenkenberg

What if scientific research grinded to a halt? What if, in our era of HIV and uncontrollable cancers, medicines were no longer developed? That is what I have wondered this past year, in light of the attack on scientific research funding by Congress and President Bush.

Researchers working in the natural sciences typically seek their major source of funding from one of two federal government granting institutions, the National Institutes of Health or the National Science Foundation. The federal government has gutted their budgets. In addition, Republicans in the House of Representatives have tried to kill four grants after they were already approved by the NIH through a difficult peer review process based on scientific merit - not based on the scientific understanding of Congressional lawyers.

The result will inevitably lead to fewer graduate students, fewer tenured professors and more laboratory layoffs. To those not participating in scientific research, this means less medical knowledge in the years to come, fewer drugs to cure mankind's ills, and fewer solutions to industrial productivity. This is because the NIH funds research that fulfills medical needs and the NSF funds basic scientific work that must be done before applied sciences can move forward. Sometimes, NIH projects directly result in a new drug or treatment.

Why am I writing this now? If you have not already heard, a rather large hurricane hit the Gulf Coast region very recently and George Bush says that he is funding his over $60 billion recovery program through budget cuts rather than by raising taxes. George Bush was mum on what programs he wants to cut, but it is no doubt that the sciences will only suffer more greatly. Since basic scientists are overwhelmingly Democrats, Bush will not alienate his conservative base by further limiting science research funding.

I spoke with my mother on this subject very recently, and she pointed out that the NIH and NSF did not always exist. Therefore, scientists can apply for funding outside the government, as they used to and as some still do. My counterargument to that was that certain scientifically valuable projects will not be funded under the auspices of wealthy businessmen, corporations and disease survivors. These folks often have tunnel vision; their money goes toward more direct research to combat major diseases like cancer.

George Bush was mum on what programs he wants to cut, but it is no doubt that the sciences will only suffer more greatly. Since basic scientists are overwhelming Democrats, Bush will not alienate his conservative base by further limiting science research funding.

While funding of this kind of research is meritorious, other diseases should not be neglected. Furthermore, cures for major diseases often come unexpectedly, rather than in a formulaic manner. For example, the drug allopurinol was designed to treat cancer, but it is now used to treat gout. Penicillin was discovered after Alexander Fleming left unwashed bacterial plates while on vacation. Did you know that only one out of every five drugs that enters a clinical trial becomes a product?

The lack of funding for basic research comes at a time that is unprecedented in American history. We have heard reports for years that students in our country are lagging behind other countries in the areas of math and science, and recently many technical jobs have moved overseas. Americans' lack of concern for science is such that IBM is now paying for employees to switch to a math or science teaching career.

I would hasten to argue that the lack of interest is strongly correlated with the lack of money per time to degree. After all, accounting is the number one college major in the country right now, followed by engineering and computer science - not exactly fields that do not rely on math or science. Funding has to be increased not only for basic research itself, but also towards professors' salaries.

The solution for the lack of interest for those in basic research has always been to rely on international students to come here and earn a PhD or do postdoctoral research, but the incentive for them to come here is diminishing. A main reason they come is because the United States has such a large NIH/NSF budget that supports a wide-range of projects, whereas poorer nations cannot easily federally support science. If we do not repair the damage to NIH/NSF funding and increase benefits for professors, America will no longer be at the forefront of science, technology and medicine.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

FIRST WEEK 2005 A SUCCESS

The Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life would like to extend a hearty thank you to the UMass Amherst student body for their participation and collaboration with First Week 2005 activities. The return of the spirit, energy and passion that only students can exhibit on our campus was a welcomed sight.

First Week 2005 was a critical success due to the joined forces and enthusiasm of the many offices and volunteers that gave their time and energy long before the week started. I personally want to extend my deep gratitude to all those individuals and offices from Academic Affairs, Administration and Finance, University Advancement and Student Affairs and Campus Life for their early morning, late night and everything in between assistance and for putting into action our Students First philosophy. I encourage the campus community to perpetuate throughout the academic year the good feeling and rousing school spirit that was created during First Week 2005.

Thanks and go UMass!

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life

THE REAL GEORGE W. BUSH

It appears that the bulk of the mass media outlets seem intently fixed on one purpose, and that is to try as hard as they can to impugn the president with charges of deliberate deceit, crass hypocrisy, or just plain being clueless. Far be it for me to abstain from rescuing a drowning man though he is my enemy, but I believe the media are doing themselves a great disservice by obstinately continuing on this wayward path. For starters, the media should have realized by now that this is a failed approach, for it serves only to re-ignite the hatred of those who need not be convinced in their own minds that the president is indeed such things.

It does not in the least change the minds of those who have a better understanding of who he really is. And those who have gotten a glimpse of who George Bush is understand that in spite of his faults, he is a man whose convictions are not governed by the daily banter of internet bloggers or whatever the latest media-run poll may indicate, but by a deep and abiding faith in the person of Jesus Christ. And they also perceive this faith to be somewhat more substantial than simply that which prompts them seizing a photo-op for the cameras, Bible in hand, descending from the steps of the local church - an image of our previous commander in chief that we are all too familiar with.

By all accounts, it is painfully evident that this is an area which is utterly foreign to the media, and which, to their own detriment, they have chosen to remain ignorant of. Should they begin to examine the importance of this aspect of who President Bush is, and discern why the people who perceive him as such support him without reservation, they may begin to understand why, to their utter frustration, their relentless crusade to discredit and smear him will prove again and again to be an exercise in futility. But don't get me wrong - I fully understand that the task at hand is a hard calling, considering that during the previous administration, the same media had to be fully engaged in making the sitting president come across as the morally upright individual he wasn't.

Local artist explores spirituality and science in new exhibit

By Jacqueline Mercer
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"The Mind Expands at 75," a painting exhibit by South Hadley artist Michihiro Yoshida now showing in Northampton's Forbes Gallery, presents stunning works of art depicting the merging of science, spirituality and recent events such as 9/11.

Vibrant colors run through the 20 paintings in the show, from the red swirls of DNA snaking up through "Cogito Ergo Sum II," meaning "I think therefore I am...," one of four works directly inspired by the philosophy of Descartes, to the blue toned fingers of a hand clawing at its own palm in "Nightmare" and the pastel lit, fairy-like woman seeming to float among dark stacks of books in "Dream in Academia."

"We are all locked in our own brain," Yoshida said. "When I recognized this, something clicked in my head. That's the theme of this series."

The amount of time it takes to complete each painting varies. "Some take 10 to 20 days, some take years to complete," said Yoshida, who at 75 years old still runs everyday and seems alert and bursting with energy. "I take ideas for paintings, and I imagine them completely in my head, then I put them on canvas."

Yoshida considers most of his paintings a constant work in progress. "What I keep inside never emerges completely, even if I'm initially satisfied with the work," he said. "Even after it's complete, I never really consider it complete."

Evidence of this can be seen in some of the many paintings plastering the walls of the apartment he shares with his wife, Gloria. He points out that many of them display two dates next to his name, in the lower right corner, one to indicate when he first began work on the painting, and the second to indicate when he considered the work complete to his satisfaction. The passage of time between the two dates can run as much as three decades.

At the young age of fifteen, Yoshida, a native of Japan, enlisted in the Japanese army. There he was stationed just northeast of Hiroshima during the close of World War II. Disillusioned with the war, he described the experience in his artist's statement as being "a miserable and confusing time."

It was then that he came across a still life by the artist Cezanne in an art book he happened to be flipping through. It was "a blue vase and a few apples arranged on a table. It electrified my whole being," Yoshida said.

He has never been able to find out the name of the painting that moved him to become a lifelong artist. "It decided my life, and I don't know which one it is," he said with a laugh and shrug of his shoulders.

In the 60 years since he saw that still life, Yoshida has stayed busy. He paints as much as 16 hours a day, has participated in nearly one hundred art shows all over the world from London to Toronto, and has won a number of awards in juried art competitions.

He has also won major literary awards in Japan for three of the five novels he wrote in the 1970s and 1980s. "I had begun to doubt the trend of modern art and the lack of universal aesthetic values, and did not want to be part of it," he says. "I couldn't ignore this dilemma, continued to paint, but stopped exhibiting. I began to write to crystallize my thinking."

In his lifetime, Yoshida has worked in many mediums. His unique sculptures make up the base of the tables in his living room and sit on his mantle, and his books rest in the shelves of a bookcase nearby, but it is his paintings that he always goes back to. "I have tried many things," he says, "but finally I decided I am a painter." He nods. "That's how I think of myself."

"The Mind Expands at 75" exhibition runs through Sept. 29. Gallery hours are Monday from 1-9, Tuesday, Thursdays and Sunday from 1-5, Wednesday from 9-9, and Friday and Saturday from 9-5. More of Yoshida's paintings can be found on his website at artbyyoshi.com.

Tommy Lee Jones falls short in cliche and unoriginal film

By Stephen Gladwin
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Tommy Lee Jones plays Roland Sharp, a hard-nosed Texas Ranger assigned to protect a squad of University of Austin cheerleaders after they witness the murder of a government informant, in director Steven Herek's "Man of the House." The assignment proves surprisingly difficult for the rugged Ranger, however, when he must contend with the girls' dramatic lives, cluttered with boyfriend troubles, crash diets, and the perils of feminine hygiene.

Contrived doesn't begin to describe this often astonishing collision of low comedy and action, surely the most baffling credit in Jones's filmography.

Clearly the filmmakers fashioned straight-man Jones's role after Robert DeNiro's in the surprisingly successful change-of-pace vehicle "Analyze This." Unfortunately Jones lacks DeNiro's range, possesses no more comedic sensibility than Josef Stalin, and lays waste to the laugh-less script by mugging his cratered abyss in close-ups rather than taking the opportunity to improvise. Equally problematic are the cheerleaders, a slapdash composite of pop culture stereotypes (the saucy Latina, the self-righteous African-American, the dumb blonde, the sensitive one). And, like so many contemporary Hollywood situation comedies, the script has the gall to ask us to care about these thumbnail-sketched characters in a variety of forced emotional situations.

'Man of the House'
Directed by Stephen Herek
Starring Tommy Lee Jones
Revolution
97 mins.
Grade B

It all adds up to a premise that goes nowhere faster than an exercise bike. But for those into this sort of thing, there is a retread of the hackneyed "emasculated boyfriend shopping for tampons" bit featuring a flummoxed Jones shopping for absorbency for his cheerleading witnesses. It's the surreal highlight to this awkward misfire.

Sony Pictures Home Entertainment's Region 1 NTSC DVD features a fine anamorphic 2.40:1 transfer of the film, sporting accurate skin tones and good black levels, although sporadic edge enhancement grows distracting. Dolby Digital 5.1 and 2.0 surround tracks are offered, with the former's surround activity sounding pleasingly robust and belting out plenty of low-frequency bass activity during the action scenes. English and Spanish subtitles are also included.

Extras are few and insubstantial. First up is "The Making of 'Man of the House'" (9 minutes, 37 seconds), a lightweight promotional piece which rounds up the main cast and crew to discuss various aspects of the production. Although the interviews mostly consist of confessions of the other actors' skills, a few mildly interesting pieces of trivia can be gleaned, such as Jones's Spanish fluency and the perks of working on location in Austin (the University of Austin was particularly co-operative in the filmmaking, due in part to Jones's celebrity as a native Texan).

A "Cheer Camp featurette" (4 minutes, 48 seconds) rounds out the "making of" materials and is exactly what one would expect, roping in cheerleading coaches to talk about the intricacies of the routines in the film, interspersed with footage of the perky actresses smiling and fumbling their stunts. Six trailers for other Sony Entertainment titles ("Lords of Dogtown," "Bewitched," "Stealth," Zathura," "Hitch," the "Seinfeld" Season 4 DVD, "Guess Who," "XXX: State of the Union," and "Boogeyman") complete the extras.

Coldplay's Chris Martin thrives on post-adolescent angst

By Evelyn McDonnell
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Chris Martin can make humility an act of hubris, and vice versa. He's as cocky and as insecure as rock stars come, a psychic balancing act reflected in his band Coldplay's crescendo/crash songs.

For instance, during a recent interview, the handsome, Bono-voxed singer says that the four hours he recently spent in a Miami studio with hip-hop producer Timbaland provided a bracing reality check, even while he acknowledges his own superstar status.

"I gleaned that it doesn't matter if you're in one of the biggest bands in the world," Martin says on a mobile phone as his car makes its way out of New York City, en route to a show in Ohio. "It doesn't mean you're very good."

Then Martin concedes this is no revelation. "But I glean that most days."

Thanks to the nagging inescapability of their hummably sad songs - and of course, to Martin's marriage to Hollywood A-lister Gwyneth Paltrow - no band in recent years has pierced the celebrity stratosphere as quickly as Coldplay. When their label EMI announced earlier this year that the British group's album "X&Y" would not come out in the first quarter as originally planned, the public company's stock took a dive. The quartet's June release was then greeted with the kind of fanfare few acts get for their third album. Ad nauseam, Coldplay (Martin, guitarist Jonny Buckland, drummer Will Champion, and bassist Guy Berryman) has been called "the next U2."

It's probably all been too much too fast, as Martin is the first to admit. "It's funny when you realize you've become one of those people that you always used to imagine lived on Mars."

Martin's success may be out of this world but, like so many blue-eyed British pop stars before him, he still kneels at the altar of black American music.

"It was the best fun I've ever had," Martin says of his short experience with Timbaland. Earlier this year, he jokingly (I think) told a magazine that maybe he would chuck Coldplay to be the hip-hop heavyweight's assistant. He won't reveal what the unlikely duo was working on, just keeps using the word "amazing."

The studio time was the finale to an MTV Video Music Awards weekend Martin also says was "amazing."

"It was crazy. First when we got there everyone was talking about the hurricane. Then Suge Knight was killed, then he wasn't killed. Then the MTV awards is kind of funny. Then last night we went out to the studio and one of the girls that works for us, we had to call her an ambulance. It was just a crazy few days."

Coldplay, nominated for four VMAs but winners of none, performed at the show. They eschewed the production's waterworks and dancers for some simple emoting and playing, with Martin wandering into the bleachers and singing to lucky audience members.

"We asked for 500 old men but they said it would damage their ratings," Martin jokes.

The 28-year-old father of 1-year-old daughter Apple likens the VMAs to a school track meet.

"These things are incredibly funny because there's all these people there with all their crews. When you watch it on TV you feel like everyone must know each other - it's all very glamorous. But the reality is ... everyone knows who everyone else is, of course, but everyone's kind of wary of each other."

Martin says he didn't pay too much attention to the onstage and backstage conflicts between 50 Cent's G Unit and Fat Joe's Terror Squad, who insulted each other on the mikes then nearly got into a brawl behind the scenes. "I've been to a few awards show with 50 Cent," he says. "It's the same as with Oasis in London: You're glad they're there cause something might happen."

Besides, speaking two days after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, Martin has more important things on his mind. "The reason why I didn't really notice the beefs and all that is it seemed so irrelevant. There's these big things going on so close by. The arguments between a couple of people at awards shows, they pale in significance. Increasingly in our world we're focusing on the doings of celebrities to distract ourselves from the actual goings-on on the planet. Escapism is really dangerous."

This is the sort of big statement for which Coldplay is known, loved and mocked. Like U2, they are a band with causes, particularly fair trade. These are educated lads who met at college. Their 2000 debut, "Parachutes," was a haunting, hopeful, mournful lullaby emanating from the fallout of Radiohead's "OK Computer" apocalypse. It and '02's "A Rush of Blood to the Head" won Grammys for best alternative albums. And in '03, Martin married Paltrow.

Having sold a whopping 737,294 copies its first week of release, "X&Y" solidifies Coldplay's graduation from alternative to mainstream. The album is a beautiful, if comfortable, compendium of confessed doubts and whispered assurances. Coldplay has been criticized, in some quarters, condemned, for playing it too safe on the record.

You would think having it all - height, good looks, gorgeous wife, No. 1 band, and darling daughter - would inoculate Martin against the barbs of people undoubtedly less blessed than he. But he remains a sensitive lad.

"We've got to a position we've never been in before, where we're kind of part of the structure and so most people have an opinion on us," Martin says. "Whereas three years ago most people didn't have an opinion on us because most people didn't know about us. A lot of people really hate Coldplay at the moment. But I don't think they really understand we always hear about it. It's really hard to accept. We're just trying to come to terms with the fact some people really like us and some people really don't."

The rock band Coldplay performs at the MTV Video Music Awards in Miami, Florida, in August 2005.

Kid's T.V. : Better now or then?

By Jacqueline Ronan,
Collegian Correspondent

This week's subject: Has children's entertainment gotten better or worse?

A few days ago, I was talking to an old friend from high school. At eight months pregnant, she was explaining to me how she couldn't wait to force-feed her child all the stuff from her childhood. "This kid is gonna know every line to 'The NeverEnding Story' whether he likes it or not!" We then went on to discuss how much better the stuff we loved as kids is, than the stuff kids like now.

But that got me thinking: has children's entertainment gotten worse? Or are we too biased to see both the positives and negatives? Focusing mainly on the most abundant form of children's entertainment, television, what are the main differences? We grew up on "Ninja Turtles," "Transformers" and "Care Bears," while they are growing up on, well... "Ninja Turtles," "Transformers" and "Care Bears."

Let's define who they are and who we are first. We have the misfortune of having been deemed the very unoriginal and quite boring Generation Y, named after the much cooler Generation X because Y comes after X - but then again, we could be the Gilded Generation of the early 1800's. Anyway, Generation Y is loosely described as anyone born between the late '70s and the early '90s. The next generation was born between the mid-90s and today. They don't have an official title, so let's go with Generation Z for right now.

One thing that the entertainment of Z has improved upon is having a more diverse face. There wasn't a whole lot of color to found in Y. Let's face it: Gordon from "Sesame Street" basically represented the entire minority population in pop culture back then. We were pretty white. Now, cut to the future, where diversity can be found more and more often. Positive African-American characters on shows like "Little Bill," "Static Shock" and "The Proud Family" are now watched weekly by Z-ers. Dora the Explorer, Maya and Miguel and The Brothers Garcia are breaking Latino stereotypes. The Rugrats celebrate Chanukah, Passover and Kwanzaa. And although these are only a few examples in the overwhelming sea of whitewashed entertainment, at least they are present. At least programmers and studios are beginning to see there is a place for everybody.

But the entertainment of Generation Y had morals and lessons. As a child, I knew not to build a tree house without plans and not to take medication with the help of a grown-up. I have Weisuit and Ripcord to thank for that, because knowing is half the battle. During the '80s, practically every television show featured a public service announcement right before the closing credits, from Inspector Gadget urging you to recycle to Mr. T telling you to stay in school. Z never will know the feeling of having SpongeBob tell you to always look both ways. And compare the biggest female star of today, Lizzie McGuire, with Generation Y's Punky Brewster. True, both have awesome taste in cloths, but that's all Lizzie is really ever concerned with. Meanwhile, Brewster took on the drug trade single handedly using Punky Power as her only means of defense.

But on the other hand, violence was also very present in Y. G.I. Joes would have fired bullets and rockets at their enemies and vice versa. True, they were there to keep the peace, but it was usually with a great amount of force. Batman beat the snot out of bad guys for truth. Power Rangers destroyed city blocks in the fight to protect the city. Nowadays, crumbling skyscrapers just don't have the same appeal. And Wolverine has knives for hands! True, he never really got around to actually stabbing anything with them, but still, he wasn't using them for cutting brownies.

As far as education goes, it's about half and half. Preschoolers today have a lot more options to choose from. Today, Nick Jr. features as much learning programming as PBS does. The most educational thing on Nick Jr. back in Y's day was "Eureeka's Castle," whose head writer was RL Stine (yes, that RL Stine of the "Goosebumps" series). The show had some educational elements, but was more about being silly and showing small cartoon shorts in between. These new shows are designed to keep kids' attention by including them in the show. You have to find Blue's Clue. You have to tell Dora where to go next on the map. All Y had was "Sesame Street."

But it is quite the opposite with older children. Hardly any educational programming is geared toward the 5-and-up crowd today, while our generation's shows for older kids were chock full of education. "Bill Nye the Science Guy" made science rule with his cleverly edited and fast-paced show. "Beakman's World" explained and demonstrated scientific theories with his faithful assistant, Lester the Lab Rat. "Square One TV" had the overwhelming task of making math not mindnumbingly boring, but actually kind of cool. "Where in the World is Carmen San Diego?" was a game show in which contestants used geography and history to track down stolen land marks. Plus, it had a really catchy theme song. And Wishbone the Jack Russell terrier reenacted famous characters from some of the greatest works of literature.

So I guess children's entertainment has gotten both a little better and a little worse. Afternoon lineups are a little less violent and more diverse, but lack the PSAs and education. There is one thing, however, that I really feel Y will have over Z: nostalgia. Will Z be buying "Pokemon" T-shirts at Hot Topic ten years from now? Who knows? Or maybe the next generation won't really spend time pondering who has the better Nick Toons.

Songwriter David Gray 'Shines'

By Jim Farber
New York Daily News

David Gray knows what makes a singer stand out. "They can put a lifetime in a line," he says. "Singers like Nina Simone or Van Morrison or Tim Buckley have voices that tell a story. But it's one that works on a different level. It's never literal. The realm of what's possible expands when you listen to them."

The same can be said for Gray's best vocal forays. On his breakthrough smash, "Babylon," Gray's voice carried a subterranean tug, a mysterious vibe that seemed to lead listeners down to the unconscious.

When Gray first honed that approach, on 1999's "White Ladder" CD, he struck a chord worldwide. The album sold 2.2 million copies in the U.S., and twice that overseas. In Ireland, "White Ladder" became so wildly popular the disk eventually became "standard government issue," Gray jokes.

His followup, 2002's "A New Day at Midnight," which barely varied the "White Ladder" format, sold only 573,000 copies here, though it did much better overseas.

For his latest work, "Life in Slow Motion," Gray has made changes. The singer's first album to feature grand arrangements, it makes full use of an orchestra and scores of backup singers, and has the kind of sonic breadth only a state-of-the-art production studio can provide.

To harness all this, Gray employed Marius DeVries, a producer known for his grandiosity. DeVries previously worked on Rufus Wainwright's operatic "Want One" and the over-the-top "Moulin Rouge" soundtrack, both of which verged on camp.

"I know his work can be extravagant," Gray says. "But the first track on 'Want One' is one of the most astonishing things that has come out in years. And I wanted to work with his scope. He has more than one string in his bow."

To reconcile such a filigreed sound with his intimate style, Gray had to put himself through the creative wringer. "At first, it was more of a dismantling process than a creative process," he says of the album's construction. "We took apart all these bits of songs which we had, and then had to glue them back together. I often felt like we were banging our heads against a brick wall."

Gray even considered chucking his main instrument: the piano. "You get sick of hearing it plodding away," he says. "Tom Waits once said that everyone who plays a piano secretly yearns to throw it off the top of a tall building."

Gray is hardly a stranger to struggle in his career. He made it big at the age of 32 - late in life by pop-star standards. Previously, he had put out three albums that sold meagerly. Having burned through several record contracts, he chose to finance the "White Ladder" CD himself, recording it in his London apartment, mainly with synthesizers and acoustic guitars.

Though Gray was born in the northern English city of Manchester and grew up in Wales, the first rabid audience for his stripped-down sound was Irish. "There's a strong lyrical tradition there and deep ties to acoustic guitars," he says. "And they took to the lyrical nature of what I write.

"Then, of course, there's the Van thing," he adds, referring to Morrison's Northern Ireland origins.

In the U.S., Gray found a financial savior in Dave Matthews, who had once featured him as an opening act in Europe. Matthews signed the budding artist to his ATO label in 2000. "ATO told us, 'We're going to send you out on the road and work your b-ocks off,' which worked," Gray recalls.

He wound up touring in the U.S. more than the rest of the world combined. The result made him one of the few solo male performers to break big in the U.S. in years, along with Jason Mraz and, briefly, Pete Yorn. In a way, Gray's success parallels that of Norah Jones, another singer whose uncommon sincerity and vocal ghostliness enchanted grownup listeners estranged from youth-obsessed pop.

Singer-songwriter David Gray, perhaps best known for his hit "Babylon," is embracing a bigger sound on his latest album "Life in Slow Motion."

Tough start for Spurrier

By Pete Iacobelli
Associated Press

COLUMBIA, S.C. - Nobody thought South Carolina's new coach would have it easy. But even Steve Spurrier expected a smoother return to college football than this.

For 12 seasons at Florida, Spurrier's Gators mashed opponents with few bumps along the way. Three games into his new job at South Carolina (1-2, 0-2 Southeastern Conference), Spurrier's ripping apart his offense and defense, apologizing to fans and searching for players who "love" the game.

He hasn't lost his first two SEC games since 1992 and may have set a record for earliest apology by a first-year coach with his "I'm sorry" to supporters after the Gamecocks fell to Alabama, 37-14, this past Saturday.

"We're not where we hoped we'd be, but we've still got a lot of season left," Spurrier said. "We're not discouraged. We're disappointed that we haven't improved as we've gone thus far."

So now Spurrier turns to some of his newest players to jumpstart the Gamecocks. It's not something he did often with the Gators. But the way the Gamecocks have looked so far, Spurrier feels he's got no choice.

"So I think it's now that we need to give some other players a chance, and also, we've got to tell our players who have been playing that we've got to play with a better effort level," he said.

It's not the first time a national championship coach has been humbled on the South Carolina sidelines. Six years ago, Lou Holtz endured the worst season of his Hall of Fame career, going 0-11 in his Gamecocks debut. Holtz quipped the following summer that when he wrote his autobiography, the chapter of his 1999 Gamecocks would be "The Lost Year."

Spurrier's not conceding anything's lost yet.

But several things have him shaking his head.

A defense counted on to keep South Carolina in games has looked shoddy. It's 11th in the SEC against the run and gave up 338 yards on the ground Alabama, prompting a few frustrating sideline scowls from Spurrier.

The offense is dead last in the SEC at 48.7 rushing yards a game and is a very un-Spurrier-like 11th overall.

They were outgained by Alabama 489-256, prompting Spurrier's words to Gamecocks backers. "I do apologize to our fans. I thought we'd be more competitive than we were today," Spurrier said Saturday said after the biggest home loss in his 15-plus years of college coaching.

Worse yet for Spurrier, he said some of the Gamecocks aren't showing any passion.

"I don't understand it," Spurrier said. "I've seen it on the other side, and I've seen it on my team now. And I don't like it very well and don't have the answer to that."

It was hard for players to argue with the coaches' assessment.

"I mean, you can look at the game tell that we probably weren't as intense as we needed to be," kicker Josh Brown said. "Looking back, we could've done a lot of things different."

Spurrier never promised an SEC title right away. It was generally thought, however, that South Carolina's talent had improved under Holtz's six seasons to where, with a key recruit or two and some touches from the Ol' Ball Coach, Spurrier could at last get the Gamecocks competing for SEC East championships.

That goal seems further away for Spurrier, who's got a seven-year contract with South Carolina.

Spurrier plans to show his players tapes of the Georgia and Alabama games, trying to show the Gamecocks how winning teams do things.

There's reason for hope.

After Holtz's sorry season, the Gamecocks went 17-7 and won back-to-back Outback Bowls - still the high-water mark in 112 years of South Carolina football.

"Hopefully, we can get some things going to help emphasize the point that here's how we expect you to play and if you don't, the other guys are going to play, even if they're not as talented," Spurrier said. "That's OK. Our fans want to see effort and they want to see guys play the game the way it's supposed to be played.

"So that's where we are."

Clearly, it's not where Spurrier figured South Carolina would be.

After a short trip to the NFL, Steve Spurrier returned to college football, but has been unable to produce too much success with South Carolina.

UNH shuts UMass out

ten for the Maroon and White in the game. Before conceding the score, UMass freshman goalkeeper Zack Simmons had gone 213:44 without allowing a goal.

Then, at the 88:38 mark, Masi netted his second goal of the game and of the season. He received a pass from Ross Fishbain and drilled the ball home from five yards out into the corner of the net past Simmons.

Masi's second goal was his fifth shot of the contest.

Koch said coming in knowing UNH was undefeated did little to deter his team's confidence.

"If anything, it was more incentive and motivation on our part," Koch said. "We weren't intimidated."

For the Minutemen, the loss comes right after it looked as though they were going to right the ship after a tough 1-3 start.

"Nobody likes to lose," Koch said. "We need to look at the things we did and didn't do well and work on those."

One bright spot for the Minutemen in the loss is the continued steady play of Simmons and the emergence of sophomore midfielder Matty Lemire.

Although he gave up the two UNH goals, Simmons is still enjoying a stellar season given his current circumstances. With the return of junior Nick Billman expected soon, there is added pressure on Simmons to perform in order to keep his job.

So far this season, Simmons has made a pretty good case for himself and is in the top five in the Atlantic 10 for four categories: saves (33), minutes (637:49), saves per game (4.70), and goals against average (1.27). His minutes and saves are good for the league lead.

With senior sniper Oral Bullen missing his third game in a row with an ankle injury, the Minutemen looked again to LeMire to provide their offense. Against the Wildcats, he did manage to fire three shots on net.

Since Bullen has been sidelined, LeMire seems to have embraced the role of the go-to man. In the three games against Cornell, Navy and UNH he has paced the rest of the team with two goals and 10 shots on net.

LeMire now leads the team in points with six on three goals.

"He's been playing well," Koch said. "He's definitely our most potent attacking player right now with Oral on the bench injured. He's working off the ball better than he did earlier in the year. He's really helping us out."

Chris Brown has started seven games for the UMass men's soccer team, which fell to the UNH Wildcats yesterday.

Perfect start for Cornhuskers

By Eric Olson
Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. - Nebraska has a perfect record and a perfectly dreadful offense.

The Cornhuskers are averaging 271.3 yards per game, 106th out of 119 Division I-A teams. They have as many wins (three) as offensive touchdowns.

The Cornhuskers' defense has scored four TDs and allowed just one. To be sure, the Blackshirts are the reason Nebraska has won three straight to start the season for the eighth time in nine years.

Being 3-0 isn't necessarily good enough in this football-mad state, where folks grew accustomed to seeing teams coached by Tom Osborne and Frank Solich roll up big numbers against overmatched opponents.

Nebraska has struggled against Division I-AA Maine and I-A weaklings Wake Forest and Pittsburgh. The Huskers are off until their Oct. 1 Big 12 opener against Iowa State.

"We're living on the edge," said quarterback Zac Taylor, the new starter in Bill Callahan's West Coast offense. "We're definitely pressing things a little bit. The fans might be frustrated we only put seven points on the board, but we know we're going to keep improving and we're going to be successful."

Taylor was referring to last week's 7-6 win over Pittsburgh - which ended with Nebraska avoiding an upset by blocking a field-goal attempt as time ran out.

In the days that have followed, grumbling has begun in earnest among fans who are growing weary of Callahan's offense.

No Nebraska offense has been this inept since the 1968 team, which went 6-4 while averaging 279.2 yards. In response to the '68 debacle, Bob Devaney changed from a pro-style offense to the I-formation.

Don't count on Callahan diverging from his beloved West Coast offense.

The second-year coach bristled this week when asked if he might simplify the motion-and-shift heavy offense to make it more appropriate for college players who can spend only 20 hours a week studying its nuances.

No. All the problems are correctable, he said.

"There are a lot of things that we've got to improve upon, but I'm going to continue to be positive," Callahan said. "I know all the naysayers out there continue to bash whatever it is they want to go bash, but it really doesn't affect our ability to focus and concentrate on our offense."

Joe Dailey was the fall guy for last year's 5-6 record, and he transferred to North Carolina after dropping to No. 4 on the quarterback depth chart last spring. But he was arguably more productive than Taylor, who has completed 43.8 percent of his passes (39 of 89) for 399 yards, with one touchdown and three interceptions.

The offensive line has been mediocre, at best. Taylor has been sacked seven times and hurried many others. The line also has had a knack for committing penalties.

Then there's the play-calling of Callahan, who has been criticized for stubbornly passing against opponents who appear vulnerable to the run.

Case in point: He called three straight pass plays after Nebraska had driven to the 2-yard line against Maine, only to see Taylor throw an interception. Some couldn't help but wonder why Nebraska, with its power-football tradition, would do anything except run in that situation.

I-back Cory Ross has been Nebraska's most consistent threat. He ran for 153 yards against Pitt and is second in the Big 12 and 14th nationally at 118.7 yards a game.

But even the rushing game is one-dimensional. Ross has 72 carries in three games. No other back has more than 16 carries.

The Huskers signed one of the highest-ranked recruiting classes in the nation this year, but offensive coordinator Jay Norvell said they need more West Coast-style players.

"We have got to be the kind of team that finds a way to win," Norvell said. "That's what we have to do on offense until we get established guys who are playmakers. We just have to find ways to get first downs and score points and take advantage of our opportunities in field position."

Meanwhile, the defense knows it has its work cut out.

The Blackshirts are allowing 5.3 points a game and have 20 sacks - both nation-leading figures. They are ninth nationally in total defense, at 232 yards a game.

"We're going to take (wins) however we can get them," cornerback Cortney Grixby said, "whether it's 7-6, 3-0 or 2-0."

ners.

UMass had won five straight overtime games going into Tuesday night, but in the 15-minute "sudden victory" overtime, BU dominated the Minutewomen, outshooting them 6-1.

The Terriers put the pressure on, and Wiles scored her second goal of the game after a penalty corner, giving BU the win.

Shea was extremely confident going into overtime, but felt her team didn't execute.

"I'll take my team over any team in overtime," Shea said. "But when you give up a corner in overtime, you're at a huge disadvantage. We gave them the advantage because we didn't stay disciplined and play within our game plan."

Although the Minutewomen did not capitalize on the opportunities, their defense has been improved lately, limiting teams to two goals or less over the last six games. That strong defensive effort continued Tuesday, as they held the Terriers to only two goals.

UMass senior Jaime Bawden noticed the improvements and believes they have had a big effect on keeping BU's leading scorer, Sarah Shute, off the board.

"It's been a good team effort, and we're working together to keep the ball up the field," the Bawden said. "We weren't really picking up on her [Shute]. We made sure all of their tackles were outside the circle, and we kept them to the side as much as possible."

Overall, Shea believes her team played well, but felt the few mistakes they made cost them the game.

"We transferred the ball. We possessed the ball. We did exactly what we needed to do. We just didn't finish, and we need to finish."

The Minutewomen will go on a four game road trip starting on Saturday and will return home to play La Salle on Oct. 14.

jerseys. Even with her competent offensive skills (two goals, three assists and 7 points on the young season), her efforts to present a consistent offensive presence against a swarming Dartmouth defense were futile.

"It's disappointing because of the effort (the players) put in," Rudy said of the loss. "And they know it too. I'll take this game any day over Vermont even though we dominated that (team) more than anybody we dominated in three years. But we almost beat this team."

In the Vermont match that Rudy referred to, the Minutewomen suffered their first loss at Rudd field this season against the Catamounts, losing 2-1 - UMass out shot Vermont 23-7 in that game, and was the subject of a rule reversal yesterday afternoon as it was out shot 30-6 by the Big Green.

UMass was looking to take Vermont's place in yesterday's match as the overmatched team that, for a stretch, outplays the better squad and comes away with a victory.

However, despite the Minutewomen's best effort and well-executed game plan, the goals needed for victory were elusive.

Despite playing at Rudd Field, the UMass women's soccer team was unable to defeat visiting Dartmouth College.

"We stuck to it [the game plan] pretty much. I like the discipline of that - they stuck to it. they never gave up. They battled; people came off the bench and did a nice job," Rudy said.

Katrina forces Hornets to move

In addition to use of the city-owned Ford Center, built in 2002, the city will make provisions for the Hornets to have a practice facility, downtown office space and housing for the upcoming season. Approximately 7,500 tickets for each of the 35 games will be priced at $20 or less.

"We have a minimum amount of risk for a really substantial reward," Councilman Patrick Ryan said.

The move also makes geographic sense. While Oklahoma City is more than 700 miles away from New Orleans, the Hornets' Southwest Division foes in Dallas, San Antonio and Houston won't have to trek far to play games here.

Oklahoma City will be the Hornets' third home in five seasons. The team, which moved from Charlotte in 2002, ranked last in the league in attendance last season with an average of 14,221.

City Council members unanimously approved a lease that would provide financial support for the Hornets should their revenue drop. If the team does not earn 5 percent more in local revenue than it made in New Orleans last season, taxpayers and local businessmen must pay the team as much as $10 million.

If the team exceeds last season's revenues by more than 5 percent, Oklahoma City would receive 80 percent of the proceeds to cover about $2 million in expenses for game-day operations, housing, office space and arena improvements for the Hornets.

Approximately 7,500 tickets for each of the 35 games will be priced at $20 or less. Fans will be able to buy season tickets in the lower bowl for $999.

"I'd rather have a full house at a medium price than half-full at a high price," said Shinn, who compared the approach to the strategy that helped make the Hornets the No. 1 team in average attendance during its first eight seasons in Charlotte.

Times have changed for Dillon

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBOROUGH, Mass. - A few years ago, Corey Dillon might have handled his slow start with a scowl and a swear.

He had a reputation as a selfish malcontent who was tired of being part of Cincinnati's annual struggles. He wasn't happy being counted on to carry the Bengals on the field and to be a leader in the locker room. On April 19, 2004, Cincinnati traded him to the New England Patriots.

Dillon adopted the Patriots' emphasis on togetherness and had an outstanding season. His performance is off so far this season, but his team approach remains strong.

"Three, four years ago? I don't know" if he'd be as calm, he said. "It prepared me for this. At this stage of my career, I don't worry about stuff like that."

In two games, Dillon has rushed for 99 yards and the three-time champions are 1-1.

Last season, he had 244 yards rushing after two games. He ran for 1,635 yards, a Patriots single-season record and his career high. He averaged 109 yards rushing per game, tops in the NFL.

He also made the playoffs for the first time in his eight-year career and became a champion when New England beat Philadelphia in the Super Bowl, 24-21. He even scored on a 2-yard run.

So the changed man isn't about to revert to his former personality just because of two mediocre games.

"That volcano blew its top a long time ago," he said. "It's done. I'm calm. I'm just ready to work this week, try to do something positive and get the thing started."

Dillon isn't the only reason the Patriots offense has struggled. The line hasn't opened enough holes and Tom Brady hasn't hit enough receivers. Special teams also have had problems and the defense allowed three touchdowns in last Sunday's 27-17 loss at Carolina.

But Dillon, who had six 1,100-yard rushing seasons in his seven with Cincinnati, accepts his share of the blame.

"I'm going to ride with my boys. [There's] no finger-pointing coming from me or from anybody else around here. It's a team thing," he said. "I take it personally. It's a reflection on me. Whether anybody [else] sees it [that way], that's how I see it."

At Carolina, Dillon gained 36 yards on 14 carries. Brady wasn't sharp either with 23 completions for 270 yards with a touchdown pass and interception. Take away a 71-yard catch and run by Troy Brown, and Brady totaled 199 yards on 22 completions.

"When you run the ball, you can control the clock and you can control the tempo of the game," Brady said Wednesday. "If you're always throwing [the ball] there's just a lot of things that can happen on a pass play that aren't good."

None of that helps the running game.

"There are little mental things, an error here and there," center Dan Koppen said. "It's a process. We're still coming together as a unit and it's going to be that way until the 16th game."

The third game poses a tough challenge. The Patriots play Sunday at Pittsburgh, which has allowed 14 points in two games.

Dillon knows the Steelers well, having played against them twice in each of his seven seasons with Cincinnati and twice in Pittsburgh last season - a 34-20 loss in the regular season and a 41-27 win in the AFC championship game.

"By no means is it going to be cakewalk," he said. "That's a tough team."

The key for Dillon is to remain patient. He's confident the running game will take off.

"I'm just out there being me, seeing what I see as a runner," he said. "If I see something develop a different way, I'm going to take that opportunity to try to get upfield with the ball. Unfortunately, I haven't been doing a good job of it."

Although his team is 1-1 and his yards are down, Patriots tailback Corey Dillon is not spreading the blame.

Pats sole slayers of Big-Ben

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH - No NFL quarterback has started his career like the Steelers' Ben Roethlisberger, who has gone a year without losing a regular season game.

Ben Roethlisberger, a second-year quarterback for the Pittsburg Steelers, was shutdown against the New England Patriots during the 2005 playoffs.

perfect rookie season into a not-so-perfect one.

The New England Patriots are the only team that has found a way to beat Roethlisberger, who is 15-0 during the season and 16-1 counting the playoffs. The lone defeat was that 41-27 loss in the AFC him a different look defensively on nearly every play. Roethlisberger appeared confused and unconfident - possibly because he was coming off a shaky performance in an overtime playoff win over the Jets. He passed for 226 yards and two touchdowns, but threw three interceptions that were pivotal to New England opening leads of 24-3 and 31-10.

He has watched that game tape several times in the last nine months, but still isn't quite sure what he should learn from it.

"It stayed with me for a little while just because you're disappointed with a loss," Roethlisberger said Wednesday. "But you don't dwell on it, you don't let it bring you down because you want to get better, and find out how you make mistakes so you can learn from them."

What he did notice was how well Patriots quarterback Tom Brady manages a game - not just finding open receivers, but reading defenses and running a virtually mistake-free offense.

"To me, he's the best quarterback in the league hands down," Roethlisberger said. "People say [the Colts' Peyton] Manning, but Tom Brady is by far the best. The things he does ... it seems like he's got a force field around him. It's fun to watch him play.

"It seems like he can make all the reads before the ball is even snapped. It's like he's got some special powers, that's how good he is," Roethlisberger said.

Roethlisberger has been more than a reasonable facsimile of Brady as the Steelers have won their first two games by margins of 20 or more points for the first time in franchise history. He had a perfect 158.3 passer rating in a 34-7 rout of Tennessee, and was almost as good in a 27-7 win over Houston on Sunday.

So far, Roethlisberger is 23-of-32 for 472 yards, four touchdowns, no interceptions and a 153.6 passer rating. By contrast, Brady had a poor game by his standards in New England's 27-17 loss Sunday to Carolina, throwing an interception and losing a fumble.

Of course, it has helped Roethlisberger that Willie Parker, a third-team running back a year ago, has 272 yards in two games. And an offensive line that sent three players to the Pro Bowl has been nearly flawless in protecting Roethlisberger, who has been sacked just once, and creating running lanes for Parker.

"They run the ball. He throws it downfield. They pick up third downs. They control the game," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said, giving a simplistic description of the Steelers offense that very well could describe his own offense.

To counter that consistency, Roethlisberger expects the Patriots to do much like they did in the AFC title game by reducing their blitzing and dropping extra defenders into coverage.

"I would assume they're going to try and make me and the passing game beat them," he said. "That's just my assumption but, normally when you assume things, you're wrong."

Presidents Cup begins

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

GAINESVILLE, Va. - There is plenty of history at this Presidents Cup, mostly the monuments and landmarks around the Robert Trent Jones Golf Club, and the roadside markers that tell about key moments from the Civil War.

These matches are mostly about being civil.

"This is a game. That's all it is," U.S. captain Jack Nicklaus said. "It's not a war."

The reference was to the Ryder Cup, which took on a life of its own over the last two decades with marketing ploys such as the "War on the Shore" and the "Battle at Brookline." It made the Ryder Cup one of the marquee golf events in the world, but brought along plenty of acrimony.

That's hard to find at the Presidents Cup.

As the sun rose over the trees behind the driving range Wednesday morning, Fred Couples was loosening up with a few wedge shots when he realized his grips were too smooth.

Standing behind him was Brennan Little, the caddie for Mike Weir of Canada.

"You want some sandpaper?" Little said.

"Yeah. Do you have some?" Couples said, then realized he had fallen for a trick. "Oh, I get it. There's a Home Depot down the street, right?"

Both laughed, and Little headed inside to get the sandpaper.

"You're on the International side, and you're helping me out?" Couples said, feigning incredulity.

Later in the afternoon, Nicklaus and International team captain Gary Player sat at a table with their assistants next to them to talk about the first session of pairings Thursday. Player's assistant is Ian Baker-Finch, who pulled out a stack of 5-pound British notes with Nicklaus' image on the front.

"Jack, I've got 100 5-pound notes. Can you sign them for me?" Baker-Finch said.

"Now?" Nicklaus replied. "I've got nothing better to do."

Turns out he only had 18 bills, but Nicklaus sat at the table and scribbled away until it was his turn to talk.

And how's this for everyone getting along?

Tiger Woods walked off the first tee with Butch Harmon at his side. Harmon was there with Couples, with whom he has worked the last two years; Woods and Couples will be paired in the first match Thursday afternoon against Adam Scott and two-time U.S. Open champion Retief Goosen.

The Presidents Cup once was described as the United States against a bunch of guys from Florida, which is only a slight exaggeration. Most players from the International team (every country but Europe is eligible) have homes in the United States and play primarily on the PGA Tour.

They see each other just about every week. Vijay Singh lives a mile or so away from Jim Furyk and Fred Funk in Ponte Vedra Beach, Fla. They will be opponents Thursday, with the Furyk-Funk team taking on Singh and Mark Hensby of Australia (who lives in Arizona) in the second of six alternate-shot matches.

But don't get the idea this is a hit-and-giggle affair a team event in which no one cares who wins.

"Just because the match is friendly doesn't mean that it can't be intense," Furyk said. "These matches have always had a great spirit to them. We all have a lot of pride. If one side is going to win this week, you can bet that one of us is going to be crowing a little bit, all winter, talking about the matches."

There was more confusion than crowing the last time.

The Presidents Cup ended in a bizarre tie two years ago in South Africa. After four days left the teams at 17-all, Woods and Ernie Els played a nail-biting playoff that lasted three holes and more pressure over par putts than either had faced in the 11 majors they have won.

When it was too dark to continue, Nicklaus and Player agreed to a tie. But when Nicklaus gently reminded Player that the United States would retain the cup because it was defending champion, the International team revolted.

They agreed to share the cup, leaving a score to settle this time around.

The advantage goes to the Americans.

Both teams have an array of stars - most agree that the International team is stronger than anything Europe can offer in the Ryder Cup - but the Americans have dominated on their home course at the Presidents Cup. They are 3-0 at RTJ, and five years ago turned the biggest rout in the short history of this event, winning 21 1/2-10 1/2.

One reason might be that a more civil atmosphere makes the Americans more relaxed.

"Our team tends to be a little more loose," Furyk said. "We have a little bit more fun during the Presidents Cup."

The Presidents Cup still has its moments.

defensive squad, which has limited its opponents to a total of nine points in three games.

Leading that group is a combination of run-stoppers, pass-rushers and shutdown defensive backs that have been practically flawless in 2005.

Amherst native James Ihedigbo, a redshirt junior, has been harassing the opposing quarterback so far this season, registering 4.5 sacks and seven tackles for a loss.

Playing alongside Ihedigbo is All-American senior free safety Shannon James, who has recorded two picks this season and increased his career total to 18.

For Brown, the trick to producing a stifling defense is simply solid play and straight execution.

"We made no mistakes, we have a very talented group," Brown said. "We've been executing as a high level as I can ever recall as a head coach. I just think we've got a lot of good players, a lot of solid guys whose sole concern is just trying to win football games, and that's the beauty of it."

The ability to hold the opposition to zero points is only matched by the capacity to put 40 points on the scoreboard, as the Minutemen offense did on Saturday.

Led by redshirt freshman Liam Coen (34-55, 406 yds., three touchdowns this season), UMass recorded 444 total yards on offense and tore apart the Albany defense.

With Coen getting his first start under center on Saturday, he is ready to officially take the reins of the Maroon and White.

"Getting in the film room a little bit more, knowing the game speed and just knowing what you've got to do to win," Coen said. "Kind of more game management and just being a little bit more confident is the key for me, just confidence in my ability and the guys around me."

The rushing game has produced a one-two punch with Steve Baylark (67 carries, 277 yds., one TD) taking the load of the carries and picking up the yards. Baylark, a redshirt junior, now has 2,799 career rushing yards and was recently a nominee for the Walter Payton Award.

The other half of the rushing attack is R.J. Cobbs, who moved from receiver to tailback to help with injuries in the Minuteman backfield. Cobbs sets a different pace when taking the place of Baylark and currently has 110 yards on 19 carries and two touchdowns.

With the conference games the gateway to championship play, Coen and the UMass offense understand the pressure of getting the job done.

"There's pressure when it comes to being the quarterback in any system on any team," Coen said. "There's definitely pressures to have to continue to play well and manage the game, take care of the ball."

Wie prepares for pro career

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

Everywhere she goes, people can't help but notice Michelle Wie.

As a 13-year-old still wearing a retainer, she was warming up on the practice range for a junior pro-am at the Sony Open in Honolulu. When she pulled out her driver, five PGA Tour players on both sides of her stopped to watch her launch tee shots that approached the 300-yard marker.

Last year in Portugal, where Wie received the Laureus World Newcomer of the Year award, she walked into the banquet room filled with celebrities that included as Michael Douglas, Morgan Freeman and Placido Domingo.

"Everyone in the room stopped what they were doing and watched her go to her table," said Greg Nared, a Nike business manager who has been tracking Wie the last two years. "That told me a lot."

The 15-year-old from Hawaii who commands so much attention is on the verge of commanding top money. Wie is about to turn pro, and endorsements estimated to be worth as much as $10 million a year await.

Two sources close to Wie, speaking on condition of anonymity because she is still an amateur, said the announcement will not be made until endorsement deals are signed.

That could be done before the Samsung World Championship, which starts Oct. 13, two days after her 16th birthday. It will be the eighth and final LPGA Tour event Wie plays this year.

"There is nothing to say until everything is completed," her father, B.J. Wie, said Wednesday.

He added that "we are getting close," but said her decision to turn pro would not be related to Samsung.

"It doesn't have to be associated with a tournament she would play," the father said. "There is no target date we have to meet."

When it happens, she will be the highest-paid female golfer in the world.

One deal that is nearing completion is with Nike, which is no surprise. Wie has been playing its irons and golf ball the last two years, and often wears the swoosh on her clothing. A source with knowledge of the negotiations said the deal could be worth anywhere from $4 million to $5 million a year.

She also is working on a deal with an Asian-based electronics company that could be worth about $3 million a year. Golf World magazine reported another possible endorsement with an airline company.

Annika Sorenstam, the best player in women's golf, makes about $7 million a year in endorsements. No other female golfer is remotely close.

"Did I hear she might make $10 million a year?" David Toms said Wednesday. "I'd like to get half that much. And I've won a tournament."

Early projections were that Wie could command up to $20 million a year in endorsements, and her potential earnings could surpass that. But the family is starting slowly and conservatively, in part because Wie still has two years left before she graduates Punahou School in Honolulu.

"If I was handling the strategy, it would be a five- to eight-year strategy," said Steve Lauletta, who ran Miller Brewing's sports marketing for 10 years and now is president of Omnicom's Radiate Sports Group. "Maybe you do one or two now, and 24 months down the road, you add another one or two. Not only are there commitments with school, but she's so young. You're interacting with corporate CEOs, older persons.

"She might not be as comfortable talking to them as she will be five years down the road."

B.J. Wie declined to discuss endorsement opportunities, but he noted that his daughter - who made straight As in the spring semester while playing three LPGA Tour events - wants to graduate with her class and still wants to purse a business degree, preferably at Stanford.

"She wants to complete her schooling and be in control of her own business empire," swing coach David Leadbetter said. "I would say there's no question she's got some great goals, more than being a golfer. She's learning Chinese, Japanese. She soaks up so much information."

Her golf plans are a little clearer.

Those plans took root in January, as Wie was getting ready to play in the Sony Open for the second straight year. Her father spoke that day of her becoming a global golfer, with a base on the LPGA Tour, but also taking her game to Europe and Asia to compete against men and women.

As popular as she is in the United States - record crowds at the John Deere Classic, where she nearly made the cut, and spiked attendance on the LPGA Tour - Wie might be an even bigger draw in Asia.

She was born in Hawaii and has a Korean heritage, and she has spoken Japanese to Shigeki Maruyama while paired with him at a pro-am in the Mercedes Championships at Kapalua. And if the novelty of a 15-year-old girl who hits it a mile is starting to wear off in the United States, that isn't the case overseas.

"I went to her interview before the Women's British Open, and I couldn't believe how full the room was. It was overflowing," Leadbetter said. "When Annika went in there, it was 25 percent full. The buzz for Michelle was amazing."

Wie tied for third at the British Open, seven shots out of the lead. She was runner-up in another major, the LPGA Championship, finishing three shots behind Sorenstam.

It was part of a dynamic summer in which she was on the verge of making the cut at the John Deere Classic until a double bogey on the 16th hole; then reached the quarterfinals of the U.S. Amateur Public Links.

While she beat women routinely as a 10- and 11-year-old in Hawaii tournaments, her only substantial victory was the U.S. Women's Amateur Public Links as a 13-year-old in 2003.

Lauletta is among those who believe Wie will have to win tournaments to sustain her marketability. But it's the potential that has allowed her to live up to the hype that surrounds her.

"The potential to dominate is what appeals to a lot of people," Lauletta said. "One of the qualities she has is being the next big thing. When you're the next big thing, they want to notice you and see what it is. And she's that. There's no doubt about it."

Battle under the lights

Minutemen await the No. 25 Rams in a Saturday night clash

By Eric Attias
Collegian Staff

With the talk of a championship buzzing through the air of the Pioneer Valley, the Massachusetts football team (2-1 1-0 Atlantic 10) will begin a long string of conference games on Saturday, when it takes on No. 25 Rhode Island (3-0 1-0 A-10) under the lights of Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium at 6 p.m.

The Saturday night game comes a week after the home opener for the Minutemen, in which they pounded Albany 40-0. While the time and place of Saturday's contest remains the same, the opponent is significantly different.

The Rams knocked off conference-foe William and Mary by a margin of 48-29 last Saturday, and in the process of doing so, racked up a total of 561 team-rushing yards.

Although the score was somewhat lopsided, William and Mary came out firing, scoring two first quarter touchdowns and taking a 14-0 advantage after under less than 10 minutes of play.

However, Rhode Island took a lead it would never surrender scoring three straight touchdowns - a 43-yd. pass from Jayson Davis to Keith Brown, and two rushing touchdowns by Davis - and went on to upset the No. 16 Tribe.

In a conference that features seven top-25 teams in the recent poll released by The Sports Network, the Minutemen realize the importance of A-10 games, but do not let the pressure overwhelm them.

"I don't think there's any pressure, it's just time to have fun and get ready to play conference football, that's the fun piece," UMass coach Don Brown said. "When you're in conference, those are the things you aspire to be is conference champions, those are the games you get excited about and light your hair on fire and go play."

One group that has been fired up in the first three games for the Maroon and White is the

UM falls to Green

It took one hundred and six minutes, fifty seconds and almost two full overtimes for a team to crack the scoreboard in the Massachusetts women's soccer match against Dartmouth yesterday at Rudd Field.

In the end, it was Dartmouth's Sarah Johnson who ended the Minutewomen's hopes against the No. 4-ranked team in the Northeast Region, icing the game with a free kick just outside the 18-yard goal box that found the left side of the net in the second overtime.

The shot was just out of the reach of the diving UMass goalie, junior Kristin Walker, who posted a career-high in saves with 17 on the afternoon.

As the Dartmouth shot total moved into the thirties and the second overtime passed into the waning minutes, the prospect of a tie was an enticing one for the Minutewomen, who could count their shot opportunities on one hand.

The pre-game strategy for UMass was damage control, as the Dartmouth squad has received votes for a national ranking and has a 4-2 record in a tough Ivy League. The Minutewomen were successful in subduing Dartmouth for the majority of the game, as shot after shot went wide of the net and Walker kept making diving saves.

The ball went into the middle of the goal box on numerous occasions, leaving UMass fans and coaches cringing, hoping for a clear-out.

Against other talented opponents, the Minutewomen would focus on defense then give a burst of offensive intensity at the start of the second half to try and steal a win from a better opponent. UMass coach Jim Rudy, however, felt that Dartmouth deserved its own game plan.

"We decided we're not going to (focus on offense)," Rudy said after the game. "We're going to keep it as tight as we can and hope to score on the breaks. And we almost did. I mean, Brit [Canfield] got in there three times."

Rudy is referring to three of the six shots that the Minutewomen posted on the day, half of them were from Canfield, who broke away from Big Green defenders on several occasions, but wasn't able to finish.

A particularly frustrating moment for Canfield and the Minutewoman offense came in the second at the 10 minute mark, when Canfield received a pass from the midfield leading her down the right side of the goal box. The Dartmouth keeper committed to the ball and came out to stop it; Canfield connected but ripped the shot wide right, catching the outside of the net.

It was the closest UMass would come to scoring, as Canfield had only a few opportunities in UMass' game of attrition.

"We dodged more bullets than they did for sure," Rudy said. "The idea was to keep (Darmouth) on the outside, make them shoot long range, have them play over the top, and our keeper played almost like a sweeper - just keep them out so we could find the little niches in their system where we could get the breaks and we had a few."

The incessant Dartmouth attack was accented by mere possession of the ball. The pace of the game was dominated by the Big Green, and the ball seldom left the Minutewomen's half of the field.

When the ball was advanced far enough for Canfield to get control of it, she was immediately engulfed in green

Minutewomen lose in OT

The Massachusetts field hockey team suffered a heartbreaking 2-1 overtime loss to Boston University on Tuesday at Garber Field. BU freshman Holly Wiles scored her second goal of the game 5:31 into overtime to give the Minutewomen (3-6) their sixth loss of the season.

Coach Patty Shea knew her team executed the game plan, but said it was the little mistakes that hurt them.

"Technically, tactically and game plan-wise, we did what we wanted to do," Shea said. "The difference is, when we make a mistake, other teams absolutely put the stake through our heart. And we don't do that."

After a scoreless first half, the Minutewomen got on the board first with a goal from Nicole Phelan 4:55 into the second half. The sophomore from North Andover scored her second goal of the season after freshman Katelyn Orlando pushed the ball up the field, and made a pass to the left side, setting up Phelan to take it in and score.

BU (4-3) then turned up the pressure and recorded six shots and three corners in the next eight minutes of play.

UMass sophomore goalkeeper Becky Letourneau kept the Minutewomen in the game with a handful of big saves, but with 23:10 left in regulation, BU freshman Holly Wiles scored her third goal of the season to tie the game.

The Minutewomen had a chance to take a lead with 10:00 left in regulation, but whiffed on a penalty corner, sending the ball back into to their territory.

Both teams played strong in the second half, with shots and penalty corners being just about even. At the end of regulation, BU had outshot UMass 11-10, but the Minutewomen had a 5-4 advantage in penalty cor-

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-4) met their match yesterday afternoon in the form of the undefeated No. 23 New Hampshire Wildcats (6-0-1). The Minutemen dropped the match in Durham by a score of 2-0.

With the loss, UMass drops below .500 for the third time this season while the Wildcats remain undefeated. It is also the second time this season the Minutemen have been shutout by their opponent.

The road has not treated the Maroon and White well this season. Although they are undefeated at Rudd Field (2-0), they have only one win away from Amherst, at 1-4 so far in 2005.

UNH scored its first goal on a penalty kick by Eric Masi at the 56:55 mark of the second half. The Wildcats then added to their lead just before the end of regulation when Masi netted his second goal of the game.

"We have to understand where we are on the field and not give up a silly penalty kick," UMass coach Sam Koch said after the loss. "Then the second goal, we just lost focus late in the game when we were pushing people up, which is not acceptable."

The penalty kick was awarded when UNH's Adam Marcellus was pushing the ball into the goalkeeper's box and was sandwiched by two UMass defenders. The foul was one of

Hornets find temporary home

By Jeff Latzke
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY - Chased from their home by Hurricane Katrina, the New Orleans Hornets have found a temporary refuge and a fresh start.

The Hornets announced plans Wednesday to play 35 home games in Oklahoma City and six others in Baton Rouge, La., after a relocation agreement was approved by the city council.

The New Orleans Arena sustained extensive water damage from the hurricane and will take months to repair. But even if New Orleans is ready to welcome the team back before the 2005-06 season ends, the Hornets are locked into their 35 dates at the 19,675-seat Ford Center.

The team will alter its home jerseys so they read "Hornets" on the front. The road jerseys will feature the words "New Orleans," but a patch on the shoulder will recognize Oklahoma City. In standings and statistics, the NBA plans to call the team the New Orleans/Oklahoma City Hornets.

Playoff games would also be played in Oklahoma City, and the Hornets will have the option to stay for an extra year.

"This whole thing is somewhat bittersweet," owner George Shinn said. "I've got a fine line to walk. I want to be enthusiastic to the people here and let them know I'm proud and that we're going to make this thing work. I also want to make sure that people in New Orleans have hope because they've gone through a lot.

"It's not even real. It's unreal what they're going through. I want to try to give them hope and to let them know our goal is to come back."

All of the Hornets' games against Eastern Conference opponents will be played in Oklahoma City. The games scheduled for Baton Rouge are Dec. 16 against Phoenix, Jan. 13 against Sacramento, Jan. 18 against Memphis, March 8 against the Los Angeles Lakers, March 18 against Denver and March 21 against the Los Angeles Clippers.

The three games scheduled for Baton Rouge in March could be moved to New Orleans if circumstances permit, league attorney Joel Litvin said.

"I was in New Orleans just this past week. It is a terrible, terrible feeling to see all the homes that, to me, look destroyed," Shinn said. "It's not just the arena. If the arena is in playing condition, will there be fans there? I don't know how many people will come back and how quickly they'll come back."

Numerous other cities - including San Diego, Las Vegas, Nashville, Tenn., and Kansas City, Mo. - also made offers to host the team for the upcoming season, but Oklahoma City had what few others could offer - a top-quality arena with few scheduling conflicts.

The city already has a Triple-A baseball team, an arena football team and a minor-league hockey team, but has never had a major league sports team.

"We are going to prove to the world that Oklahoma City is a major league city," Shinn said.

College students spend lavishly on dormitories

By Jon Fogg
U-Wire

COLLEGE PARK, Md.-Before the door even opened, it was clear something was different about this dorm room.

The door's dull gray paint was wrapped top to bottom in pink gift wrap, and a matching purple dry-erase board and Baltimore Ravens sticker adorned the center of the door.

But the door was merely a hint of what lay behind. As the door opened, the room blared pink from floor to ceiling. Bedspreads, lamps, shelves, even a Magic 8-Ball - all awash in pink.

For residents Samantha Sebastian and Mona Beier, the hue is the culmination of a quest to transform their stuffy concrete dorm room into a livable space. So far, their room has cost the University of Maryland sophomores and their parents about $1,500.

Although that may seem like a high price tag, Sebastian and Beier are not alone. Research shows students spent $1 billion more on dorm decor this year than they did a year ago.

According to a study by the National Retail Foundation, college students spent about $3.6 billion on dorm furnishings this year, a 38 percent increase from the $2.6 billion they spent in 2004, with the average student forking out $266 on items for their room this year.

Males take their dorm room decorating even more seriously than females, spending about 20 percent more, the study found. Males spent an average of $284, compared with $238 for females.

For Sebastian and Beier, room decorating is not cluttering a room with frivolous trinkets. It is a method to make their room seem more like home and less like scholarly confinement.

Faculty senate announces new hirings

By Melissa Blanksteen

In the Faculty Senate's first meeting of the semester yesterday, the auditorium was energetic as the faculty geared up for a new school year and listened to several announcements and reports dealing with campus academics.

Provost Charlena Seymour announced that there will be four new national searches this upcoming year, after introducing six new Vice Provosts and Deans hired over the past year. The upcoming vacancies include the Deans of Humanities and Fine Arts, Commonwealth College and the Isenberg School of Management, who plans to return to the faculty. There will also be a search for a Vice Provost for Research.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life for the University of Massachusetts Michael Gargano also received a round of applause at the meeting. Chairman of the Rules Committee Richard Bogartz praised Gargano for attending the memorial service for psychology student Alex DeSerpa and awarding him his degree posthumously.

"It was a clear case of getting it right," Bogartz said.

Bogartz went on to also note that Gargano did the right thing in shutting down three UMass fraternities for health code violations.

"If something happened," Bogartz said, "the world would come down with a ton of bricks."

Brian O'Connor, the faculty delegate to the Board of Trustees, told the Senate that the Trustees "will vote very soon" on a new $100 million recreational center for UMass Amherst. In a poll done by the Trustees, students want the building in a central location with facilities for fitness, weight training and swimming.

O'Connor also noted that 89 percent of financial need demand is met by the UMass Amherst campus. The Daily Collegian reported on Sept. 9 that UMass was ranked #3 by the Princeton Review for students most dissatisfied with financial aid. Despite this high percentage, the trustees are guessing why many students do not choose UMass as their school.

"We are still losing the best students to the private [colleges]," O'Connor said.

O'Connor later questioned Chancellor Lombardi about rumors he had heard about changes in next spring's Commencement Ceremony. Lombardi responded by explaining that numerous programs are now offered by the various schools and departments at the end of the year. According to Lombardi, parents have been calling confused about which of the three weeks of ceremonies are when and for what purpose.

"Given that confusion and enthusiasm," Lombardi said, "we thought now was a good time to review how we do the next year's Commencement."

Survey: rise in roommate theft

By Rebecca Miceli
Daily Collegian (Penn. St.)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — When Ryan Henderson's roommate received a package of homemade cookies in the mail, Henderson was eager to help himself to the baked goods and satisfy his sweet tooth. But Henderson, a freshman communications major at Pennsylvania State University, said that his situation could be different if the two weren't friends.

"We share everything and have no defined separate things," Henderson said.

Not all college students have had such success with their roommates, though. A newly released survey published by www.drugstore.com revealed that simple theft by college roommates is on the rise.

Fifty-two percent of surveyed students between the ages of 18 and 24 admitted to helping themselves to their roommate's supplies.

Snacks like cookies and chips were some of the most commonly reported "borrowed" items, while paper, pencils and other school supplies were also high on the list.

Mark Meisner, a freshman majoring in mechanical engineering, said this sort of sharing or borrowing between roommates is not typical in his room because he and his three other roommates in supplemental housing have defined boundaries.

United States nuclear envoy wants to visit North Korea after its disarmament accord

By Jae-Soon Chang
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea-The chief U.S. envoy to North Korean disarmament talks wants to visit the communist country for further discussions after Pyongyang agreed in a landmark accord this week to abandon its nuclear program, a South Korean official said Thursday.

South Korean Unification Minister Chung Dong-young said he relayed a message to the North about the U.S. envoy Christopher Hill's interest in visiting. He said he delivered the request during last week's inter-Korean Cabinet-level talks in Pyongyang.

"Should Hill's visit to the North be realized, it would serve an opportunity to further solidify the outcome of the six-party talks," Chung told a parliamentary committee.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the only travel plan Hill has is to return to Beijing for the next round of talks in November.

The latest six-party nuclear talks produced a landmark accord Monday in which North Korea agreed to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for economic aid, security assurances and improved ties with the United States.

North Korea since has fallen back on some of its hardline rhetoric, raising questions about the sincerity of its commitment. The country said Tuesday it will not dismantle its nuclear program unless Washington gives it civilian nuclear reactors to generate power.

On Thursday, North Korea's deputy foreign minister, Choe Su Hon, told the U.N. General Assembly in New York that the North's goal is the full denuclearization of the Korean peninsula "at any cost," but he said that can happen only after relations with the United States are normalized.

He also reiterated his country's demand that the United States provide it with light-water nuclear reactors. Hill was in Seoul on Sept. 12 for last-minute strategy talks before flying to Beijing the following day for the latest round of six-party talks. At the time, he met Chung, who departed for the North the following day.

After the Beijing talks ended, Hill said he was willing to visit North Korea to keep channels of communication open, but many factors would determine whether he would visit.

The mass-circulation Chosun Ilbo newspaper reported Thursday that some U.S. officials with hard-line views on the North opposed a Hill visit. But if he can overcome those objections, his trip could come next month ahead of the next scheduled round of six-nation talks, it said.

The paper, South Korea's largest, cited an unidentified South Korean government official as saying Hill showed a "strong desire" to visit the North and "consult directly" with Kim on U.S. efforts to get North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program.

Washington has consistently refused one-on-one talks, saying efforts to get the North to renounce nuclear weapons are a regional issue for the talks involving the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia. U.S. officials have met directly with North Koreans in connection with those talks.

North Korea has long tried to engage the United States in bilateral talks in hopes that such meetings would boost its international status and help it win bigger concessions.

There would be no guarantee the North Korean leader would not demand to meet with a higher-ranking official.

In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Darla Jordan said only of the report: "Nothing has changed."

Monday's joint statement represented an about-face to Washington's long-held position of not "rewarding bad behavior" by North Korea. U.S. officials previously refused to discuss concessions for North Korea until it disarms.

Washington joined other parties in the talks Monday in expressing "willingness to provide energy assistance" to the North.

South Korea estimates it will cost as much as $15 billion to finance the energy aid promised to North Korea, Chung said. The aid will come in three stages beginning with heavy oil supplies, electricity provision and finally reactor construction over a period of up to 15 years, he said.

The United States assented to eventually discussing the provision of civilian nuclear reactors for North Korea.

Boston University professor claims media 'staged' footage of Middle East conflict

By Molly Hunt
The Daily Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON - Boston University associate history professor Richard Landes turned to the Internet to critique the mainstream media's coverage of violence in the Middle East.

His Web site, seconddraft.org, launched Sept. 14, uses unedited violent footage to highlight potential inaccuracies in reporting.

"In this age of globalization, the media has unprecedented influence on the way we see the world," the site's mission statement reads. "And yet, whether out of misplaced good intentions, unconscious agendas and predispositions, or unwarranted faith in false information, they can get the story dramatically wrong. Therefore, we want to revisit and critique journalism's 'first draft of history.'"

Landes claimed many scenes of violence against Palestinians are staged and coined the term "Pallywood" to describe the industry that produces this footage. He said this "staged" information is a way to further the Palestinian cause and to try the views of those who see it.

Visitors to seconddraft.org can watch "Pallywood," his 19-minute documentary, as well as several segments of unedited footage shot at Netzarim Junction, a disputed territory in the Middle East.

One segment, "Molotov Kid," shows a Palestinian boy who does not act injured being frantically carried to an ambulance. Other segments show Palestinian photographers approaching the Israeli position at the junction without fear. According to Landes, they do so because they know that no actual gunfire is coming from the position.

Landes said he became convinced that many violent scenes from the Middle East were staged after viewing 20 minutes of tape, shot by Palestinian photographer Talal abu Rachmeh, during a visit to the France2 studios in Jerusalem.

"It was so obvious that it was fake stuff," he said. "It was a joke. This was an industry. This wasn't an accident."

Landes said he plans to add footage to his site Sept. 30 of the shooting of Mohammed Adura, a Palestinian boy, by Israeli forces. He said this shooting, which caused international outrage in 2000, was staged, citing footage that shows the boy changing position after bystanders claim that he is already dead and gunfire angles that could not have come from the Israeli position.

"This had an enormous impact on people's attitudes, especially in the Muslim world," he said of the Adura story.

Landes said he created seconddraft.org after showing his footage to contacts in several mainstream news outlets. Although many journalists were interested in his findings, Landes said they did not want to bring them to light in the media.

"It's there because the mainstream media will not cover this," he said. College of Communication Dean John Schulz says he has not heard of or visited seconddraft.org. He did comment generally that the Internet can help critique the media.

"If any organization's Web site rises to a level of credibility to raise awareness on any topic, then it is doing journalism a favor because the profession that most critiques itself and raises its own dirty linen is journalism," he said. "This doesn't mean we catch all the dirty linen, however."

Landes said the Internet is an ideal place to raise the issue of media bias.

Rain returns to New Orleans

By Michelle Roberts
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS, La.—In a grim opening salvo from Hurricane Rita, a steady rain began falling Thursday on New Orleans for the first time since Katrina laid waste to the city, and engineers rushed to shore up the broken levees for fear of another ruinous round of flooding.

The forecast called for 3 to 5 inches of rain in New Orleans in the coming days. That is dangerously close to the amount engineers said could send floodwaters pouring back into neighborhoods that have been dry for less than a week.

The storm took a sharper-than-expected turn to the right on Thursday, setting it on a course that could spare Houston and nearby Galveston a direct hit. But that raised the risk that the hurricane could strike much closer to New Orleans.

"Right now, it's a wait-and-see and hope-for-the-best," Army Corps of Engineers spokesman Mitch Frazier said a few hours before the National Guard cut off all access into New Orleans.

He said the forecast brought renewed urgency to efforts to shore up levees with sandbags and bring in more portable pumps. The corps also installed 60-foot sections of metal across some of the city's canals to protect against storm surges.

The lack of rain since Hurricane Katrina ripped through the city more than three weeks ago has been

Retired Lawrence dentist found innocent in 4-month-old's accidental poisoning

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

LAWRENCE— Constantine Pitsas wanted to give the guests at his cookout nothing but the best. But his good intentions led to a tragic mix-up that left the infant son of a friend dead from arsenic poisoning and Pitsas facing prison time.

On Thursday, Pitsas was acquitted of involuntary manslaughter and assault charges in an emotional case that left both sides visibly shaken.

Pitsas, 77, a retired dentist, thought he was reaching for water drawn from a natural spring when his financial adviser asked for water for his 4-month-old son's formula.

He actually gave Benjamin Glynn arsenic-laced weed killer. The baby died, and his 2-year-old sister, Morgan, suffered serious injuries after she took a few sips of the liquid.

During the three-day trial, Assistant District Attorney Gerald Shea said Pitsas' conduct was "wanton and reckless." He should have noticed a warning label taped to the handle with the word, "arsenical," Shea said.

But Pitsas' lawyer, James O'Shea, called the poisoning a "tragic accident" and said Pitsas' conduct was not criminal. He said the label on the jug was not conspicuous because it was folded over and taped to a handle on the top of the jug.

Judge Patrick Riley said prosecutors had not proven beyond a reasonable doubt that Pitsas had acted in a "wanton and reckless" manner. Pitsas had waived his right to have a jury decide his fate.

"Sympathy for the untimely and tragic death of a 4-month-old infant or sympathy toward an elderly man charged with these offenses have no place in this court's consideration of the evidence and the determination of guilt or innocence of the accused," Riley said in delivering his verdict.

Benjamin Glynn's parents, Sonja and Douglas Glynn, held hands tightly as the verdict was announced, then rushed out of the courtroom after the judge read his decision. The couple was escorted to their car by state police. Mrs. Glynn sobbed as the couple left.

Pitsas shook his lawyer's hand and appeared tearful as he hugged his wife after the verdict was read. He faced a maximum of 20 years in prison, if convicted.

Shea declined to comment.

The children and their parents attended a cookout given by Pitsas at his Nahant home on Aug. 9, 2003. Shortly after they arrived, Douglas Glynn asked Pitsas for some water.

Glynn testified that Pitsas reached for a plastic gallon jug near an outdoor table he had set up for food and drinks. Both children became violently ill within minutes.

Glynn described a frantic race to the hospital as the children repeatedly vomited and his wife sat in the back seat trying to help them.

Fitchburg attorney Edward P. Ryan Jr., who was not involved in the case, said Pitsas' conduct did not rise to the level of "wanton and reckless," as defined in the state's manslaughter statute.

"This guy was negligent. But wanton and reckless conduct is different in kind and in degree from negligence and even gross negligence," Ryan said. "It is conduct that amounts to the intentional disregard of known risks of serious harm."

"He made a mistake, but making a mistake and being negligent is not conduct you can base a criminal conviction on," he said.

Pitsas did not testify during the trial.

He told investigators that he had bottled water in a refrigerator, but decided it was too cold for the baby, so he got a container of what he thought was spring water.

The children first were taken to Beverly Hospital and later transferred to Children's Hospital in Boston. When doctors discovered that they had ingested arsenic, authorities organized a high-speed interstate relay to bring the nearest supply of a rare antidote 240 miles from a hospital in Bangor, Maine, where members of a church had been treated four months earlier after they drank arsenic-laced coffee.

The antidote arrived too late to save Benjamin. Morgan, who authorities believe drank only a few sips of the liquid, spent 13 days in the hospital.

one of the few blessings for New Orleans. On Thursday, relief workers at Mardi Gras World, the city's largest builder of parade floats, handed out free tarpaulins to homeowners to keep Rita's rain from coming through their damaged roofs.

The entire Mississippi delta region was under a tropical storm warning. To the west of New Orleans, the storm was expected to bring 15 to 20 inches of rain to southwestern Louisiana. Gov. Kathleen Blanco resorted to campaign tactics, recording a telephone message that was delivered to more than 400,000 residents along the southern edge of the state.

"Rita has Louisiana in her sights," Blanco said at a news conference. "Head north. You cannot go east, you cannot go west. If you know the local roads that go north, take those."

As for those who refuse to leave, she said: "Perhaps they should write their Social Security numbers on their arms with indelible ink." National Guard and medical units were put on standby. Helicopters were being positioned, and search-and-rescue boats from the state wildlife department were staged on high ground on the edge of Rita's projected path. Blanco said she also asked for 15,000 more federal troops.

"Prepare your family and prepare your house," she warned. "I'm urging Louisiana citizens to take this storm very seriously." Forecasters said the storm was expected to come ashore on the Texas coast and turn north along a path not far from the Louisiana state line. It was a chilling prediction for the town of Lake Charles, not far from the border.

"At first, our evacuation orders were just for the low-lying areas, but now it's the entire Calcasieu Parish," said Cindy Murphy, a manager at the police bureau in Lake Charles. "We've got buses running continuously to get residents out. We're trying to learn from other areas, not to repeat their mistakes."

Glynn Stevenson - who swam out of his New Orleans house with belongings taped to his body - had just gotten settled in New Iberia in a trailer provided by the Federal Emergency Management Authority when the call came for him to uproot again.

"You can't do nothin' about it," he said. "All you can do is praise the Lord."

Katrina's death toll in Louisiana rose to 832 on Thursday, pushing the body count to at least 1,069 across the Gulf Coast. But workers under contract to the state to collect the bodies were taken off the streets of New Orleans because of the approaching storm.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin continued to urge residents to leave. A mandatory evacuation order was in effect for homes on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, and police said people in the city's Algiers section on the other side of the river would be wise to get out, too. But thousands stayed put.

Supermodel to pariah: Kate Moss cocaine saga exposes fashion flaws

By Paisley Dodds
Associated Press

LONDON, U.K —Barely a teenager and posing topless in a Calvin Klein underwear ad, Kate Moss sashayed her way onto magazine covers 15 years ago amid criticism of her uber-thin "heroin chic" image.

Now recent pictures of Moss allegedly snorting cocaine in a London studio have turned the 31-year-old fashion icon into a pariah, with fashion companies canceling or not renewing contracts worth millions of dollars.

Moss issued an apology Thursday, taking "full responsibility for my actions." Her dramatic fall has forced a re-think on fashion's role models, and has raised questions about how an industry notorious for its drug-fueled party life can cultivate Moss' bad-girl image, then turn on her once that image matches reality.

"It's hypocritical," said pop culture lecturer Cary Cooper of Lancaster University. "The industry saw the warning signs. Others saw the warning signs. Something should have been done sooner."

Moss was dropped by Burberry, Chanel and Swedish clothing giant H&M. The British cosmetics company Rimmel London said Thursday it was "reviewing" her $2.3 million contract.

In her statement, Moss said, "I also accept that there are various personal issues that I need to address and have started taking the difficult, yet necessary, steps to resolve them."

Originally from the unglamorous south London suburb of Croydon, Moss was discovered in 1988 by Storm agency founder Sarah Doukas at New York's John F. Kennedy airport. Two years later, topless pictures of the 14-year-old were splashed across billboards amid condemnation of Moss' waifish appearance, blank stare and emaciated figure.

The talk intensified as Moss entered adulthood. She boosted her stock by dating actors such as Johnny Depp and most recently Pete Doherty, the 26-year-old former Libertines frontman who has been in and out of drug rehab.

In 1998, she made headlines when she checked into a London rehab clinic for what was termed "exhaustion." Two years later, she was hospitalized again, reportedly for a kidney infection. In 2003, the chain-smoker was diagnosed with a "sleeping disorder." Allegations of her cocaine use never let up.

French fashion consultant Anne de Champigneuil said Moss should have been more careful. "People are lucky to have such great contracts, and they need to respect them ... It's a shame to give (fans) this example. Everyone identifies with a star."

Icelandic fashion designer Helga Vjornsson thought differently.

"It's really unfair," said Vjornsson, who lives off the legendary Parisian shopping street Rue du Faubourg St Honore. "She may be a product but she's a human being, too. The media are responsible for her loss of success or work."

It was the media that fueled Moss' rise with constant shots of the wide-eyed, 5-foot-6 beauty - and the paparazzi were just as quick to help her fall.

She recently settled a libel suit with Britain's Sunday Mirror, which published an article in January alleging that Moss had to be revived from a cocaine-induced coma in June 2001.

That same tabloid ran the pictures of her apparent cocaine use last week.

The Sun newspaper published new drug-related claims Thursday. Moss's lawyer, Gerrard Tyrell, denied the allegations. But that didn't matter to people like Marilena Rossina, one of many Londoners reading the latest headlines about Moss. "She's been doing it for years, and we all know it," said Rossina, 38. "It's not like cocaine is something new in the modeling industry. But I'm worried about her child (Moss has a nearly 3-year-old daughter) and she's in the public eye - a role model for a lot of teen girls."

But French actress and model Catherine Deneuve, a former face of Chanel No. 5, said Moss' private life should be kept private.

"She's a great model. If she's ruining her personal life, that belongs to her," said Deneuve, 61. "What she does in her private life is very private. I find it unbearable that maybe someone shot her (picture), stole the photos then sold them."

"She's an exceptional model, it is just a bad moment for her," said Vincenzo Liberato, who handles fashion casting for the Italian magazine Amica. "Media attack and tear down anything they want and they go especially against those who have made such a clear mistake."

Police announced they may question Moss, who was worth an estimated $26.3 million in 2000.

"There's a tendency to create a myth," said Simone Marchetti, a fashion writer for the Italian women's magazine Donna Moderna, "and then to destroy it."

More women exploring bisexuality

By James Bregenzer
Iowa State Daily (Iowa St. U)

AMES, Iowa—More women are reporting they are experimenting with bisexuality, according to a national survey released last week by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention's National Center for Health Statistics.

The data on Americans' sexual habits were taken from the National Survey of Family Growth, which included more than 12,500 in-person interviews conducted from March 2002 to March 2003.

The increase in reported bisexuality is not an unfamiliar trend at Iowa State and throughout Central Iowa, said John Faughn, Lesbian Gay Bisexual and Transgender Services coordinator.

"Iowa State has seen a lot more incoming freshmen who are open with their sexual orientation," Faughn said.

"This is not to say that there is an increase in homosexuals at the university, but there is an increase in people being open with it and being comfortable identifying themselves as homosexual," he said.

One reason for this is that more who identify themselves as homosexual or bisexual are more comfortable with publicly declaring their sexual orientation than in the past, said Myke Selha, ISU alumnus and program director for the LGBT Community Center of Central Iowa.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender communities have now been more widely accepted throughout Iowa and the majority of the nation, Selha said.

A possible explanation for the increase in women experimenting with bisexuality is how homosexual issues are portrayed in the media, said Clifford Gentry, senior in interior design and facilitator for the ISU Gay/Bi Men's Group.

"I think the numbers are increasing because people are much more open-minded than they used to be," Gentry said.

"The media talks about gay issues in the evening news, there are gay issues portrayed on TV and in movies, and people just don't have to hide who they are like they did in the past ... the mood of the country is changing and is just part of a normal evolution."

Another possible reason for this increase is the flexibility bisexuals enjoy, Gentry said.

"People won't go from being identified as straight to gay; there is a lot of 'gray area' that exists with people who just want to experiment with someone of the same sex," Gentry said.

Faughn and Gentry both said the increase in students' ability to identify themselves as homosexual or bisexual is largely because of efforts made by the university. Gentry said the university has done a good job sponsoring events on campus to raise awareness of lesbian, gay and bisexual issues. They have also been successful in increasing the 'ally population,' of people who support LGBT causes, Gentry said.

Roberts wins committee approval, heads to senate for all-but-sure confirmation

By David Espo
Associated Press

Supreme Court Chief Justice nominee John Roberts arrives for the third day of his confirmation hearings with his wife Jane, on Capitol Hill in Washington D.C.

WASHINGTON , D.C— John Roberts' nomination as chief justice cleared a Senate committee on a bipartisan vote of 13-5 Thursday, with next week's confirmation so certain that Republicans and Democrats turned to urging President Bush to move carefully in filling a second Supreme Court vacancy.

"I will vote my hopes and not my fears, and I will vote to confirm him," said Wisconsin Sen. Herb Kohl, one of three Democrats on the Judiciary Committee who supported Roberts' nomination along with all 10 Republicans on the panel.

"I don't see how anybody can justify a vote against Judge Roberts, unless they want to nitpick certain areas that you can nitpick on anybody," said Orrin Hatch, R-Utah.

Five Democrats voted against Roberts, questioning his commitment to civil rights and expressing concern that he might overturn the 1973 court ruling that established the right to abortion.

"The values and perspectives displayed over and over again in his record cast doubt on his view of voting rights, women's rights, civil rights and disability rights," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said of the 50-year-old appeals court judge and former Reagan administration lawyer.

The Democratic support for Roberts marked a stinging defeat for the liberal groups that are lobbying energetically against confirmation, yet one prominent conservative sounded unimpressed.

"We're supposed to think the Democrats are being magnanimous? Give me a break," said Leonard Leo of the Federalist Society. He noted that several Supreme Court nominees of presidents of both parties have gained overwhelming bipartisan support in the past two decades.

The full Senate is to debate Roberts' nomination next week, with a final vote on Bush's pick to replace the late William H. Rehnquist expected on Thursday. That would allow Roberts to take his place on the court before the justices begin their new term on Oct. 3 - a key objective of the administration.

There was scant sparring in the Judiciary Committee as 18 senators took turns reading prepared statements laying out their positions. What passed for suspense had dissipated on Wednesday, when Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the panel's senior Democrat, announced he would support the nomination.

With Roberts' confirmation a certainty, several senators on the committee were looking ahead to Bush's selection of a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee's chairman, told reporters he thought the president might name a successor shortly after Roberts' confirmation.

"He might wait until the following Monday, but seeing how President Bush operates, I think it will be sooner rather than later," he said.

Specter, a supporter of abortion rights, forecast a more contentious debate than Roberts has provoked - and then speculated about the impact on the court if there were a third vacancy next spring.

"I'm very much concerned if next June Justice (John Paul) Stevens retires," he said. "If you have three appointees to the court you have a potential to have a sharp turn on the court, and that's a matter of concern."

Stevens, the oldest justice at 85, has been a reliable member of the majority in 5-4 opinions upholding the 1973 abortion ruling and the constitutionality of affirmative action while limiting the application of the death penalty. O'Connor often has been a swing vote, a majority maker whose retirement could signal a shift on the court on many contentious issues.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., offered public advice to the president. Bush should listen to all senators before making his next pick, the South Carolina Republican said, then should "fulfill your campaign promise of selecting a strict constructionist, well-qualified person who loves the law more than they love politics."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who voted against Roberts in committee, said, "The signal to President Bush, whether you voted no or yes: Please send us a moderate; but if you send someone who is very ideological there'll be a much bigger fight than on Roberts because this is for the O'Connor seat and that's the swing vote on the court."

Roberts spent part of his day meeting with individual Democrats who will cast votes next week on the Senate floor. Sen. Robert C. Byrd said after their meeting he will vote for confirmation. "I have faith in him - party doesn't make any difference to me," said the West Virginian, who earlier in his career served as Senate Democratic leader longer than anyone in history.

All 55 Senate Republicans are expected to vote for Roberts.

In all, 11 Democrats have expressed support for his confirmation, 10 are opposed and 23 have yet to make public commitments

Partisanship flared only briefly in the committee, when Sen. Charles Grassley said he thought Democrats "seemed to have more loyalty to their ideological and single-interest groups than we do to ours. ... We did not respond to our single-interest groups" in supporting Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, he said, referring to a nominee whose support for abortion rights was well known.

200,000 out of work because of Katrina: Rita promises more economic damage

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. —More than 200,000 people have lost their jobs because of Hurricane Katrina, and more bad economic news is on the horizon as Hurricane Rita heads for the Texas Gulf Coast and the country's biggest collection of oil refineries.

Even a glancing blow could send energy prices higher than their record peak right after Katrina. And if Rita's damage to Texas refineries is severe enough, economists say, gasoline could top $5 per gallon.

"Some 20 percent of the nation's refining capacity seems to be right in Rita's path. If that gets disrupted at all, then gasoline, jet fuel, natural gas and home heating oil will surge higher," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com.

Rita is expected to make landfall very early Saturday. Its arrival comes as the economic toll is still being tallied from Katrina, which came ashore Aug. 29 and devastated New Orleans and parts of Mississippi and Alabama.

The Labor Department on Thursday increased the total number of job losses attributed to Katrina to 214,000, with 103,000 coming in just the last week.

Some private economists believe as many as a half-million people were thrown out of work by Katrina and they are forecasting that the nation's unemployment rate, which had fallen to a four-year low of 4.9 percent in August, will climb when the September report is released on Oct. 7.

Economic growth could be slashed by as much as a full percentage point in the second half of this year, but a rebound is expected in early 2006 as rebuilding begins.

However, that scenario could be thrown in doubt if Rita's damage comes anywhere near the magnitude of destruction caused by Katrina, especially to the country's oil refineries.

On Wall Street, stocks finally broke a string of losing sessions as investors were heartened by the news that Hurricane Rita had weakened slightly. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 44.02 points to close at 10,422.05 after losing nearly 264 points since Monday.

The economy of Houston is five times the size of the New Orleans economy, and Texas has 26 refineries that account for more than one-fourth of the nation's refining capacity, greater than Louisiana. With four major refineries accounting for 5 percent of national capacity still shut down in Louisiana, analysts said there is no margin for error.

"There is just no spare refining capacity around to deal with these losses," said David Wyss, chief economist at Economy.com. "We don't have any cushion."

Wyss said gasoline prices, which jumped above $3 per gallon after Katrina hit, could top $5 per gallon if the damage from Rita is serious enough.

That would mean consumers will spend even more lilling up their tanks and will have less money to spend on other items, a serious threat given that consumer spending accounts for two-thirds of total economic output.

One thing analysts are monitoring closely is whether job losses are spreading outside of the hurricane-devastated areas. In one disturbing development, Delta Air Lines announced Thursday it will cut up to 9,000 jobs or 17 percent of its work force as it tries to emerge from bankruptcy as a leaner company.

Overall jobless claims totaled 432,000 last week, the highest level in two years, although some analysts took hope from the fact that the level of claims outside the hurricane areas did not show significant deterioration in the labor market.

But in a sign that the economy was weakening even before Katrina hit, a closely followed economic forecasting gauge dipped for a second consecutive month in August, the Conference Board reported Thursday.

Its Index of Leading Economic Indicators fell by 0.2 percent last month, with one of the negative factors being a drop in consumer expectations as Americans were being battered by a new surge in gasoline prices even before Katrina hit.

Federal Reserve policy-makers on Tuesday said they believed Katrina would have only a short-term impact on the economy and that the bigger concern was rising inflation pressures coming from the surge in energy costs. They boosted a key short-term interest rate for the 11th time.

However, some analysts said the Fed may be forced to pause in its rate hikes for the last two meetings of the year if consumer spending falters.

"I don't see how we can avoid taking a hit and it will be coming right as we move into the Christmas buying season," Wyss said.

Theft on the rise on campus

RA through a contract that we can't take them without asking," Meisner said. "It works well."

Because the roommates live in supplemental housing, a verbal agreement was the best option to establish some rules, he said.

Penn State University Police Assistant Director Tyrone Parham said cases like Meisner's are not always the norm.

He said theft in the dorms is reported daily and the suspected thief is often a roommate.

"Sometimes the theft is the result of conflicts that have built up between roommates," Parham said. "Some too is jealousy ... one roommate may have more materialistic things, and the other is less fortunate."

For Michael Pavlick, a junior accounting major, theft is more of a threat from visitors to his room rather than his individual roommates. As a member of Beta Theta Pi fraternity, Pavlick shares the home with 52 fraternity members and had his iPod stolen during a party held last spring.

"I'm more worried about people's friends, not so much the people I live with," he said. "If you decide to move in with someone, you should pretty much already know them."

State College Police Sgt. Mark Argiro said theft of personal goods is hardly isolated to campus housing, as his office occasionally receives reports of problems between roommates in off-campus housing.

U.M. students join dorm decor trend

This year, the pair spent an entire day - 12 hours - arranging their room, said Sebastian, of Baltimore.

"We wanted a bright room. You can't be sad in your room," said Sebastian matter-of-factly. "You don't want to feel like you're in a jail cell."

Black executive office chairs sit in front of Sebastian's and Beier's desks. Sebastian says hers cost $160, making it the most expensive item in the room, with the exception of their laptop computers.

Sebastian's bed features a $100 pink bedspread, a $20 body pillow to keep her from rolling into the gap between the mattress and the wall and several throw pillows, including a pink Jolly Rancher beanbag pillow.

The handmade headboard, which Sebastian's father crafted so her pillows wouldn't slide off the bed, is covered in pink felt. All in all, the bed probably cost about $130.

Beier's bed is also pink. It doesn't have a custom headboard, but it does feature a $40 duvet cover.

Not everything in the room has a high price tag. Specks of white wall peek out from behind innumerable pictures, arranged in elaborate collages and housed in hand-painted, sequined frames. A trail of colored miniature lights shaped like flowers, globes and margarita glasses winds its way around the ceiling.

"We turn them on at night for a different feel," Sebastian said.

A $10 purple-faced bobblehead clock sits on top of the DVD player, next to a pair of matching colored glasses.

"One day when I was visiting (Beier's) house, she was like, 'Let's go to Party City,'" Sebastian said. "We could decorate our entire room with Party City."

But much of the room is occupied by practical things. Their blue carpet cost $75, and a floor lamp with shades in five different colors - Sebastian's favorite part of the room - was about $15. Plastic drawers and storage boxes, $5 to $10 each, are piled under each bed.

A bright pink makeup mirror is clamped on top of her desk. Maybe that's her favorite item in the room, she decides. The mirror cost between $10 and $15 - "not ridiculous, but not cheap either," she said.

Sebastian said she doesn't particularly enjoy visiting the relatively bare rooms of her male friends.

She has a theory about how males spend more than females. Walk into the room of a male student, she says, and you are likely to find a couch or futon along with expensive televisions, stereos and video game systems.

After all 75 picture frames can be had for the price of an Xbox, and that's not counting the games, which can be as high as $50 each, Terence Thomas, a head resident at Susquehanna University in Selinsgrove, Pa., agreed that male students tend to focus their spending on high-end entertainment.

Soldiers at the front of our minds

We must not forget

Jen Lane

For the past three weeks, everyone in the United States has been concerned about the hurricane victims. The people of New Orleans, however, knew a while in advance that the hurricane was about to hit them and that they would likely be in danger if they did not evacuate the city. Loved ones and family members reunite on the television in front of millions of viewers each night.

The hurricane is very important to everyone who has been affected, but what about those boys who come home from Iraq? What about the boy who survives a car bombing and comes home on leave? Why aren't they in the news, hugging and kissing their families? Katrina is definitely affecting a lot of individuals and families, but it has also been an awfully good distraction to those Americans who would like to forget the war in Iraq.

Those Americans who forget the war are not affected by it daily. They do not have children, loved ones, fiancés and siblings in Iraq. They do not watch a weekly sitcom to remind themselves that their loved one is in constant danger and may not return home safely.

I am not one of those Americans who can forget. Many of my friends are affected daily, especially my friend Meagan. She wakes up every morning, knowing that her heart is not in the states. Her heart is in her clatter ring, which is tightly wrapped into the dog tags and heart of an army boy named Wesley Black. She watches "Over There" every Wednesday at 10 p.m. and helps me to write him a letter each week.

No one in my family is over seas, but I do have a 12-year-old brother, who, God forbid may end up there in a few years. No one knows how long this war will go on and no one knows when we're leaving. No one knows that the death tally for the Iraq War just surpassed the death tally of Vietnam. The only thing we know is who is over there now and who is going in a month of two. Each person is given at least 72 hours before leave. You have them today and tomorrow and that's what you hold onto. It's tough and it's not something you want to think about each day.

When Wes came home on leave for 10 days, Meagan wasn't originally his girlfriend. They were only friends, dating on and off for the past few years. Only 10 days to make a decision that will change the rest of their lives. She was and is tough enough to handle his absence, but his absence only made her heart grow stronger. She thinks about him everyday and sends him letters, e-mails, packages and a lot of love.

I'm going to donate to the Red Cross, but my hope is that they will equalize their advertising. The news channels and every newspaper have held information about the storm for weeks, and everyone knows they can donate to the Red Cross to help the victims. But did you know that you could go to www.booksforsoldiers.com, www.treatsfortroops.com or any countless other number of web sites to adopt a soldier? I bet you did not, because those web sites and phone numbers are not flashing on the Masspike on the way home from school. They're not drilled into your head everyday on evening, afternoon and morning news. Both the hurricane and the troops in Iraq are important and need our help.

They may not be as important to most as they are to me, but these boys are important, no matter what any liberal person says. I am conservative. I do not like war, nor do I believe in many of its concepts, but I have many friends who are saving us right now. They are eliminating more terrorist acts like those performed on Sept. 11 when we saw so many innocent people die. They are a powerful force that should be appreciated everyday.

Whether or not you adopt a soldier or get to know one is up to you. But please, for the sake of your safety alone, say thank you to anyone you know or see in a military uniform. No matter the branch, no matter the age, gender or ethnicity, they're saving you. For our boys waiting at home, we have you today and we have you tomorrow, and for now that has to be good enough. And for our boys in Iraq, we have you each and everyday in our hearts.

Knowing is half the battle

Lisa McLaughlin

I haven't heard from Greg, my boyfriend of more than two years, in three weeks now. All I know is that he's in Fallujah wearing desert fatigues and carrying an M-16. He might also be wearing the durable glasses he was issued in boot camp, nicknamed "BCs" for birth control, because they make everyone who wears them look as desirable as Steve Urkel. He might have ridiculous-looking tan lines separating his normally pale white hue from a sunset orange. I can only speculate.

According to what Greg was told when I last spoke to him, he would be able to go online frequently to send and receive e-mail. He would also be able to place calls, and I sent him a calling card for that purpose. His specialty being electrical engineering, he would be "sitting by a generator most of the time," not storming houses and doing convoys. Now I'm starting to wonder.

Greg didn't join the Marines to go to war. He wanted to be one of the Few and the Proud. He wanted to be able to pay off his debts from school, and to have enough money to finish a degree in graphic design. He wanted to carry on a family tradition, as both his father and grandfather are former Marines. He wanted to be able to start building a life for us.

I disagree with the war, and I don't like President Bush. Greg knows this, and with our differing political views we have some interesting discussions. As much as I don't want him to be over there, I've accepted that there is nothing I can do. The only thing I ask as a loved one of a soldier is honesty from those in charge, all the way up to our Commander-In-Chief. I'm not getting that.

Let it be known that I don't hold any grudges against the Marine Corps. They relay what is told to them by their superiors, the Secretary of Defense and the president. I also understand that last-minute changes happen, but if it's possible, I would rather know the truth than have it fed to me sugar-coated. It makes me better prepared to handle whatever comes my way. The number of misleading and untrue statements we've been told since Greg joined up has made me even more cynical and distrustful of our government and this war.

Before Greg joined the Marine Reserves in the spring of 2004, he was told that there was probably a 10 percent chance that he would be sent over to Iraq. There were a number of provided reasons for this. First, he was a reservist, and they were only sending active-duty Marines over there now. Second, he wasn't infantry. His assigned Military Occupational Specialty (MOS) was electrical engineering, and they didn't need a lot of those people over there. Third had something to do with his unit being in Kansas and not being called as often as bigger units on the coast. Fourth, we were going to be pulling out of there soon anyways. Not to worry.

After waiting three long months for him to complete boot camp (where communication was only possible through sporadic letters), he had 10 days leave to visit me in Massachusetts. Then he had to report to Camp Lejeune, N.C. to train for his MOS. He would be there for three months and have access to computers and phones.

Somebody once told me that the military's motto is "Hurry up and wait." It rung true when Greg showed up at Camp Lejeune at the beginning of August, and was told that school wasn't starting until October. He had to stay there battling boredom and do whatever menial work they had for him. So what was once "I'm coming back in November" turned into "I'm coming back January, maybe." He got Christmas off, though - three days to visit his family and me. Marines don't celebrate Chanukah.

When he finished MOS school, he went back home expecting to do the promised one weekend a month, two weeks a year thing. He was looking for a job and planning to re-enroll in school when he got the orders to go to Iraq. I was speechless when he told me.

So when they say that he's coming back to the States in March or April, I don't count on that, because they'll likely extend it a week before he plans to leave. I can't count on anything they tell him. The speeches on television are just words I've learned to drown out. You fool me once, shame on you. I'll only believe what he tells me when he returns, using his own words.

Challenging standard education

Tobin Spratte

When people think of education, specifically higher-level education, they often think of attending college or university. Those who attend these types of academic institutions are called students. They are loved for their energy, their enthusiasm and for their generous contributions to the economy. But they are hated for their noisy parties, their apathy of the world and, often, for their opinions.

Today, people across the world have a shallow definition of the job of students: to sit down, shut up and absorb knowledge. For this outlook of student life, there is no questioning, no past values, no future values, no thoughts yet to come. Students are required to accept everything they are taught with little criticism. Philosophers like David Hume, Immanuel Kant and even Karl Marx are respected as heroes of academia. If "great thinkers" like these said something, and a student disagrees, that student is wrong.

This is how education has been carried out in the last century. It is how our views and values of the world have been defined for us, and it is how our views will still be defined for us, unless of course, some other great thinker comes along and proves otherwise. The question becomes: Who can be a great thinker?

Using the conventional definition of an educated person, one at least has to obtain a bachelor's degree. Can a graduate student have an opinion? What about a doctoral student? Applying that logic, it is virtually impossible to live an entire life without truly possessing a self-opinion, having everything presented for you. That is the way both political camps have come to determine political and social philosophy from now until the end of time.

For example, keeping troops in Iraq where they may die is a bad idea because it violates the principle of humanity, which essentially states to only use humanity as an end and never as a means.

Keeping troops in Iraq is a good idea because Jesus Christ once taught greater is no one than he who gives his life for his friends.

What if a student suggested that keeping troops in Iraq is a good idea because it gives freedom to those who previously had none? No, because no great philosopher, religious figure or scientist has ever presented freedom as the principle justification behind wars and the end of human life. Many common, everyday people have suggested it, but they are wrong, because they do not have a Ph.D. Many politicians have suggested it, but they are wrong because politicians are assumed to be liars.

Is this the type of environment we want our children to grow up in? Do we want all philosophical and political knowledge to end simply because the man who suggested it works as a plumbing contractor? Again, the question becomes: Who is allowed to think?

Ayn Rand's contemporaries criticized her for suggesting that egoism is the greatest form of ethics because nobody else said it first. Liberal elitists sneered at Reagan when he said communism was evil because such a statement violated their belief system. Modern critics ridiculed President Bush for citing Jesus Christ as his favorite philosopher, if nothing more than because Christ did not attend Oxford. Are these people not entitled to an opinion because it is different?

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart wrote his first symphony when he was 8-years-old. Thomas Edison applied for his first patent at the age of 21 with little formal education. John Stuart Mill was 15 when he co-founded a journal for philosophical radicals called the Westminster Review. Adam Smith began his economic philosophies when he was in his mid-20s. Today, we regard all of these people as academic elites and would jump at the chance to attend a lecture given by any of them. But as for any other 8-year-old composer, 15-year-old student, 21-year-old high-school dropout or 25-year-old philosopher, we dismiss them and call them ridiculous or uneducated, laughable and entertaining, but unworthy of an opinion.

But this is not the way it should be, and surely, 21st century Americans can change that. Does it mean neglect academics? No. Does it mean stop reading the works of great classical thinkers or to attempt to defy Newton's laws of motion the first day of general physics? No. But it does mean that academic elitists and snobs should stop rejecting the ideas of less-educated Americans. Professors should stop rejecting the ideas of their students. And no one should turn a blind eye or a deaf ear toward any idea, no matter how ridiculous it seems at the present time. Part of being free entails an ability to understand, to learn and most of all to object or to amend what you have understood or have learned.

Never stop learning, and never stop challenging what you have learned.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

EDITORIAL A WASTE OF SPACE

I was reading the unsigned editorial opinion of this Thursday's issue, and I have to admit I was disappointed. At first, I was disappointed that the most newsworthy subject (in a world with a plethora of more relevant/noteworthy/important topics) was the all-important Kate Moss, whom you chose to waste six paragraphs on. While it is true that probably 0.000000001 percent of this campus a) knows who Kate Moss is, b) cares who Kate Moss is and c) cares about her coke addiction, this doesn't seem to be award-winning journalism in the making. Nevertheless, I can accept a column that doesn't relate to my interests. Celebrity news is not appealing to me, but it is to some. Fine.

What I can't accept is the sheer idiocy of paragraph seven. "Luckily," it says, "this will presumably rollover in the near future as the country braces for Hurricane Rita, so young girls who want to be models some day will not have to focus on the stupidity and embarrassment of Moss' actions." Wow. How lucky we are that a category five hurricane stands poised to demolish the coast of Texas, destroying lives, businesses, roads, infrastructure and stranding yet more people homeless and without hope.

You actually had the audacity to suggest that an impending tragedy of potentially catastrophic proportions would be welcomed because it would take the "focus" off of a bulimic, coked out freak? Maybe you're right. Maybe an 84 lb model and the profit margin of H&M's fall line are such life changing events that it will be a welcome sight to see them off the front page of the Times in favor of destructive storms. Heaven forbid some aspiring model sees an article about Kate Moss; thank goodness there is death and destruction on the way. I for one think that no tragedy, be it hurricane or otherwise, should be welcomed as a distraction.

This paragraph not only presumes that the Kate Moss story is big enough that people care about it, but that any horrible tragedy that overshadows it would be a good thing. This is ridiculous. There is nothing lucky about disaster, and to suggest such is ignorant and insensitive.

These comments take on even greater insanity considering the context of the recent events in Louisiana and Mississippi, which have highlighted just how devastating a major storm can be to the collective people of the American nation. Do you think Katrina was welcomed by anyone? Did anyone say, "Oh thank goodness Katrina is here, now I don't have to hear about Tom Cruise?" Do you think it's lucky that we had a horrible natural disaster to occupy the news cycle for a while? Is this really your opinion? I find it cutely ironic that in one breath you can thank goodness for a storm while further down on the page you look to poll the student body as to their mobilization in aiding Katrina victims. I'm assuming you forgot choice E) "I wanted to help, but I just couldn't get over that London tabloid about Kate Moss."

I can only assume that his pathetically out of touch, insensitive remark was some attempt to make an otherwise useless article timely and relevant. Unfortunately, I think this attempt failed, and only served to make "the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board" that much more useless. Luckily, people will forget about the stupidity and embarrassment of your actions within a week.

'42nd Street'
'Broadway in Amherst'
Mullins Center
Sept. 25

By Joe Piedrafite
Collegian Staff

"Broadway in Amherst" kicks off its inaugural season with the smash hit musical for people who love musicals. Sunday night, the 2001 Tony Award winner for Best Revival of a Musical, "42nd Street" shuffles its way into the Mullins Center.

Set in 1930s New York, "42nd Street" follows the classic star-is-born storyline and tells the tale of the wide-eyed Peggy Sawyer, a chorus girl fresh off the bus from Allentown, Pa. ready to conquer the big city. Fading Broadway diva Dorothy Brock is determined to let her star shine a little longer, while big-time director Julian Marsh wants to put on the most extravagant musical Broadway has ever seen, "Pretty Lady." Also included in the colorful cast are the hysterical authors of "Pretty Lady," Bert Barry and Maggie Jones, the often frazzled choreographer, Andy Lee, and the dashing and debonair leading man, Billy Lawyer.

Based on the Busby Berkeley film of the same name, the original stage production of "42nd Street" opened in the summer of 1980. Then mega-producer David Merrick mounted that legendary production, which is steeped in Broadway and musical theater legend. After a rocky road to opening night, "42nd Street" finally opened at the Winter Garden Theater, but tragedy struck hours before the opening curtain. Gower Champion, who directed and choreographed "42nd Street," had died hours earlier of a rare form of cancer. Merrick chose not to tell the company before the show, but rather announced Champion's unexpected death at the curtain call to a stunned cast and packed house. Despite that initial tragedy, "42nd Street" went on to run for almost 10 years and over 3,400 performances.

Fast forward 20 years, to the spring of 2001. An enormous musical comedy had just opened that the critics fell over themselves for - "The Producers" - and the revival of "42nd Street" quietly began performances at the newly restored Ford Center (which is actually on 42nd street) and was pretty much under the radar until opening night. Deemed the sleeper hit of the 2001 season, "42nd Street" opened to glowing reviews on May 2, 2001. New York Magazine called it "an absolute knockout!" and the New York Times proclaimed it "the unexpected triumph of the season!" A few weeks later, "42nd Street" was nominated for nine Tony Awards, including Best Revival of a Musical. At the Tony ceremony in June, it went home with two awards, Best Revival of a Musical and Best Actress in a Musical for Christine Ebersole's performance as Dorothy Brock.

Running for four solid years on Broadway (it closed this past January), Mark Bramble and Randy Skinner, who were involved in the original mounting of the show, have revised a good old fashioned razzle-dazzle musical fable. The sets are slick and stylish, an ode to 1930s New York, and the costumes are just as wonderful, sexy and vibrant.

The real star of the show, however, is the choreography. Randy Skinner has created some of the most exciting dancing that audiences have ever seen. His inventive use of choreography and integrating it with various different set pieces is nothing short of amazing. The cast is freakishly talented, as well, and they execute Skinner's steps with ease. "42nd Street" opens with the curtain being raised only about 24 inches and audience members see two dozen pairs of tap dancing feet, all in unison. The entire evening builds to an astounding, show stopping finale with the entire cast that will leave the audience breathless and send them out into the night dancing and smiling.

So come on along, listen to the lullaby of old Broadway and get your tickets to "42nd Street." Prices range from $39-$54 and are available at the Mullins Center Box Office or at www.ticketmaster.com. UMass students, however, have the opportunity to purchase half-price tickets at the box office an hour before the show on Sunday, just show your UMass ID. "42nd Street" is part of the 2005-2006 "Broadway in Amherst" series which also includes "Miss Saigon" and "Cats" in October and April, respectively. Make your way down to where the underworld can meet the elite, 42nd Street.

Arthur Miller's 'The Price' takes stage in Northampton

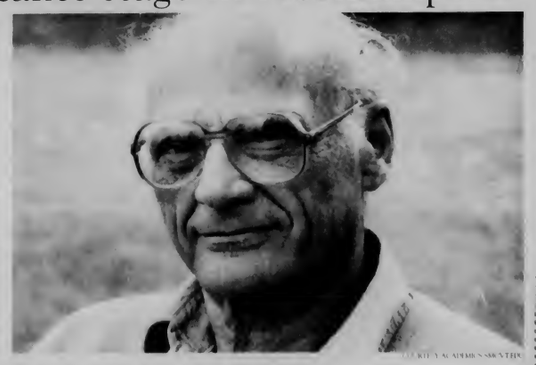
'The Price'
Arthur Miller
Academy of Music Theater
Sept. 25

High schools across the country read Arthur Miller annually. Many people tuck "Death of a Salesman" and Willy Loman in the back of their minds for cocktail party one-liners and Trivial Pursuit tournaments. At 4 p.m. this Sunday, Sept. 25, another one of Miller's great autobiographical dramas will take the stage at the Academy of Music Theatre in Northampton. Academyarts, the Northampton Arts Council and the Academy of Music Theatre working together to program live theater and special event film programming, will present The Miniature Theatre of Chester's production of an Arthur Miller masterpiece, "The Price."

All proceeds will benefit both the Northampton Arts Council and the Academy of Music Theatre. Tickets are available at the Northampton Arts Council, The Academy of Music and State Street Fruit in Northampton, Cooper's Corner in Florence and For the Record in Amherst. General admission is $15 in advance and $20 the day of the show, and students are able to purchase tickets for $10. A limited number of premium seats, which include the performance as well as a post-performance reception at Packard's, are available for $30 from the Northampton Arts Council and the Academy of Music Theatre.



Miller's work has been described as "deeply moving, engaging and wryly humorous at times," by Academyarts. In "The Price," two brothers are born into a wealthy family that enjoyed lives of wealth and privilege until Black Tuesday, the crash of 1929 that robbed the family of their financial comfort. The brothers meet in adulthood, 40 years later, for the first time in many years to divide up the remains of the estate. In the attic of their previously lavish quarters, the two men confront their pasts as they prepare to sell the crumbs of their fortune.

"He's an American classic, setting the benchmark for post-World War II American dramatists. He created a dramatic voice for the otherwise mundane life of the middle-class American male," said Dan Froburg, a senior Journalism major.

The production's director, Vincent Dowling, is also the Founding Director of the Miniature Theatre of Chester. He is also Lifetime Associate Director and former Artistic Director of the Ireland's Abbey Theatre. Dowling first appreciated Miller's work as a young man in Ireland.

Citizen Cope played Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall

By David Pessah
Collegian Staff

A unique talent took the stage last Tuesday, Sept. 20, in the pub-like atmosphere of Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall. Citizen Cope's music is hard to classify. Cope and his acoustic guitar are matched with a strong band playing bass, keyboard, piano and drums to create an original sound that sways between jam-band to jazz. Cope compliments his music with down to earth messages about struggle, love addiction, hate and more with an upbeat attitude.

In Northampton, Cope started off his set playing the slow and mellow "If There's Love," a slow jam infused with a strong bass line, airy synth noises and a melodic keyboard part, and the song set the bar early. Cope never dipped below it anytime after. The lyrics, about a girl he is appreciative of for loving him, were well-sung as Cope's raspy voice conveyed a gratefulness to match their mood.

Later in the set, the upbeat "Bullet and a Target" was played with such emotion that the people sitting on the balcony in their seats stood up and moved to the beat. The song speaks of a mistake so bad that "what you've done here/is put yourself between a bullet and a target" related with energetic attitude. When Cope sings he only slightly opens his mouth in a manner reminiscent of Brando in "The Godfather," but amazingly his lyrics are always crystal clear. This was an impressive feat on songs such as "Bullet in a Target," where his hand was playing at full force.

Citizen Cope knows how to reach the members of their audience. "Son's Gonna Rise," a song about hope and not giving in, had the majority of the people stunned at the power of his words. Girls in the front row were swaying back and forth and others standing near the back just nodded their heads and took it all in, some closing their eyes. The message is powerful: "The sun's gonna rise in a mile, in a mile you'll be feeling fine. In a mile you will see, after me you'll be out of the dark, yeah, you'll get your shot." It's an empowering message and the crowd embraced it.

Citizen Cope is on the rise and this may have been the audience's last shot at seeing them perform in such an intimate setting. The band's videos are being played on MTV U and the Northampton show was just one of many on his current U.S. tour. Truly a rising star, Cope's live show matches and at times surpasses the sound of his album, "The Clarence Greenwood Recordings." Cope, not much for between song banter - this was kept to about three or four "thank yous" - stuck around after his set and got personal in a different manner as he made small talk and signed autographs.

In the end, Citizen Cope gave the crowd what all crowds want when they come to a show, excellent music and a chance to meet the band.

Shown above is the lead singer, Clarence Greenwood. Jam-band Citizen Cope's songs provide leading lyrics with a variety of instruments, including guitar, keyboard and drum machines.

'Ghost Whisperer,' premiering Friday

By Tom Jicha
Sun-Sentinel (MCT)

The title character in "Ghost Whisperer" doesn't solve crimes, like the heroine of "Medium." She doesn't talk to God, as "Joan of Arcadia" did. Talking to spirits apparently is like many other professions. Everyone's a specialist.

Melinda Gordon (Jennifer Love Hewitt) communes with the departed, then passes along what she is told to comfort the living. Amazingly, there are subdivisions even in this field, according to James Van Praagh, whose claim of the ability to talk to the dead has made him a handsome living, including an executive producer's job on "Ghost Whisperer."

Melinda isn't based on Van Praagh's act. She's more like a woman named Mary Ann Winkowski, according to Van Praagh. "Mary Ann is someone who specializes in earthbound spirits, which means that when we leave the body at the time of death, most of us are going to the other side, if you will. There's a light for every single person." (As well as a sucker born every minute.)

"Most of us will naturally go into that light to our relatives. It's a natural progression. But for those beings who have unsettled business here, they don't want to leave or they don't see their relative in the light or they're angry or whatever, they want to stay back and haunt, if you will. Those are the ones Mary Ann is able to go and meet and clear their houses up and actually help them pass over to the light. ... She sees the earth-bound ones. I don't. But when she lets them off into the light, then I see them and she doesn't."

In the premiere, Melinda helps a GI killed in Vietnam reconnect with the son he never got to see, before he walks off into the light. As a newlywed, she's lucky to have an understanding husband, played by David Conrad, who isn't sure if he buys her story but indulges her nonetheless. It takes a lot of patience - or gullibility - to be accepting of your bride going out at night to put together a hunk of a ghost with his hunk of a son.

In what passes for irony, Melinda's spouse Jim is a paramedic, working to keep people from passing to the other side.

Executive producer Kim Moses argues that you don't have to believe to enjoy the show. "The show is emotional. It's scary. It's funny. It's got so much heart."

It's also got a cleavage-accentuating wardrobe for the uber-cute Hewitt, a bid to attract some males to a format whose primary appeal is to women.

"We believe that when you start with the show, you're going to stay through the end. It's not about being converted. It's just about great entertainment," Moses said.

Aisha Taylor, who plays Melinda's business partner and friend Andrea, offered a different perspective. "I don't believe in superheroes but I love Batman movies. There's a part of every person that is entertained by the idealistic, the fantastic."

The significant difference is that Batman movies make no attempt to pass themselves off as anything but fantasy, as "Ghost Whisperer" does, encouraging the emotionally vulnerable to seek out people in Van Praagh's and Winkowski's business. The sooner this series passes into the light, the better.

Actress Jennifer Love-Hewitt stars as Melinda Gordon, a woman who can communicate with the dead, in the 'Ghost Whisperer.'

Local artist turns Petri dishes into art

By Mackenzie Isseb
Collegian Staff

Ordinary petri dishes have been transformed into works of art by local artist, Edgar Sabogal. Sabogal has an exhibition, "Petri Dishes and ARThrax" at the Augusta Savage Gallery on campus.

Petri dishes with splashes of bright colors fill the gallery. The artist uses stained glass paints to hand paint the four-inch petri dishes. The painted petri dishes are made to represent the cultures growing, whether political or scientific.

The installation has been set up to resemble home. Unlike other exhibits, this one does not focus on the separate pieces in the room. The combination of all the pieces in the room gives the full effect of the exhibit. "The light holds everything together," said Sabogal, which gives a cozy atmosphere.

A white door is at one of end of the room in the gallery. Once opened, a gradient of bright colors is revealed, imitating our country's use of color to alert of terrorism.

"Petri Dishes and ARThrax" makes reference to the serious issues of homeland security and anthrax. It refers to the "silly idea," according to Sabogal, that the United States' Department of Homeland Security had of using plastic and duct tape to protect against a possible biological attack.

"Labor is not the point, the idea is," he said.

The artwork is inspired by serious subject matter, but this is not mimicked in the atmosphere of the exhibit. There is a sign in the room that reads "Please Touch," something rarely seen in art galleries. Visitors of the exhibition can interact with the art. All the petri dishes on display can be touched and moved. "He is inviting us to break through," said Terry Jenoure, director of the gallery. Inspired guests can make their own petri dish at a station set up in the gallery. Also, petri dishes made by the artist can be bought.

Augusta Savage Gallery
Sept. 20-Oct. 18

Sabogal was born in Colombia and lived there for 21 years. He moved to the United States and received his BFA at the University of Massachusetts in 1992. He observed in Colombia that "politics and arts are fused. Politics manipulates the media and religious groups." He has taken these observations and applied them to the United States.

Sabogal is a member of the gallery's international program, Art International Residency Program (AIR). AIR sends artists all over the world to act as researchers and artists. They interact and learn from the cultures that they are surrounded by. After returning to the United States after one month, they set up an exhibit at the gallery to express what they have learned about the culture and about themselves.

Sabogal was sent to Medellin, Colombia in 2004. He has now returned and created this exhibition. "He is really talented. His vision combined with his skill of color make for a dynamic show," said Jenoure.

There are many layers to the exhibition. There is the tangible, what is right in front of you, and then there are the inspirations of the artist. It is a beautiful exhibition that appeals to your sense of sight, as well as touch.

He also has a Web site for the show, www.arthrax.com.

The cast includes David Birney, Bairbre Dowling and John Greenleaf. Birney was recently honored for his achievements in classical theatre with the Shakespeare Theatre's Millennium Recognition Award. Dowling has appeared in episodes of "Crossing Jordan," "E.R." "Murder, She Wrote" and "Star Trek." Greenleaf starred as Christy Mahon for the Emmy winning PBS presentation of "The Playboy of the Western World" directed by Vincent Dowling.

The Miniature Theatre of Chester is an Actors' Equity Association company that performs at the Chester Town Hall on Middlefield St. off Route 20. Its core programming consists of four to five plays which are produced in the summer and fall seasons. Recent expansions include a wide range of theatre education outreach for you of all ages.

UM takes on Harvard

Altchek is Harvard's leading scorer entering the weekend with four goals on the season. As a sophomore in 2004, Altchek only scored three goals all season. Koch is well aware of the problems he can pose for opposing defenders.

"They've got a front-runner up top that is very dangerous, big and strong," Koch said about Altchek. "They've got a weapon we really have to be aware of and be conscious of all the time."

Harvard also concerns Koch in a few other areas.

"They're going to be a tough defensive team to play against," Koch said. "We have to be very solid in the midfield and the back as far as our defensive organization."

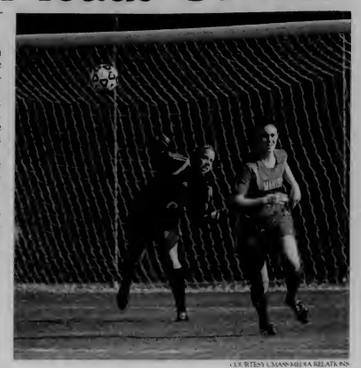
The coach has expressed how important these games are leading up to the Atlantic 10 Conference schedule, which is only a few weeks away. The Minutemen open up conference play against Rhode Island on Oct. 9.

"Our goal has been to get better each week," Koch said. "We are on schedule as far as where we want to peak at the Rhode Island contest. I think we're in good shape. It's a couple of weeks away and we've got some other games to play to see exactly if we are correct in where we want to be."

Injuries have plagued the Minutemen all season. They have been playing without their two captains since the Hartford game when senior Oral Bullen went down with an ankle injury.

The UMass offense will get a much needed boost this weekend when Bullen will return to the field for the Minutemen against Harvard. At the time of this injury Bullen was the leading scorer for the Maroon and White. Now his five points are good enough for second on the team behind sophomore Matty Lemire.

However, the team's other captain, senior Craig Canavan's return is still a mystery. Koch isn't even sure if Canavan will be able to return to action at all this season.



"I don't know if Canavan is going to be able to get back," Koch said about his co-captain. "Right now he will not be able to play for awhile."

Also returning from injuries to the team will be senior midfielder Ernie Billitier. Billitier has yet to play since the Minutemen returned from their trip to Michigan in early September.

"Bullen and Billitier should be ready to play," Koch said. "They've been out for awhile so they're obviously not up at game speed yet. But they should be ready to go, that shouldn't be an issue."

Walker leads UMass

COURTESY UMASS-MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior goalie Kristin Walker has been strong in goal this season. Walker set a career-high with 17 saves in Wednesday's 1-0 loss to Dartmouth.

and he hopes that the Dartmouth game will benefit his team in the long run, beginning with tomorrow's game with Fairfield.

"I was proud of the effort [against Dartmouth]," Rudy said. "It's frustrating to lose, but the lesson has been learned and it's time to move on."

The Minutewomen will have to move on quickly because Fairfield is a team that they don't match up with very well.

The biggest problem for UMass lately has been scoring (two goals in the last three games) and defense is a strength for Fairfield. The Stags have allowed only eight goals in six games this season, while scoring just five.

"They're a scary team," Rudy said. "They play a very deliberate style and have a very athletic goalie who keeps them in games."

UMass lost 2-1 at Fairfield last year and the teams have faced two common opponents this year. Both beat Hartford, as UMass won 3-1, while Fairfield won 1-0. Against Boston University, UMass came up short falling 2-1, whereas Fairfield managed a 1-1 tie.

A key for UMass will be the play of junior goalie Kristin Walker. Walker has been strong all season and had her best game of the year against Dartmouth.

The junior set a career-high with 17 saves and kept the Green off the board for over 106 minutes, before allowing the game-winner in the second overtime.

"Walker had her best game," Rudy said. "She came up with two or three big stops when she was one-on-one. That was definitely the most pressure she's faced."

Patriots and Steelers meet again

he was in that 41-27 AFC title game loss to New England with three interceptions and a fumble, he's been better than Brady so far. He has four TD passes, no interceptions and has led the Steelers to a score on every first-half possession except for one brief three-plus series — though the opposition was the not-so-good Titans and Texans.

Roethlisberger is trying to become the first NFL quarterback to win his first 16 starts, the equivalent of a full season. And the Steelers can open 3-0 for the first time since Cowher's first season in 1992.

"It's been a while since I've seen a more dominating team than what Pittsburgh has been in these first two regular-season games," Belichick said. "They really haven't been in a competitive game. ... They're the best team in the league this year."

The Steelers have made relatively few personnel changes since those Patriots games last season, but one has greatly reshaped their offense. Willie Parker, a college backup at North Carolina, has supplanted the injured Duce Staley and Jerome Bettis to bring a long-missing speed element to what has long been the NFL's best power running game.

Parker had 161 yards against Tennessee and 111 against Houston, and he gives the Steelers someone other than their wide receivers who can turn a routine play into a 40-yard gain.

"He adds an extra dimension to what people are used to when they think Steelers football," Roethlisberger said.

To create some running room for Dillon, the Patriots may try to hit some deep balls early, as they did with two long completions to Deion Branch in the AFC title game. One target could be cornerback Ike Taylor, who became a starter only two games ago.

"Remember in the championship game against the Steelers? We played one of the best games we've ever played here on offense," said Brady, who could become the second-quickest quarterback to reach 50 wins with a victory; Ken Stabler did it in 62 games and this is Brady's 55th. "We executed well throughout the entire game. That's what we're going to need again this week."

Yes, the Steelers remember.

"The last time we played them, they came down and beat us and went to the Super Bowl and became champs," linebacker Clark Haggans said. "I think that's going to be on a lot of people's minds."

Another setback for Foulke

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Struggling Red Sox reliever Keith Foulke returned to Boston on Thursday for an examination on his left knee, another setback for the World Series champions as they scramble to stay in the playoff race.

A day after falling out of first place in the AL East for the first time since July 18, the Red Sox sent Foulke home from the road trip to see team physician Thomas Gill. No decision has been made on whether Foulke will return this season, according to a team source who asked not to be identified because it involved a medical issue.

Foulke was a star of Boston's championship run last year, nailing down all four victories in the Series sweep of the St. Louis Cardinals. But he's struggled most of this season, posting a 5-5 record and a 5.91 ERA while saving just 15 of 19 opportunities.

Foulke had arthroscopic surgery on July 7 to repair cartilage in his left knee. He missed two months while recovering, and has not pitched in a save situation since returning from the disabled list Sept. 1.

Foulke last pitched on Sunday against the Oakland Athletics, entering the game when Boston trailed 12-0 and going two scoreless innings.

Curt Schilling took over as the closer July 14 and was 4-3 with a 5.18 ERA as a reliever, saving nine of 11 chances. Since Schilling moved back into the rotation on Aug. 26, Mike Timlin has saved seven of nine opportunities.

But Timlin gave up the lead on Wednesday night, allowing three runs and recording just one out as the Red Sox lost 7-4 to the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

The defeat dropped Boston into second place in the division race, a half-game behind the New York Yankees. The Red Sox also trailed the Cleveland Indians by one game in the AL Wild Card race heading into Thursday night's games.

Boston was idle — its first off-day in a month — before a weekend series with the Baltimore Orioles.

The Red Sox signed Foulke in the wake of their bullpen meltdown in Yankee Stadium in the 2003 playoffs, giving him a contract that could pay him $26.5 million over four seasons. He earned it last year, when he was 5-3 with 32 saves and a 2.17 ERA.

But his on-field struggles this season — coupled with a personal problem he has alluded to but not described — have made him cranky and caustic. He was booed off the Fenway mound after giving up a ninth-inning grand slam to Cleveland's Travis Hafner on June 28, and then said, "I've always said the hardest thing is to come in here and face my teammates [rather] than worry about Johnny from Burger King booing me."

Foulke also told the San Francisco Chronicle last week that he was moving out of the city to avoid the attention.

"People don't understand there's times when we want to be private," he told the paper. "There's a lot of times people come up and they get in your business. ... It's one of the reasons that for next year I am relocating. I'm moving out of the city so I can be with myself a little more."

advantage of his mobility.

"I've got to do whatever I've got to do for us to win, so whether it's running or throwing - doesn't matter. I'm in it to win it," he said. It's not as if the Vikings have lost any confidence in their leader. The turnovers have been hard to stomach, but the entire team is blanketed by blame for this 0-2 start.

"He's our leader. He's our captain," tight end Jermaine Wiggins said. "We have his back, just like we have coach Tice and our coaching staff's back."

Tice, too, has felt local and national criticism increase following last Sunday's dismal defeat, but owner Zygi Wilf offered his support both privately and publicly this week — prompting an appreciative response from the coach.

"We're going to turn it around," Wilf said.

Tice, whose contract expires at the end of the season, has taken a calm approach to his team's trouble.

"This certainly is not a week for temper tantrums or storming around, saying 'Everybody is out to get us, and it's us vs. them,'" he said. "It's a week of addressing the things that need to be corrected and getting them corrected. I've said this before: Any sucker can pilot the ship when everything's smooth, and the sun's out, and you've got a pina colada in your hand with sunglasses and a Cuban.

UMass getting healthy

By JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There's no place like home for the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

The Minutemen (3-4) return to Rudd Field Sunday to play Harvard (2-1-1) in a match-up of interstate foes. So far this season UMass is a perfect 2-0 when they play in Amherst.

Harvard is the fifth team this season that the Minutemen have played with a winning record. UMass' opponents this year have a combined 24-19-7 record.

UMass enters the game coming off a tough loss to No. 23 New Hampshire on Wednesday. Although the Minutemen played the undefeated Wildcats to 0-0 tie at the half, UNH pulled away in the second half to take a 2-0 victory.

"We played pretty well [Wednesday] going against the No. 23 team in the country," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "The only real shot on goal they got was on a penalty kick."

The loss came just days after the Minutemen swept the weekend beating a tough Navy team and a downtrodden Cornell team. Inconsistent has been the word to describe the Maroon and White in 2005.

One game they beat an undefeated Michigan team and the next they lost to the likes of Maine and Hartford, and then they go on to beat a very good Navy team. It has been very difficult for the Minutemen to string together wins so far this season.

That still hasn't wavered Koch's stance on his squad.

"I think the team has played well," Koch said. "It's a game of opportunities and a game of chances and unfortunately we're not finishing our chances. We could have easily won the [UNH] game 2-0 instead of the other way around, but that's just the way the game is sometimes."

Harvard comes in fresh off a shutout of the Maine Black Bears, 2-0, also on Wednesday.

In that game Crimson senior goalkeeper Ryan Johnson was able to shut down the Maine offense completely. Johnson made 10 saves in the game nearly doubling his season total to 21.

The Crimson struck early as junior forward Charles Altcheck outraced the Black Bear defense and flicked a shot into the right corner of the net just 2:29 into the contest.

UM looks to rebound

By DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This wasn't the way the Massachusetts women's soccer team planned on beginning a season-long homestand.

The Minutewomen (3-4-1) have dropped the first two games of a five-game stretch of matches they will play at Rudd Field.

The first loss came on Sunday, 2-1 to Vermont, and on Wednesday, Dartmouth handed UMass a 1-0 loss in double overtime.

Before Sunday's game the Minutewomen were a perfect 2-0 at home, but now they will be looking to avoid a season-long three-game losing skid in tomorrow's game against Fairfield (2-3-1) at noon.

"We have to bounce back," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We really need this one. It's the end of our non-conference schedule and we don't want to end it with a losing record.

"Our goal was to do better than last year's non-conference record [2-4]. And we want to be on a positive note going into the Atlantic 10 part of the schedule."

It will be easier said than done for this young team to rebound, as both of the losses this week were difficult ones to swallow.

The UVM game was plagued by missed opportunities for the Minutewomen, as they outshot the Catamounts 23-7, but were unable to find the back of the net more than once.

The Dartmouth loss was a tough one to take for entirely different reasons, as UMass played evenly with one of the best teams in the Northeast, only to fall in double overtime.

"I think the Vermont game was the tougher one to lose," Rudy said. "We dominated that game and had a lot of opportunities. Against Dartmouth, we knew we were playing a really good team; a team that has been in-and-out of the national rankings. We just wanted to keep the game tight."

The stats show that UMass had no business being in the game with Dartmouth, as the Big Green outshot UMass 30-6, but that was actually something that Rudy expected.

"We wanted to tighten the game up and try to pinch a goal," Rudy said. "We almost did it, too. We had three breakaways and we had a scramble in front of their goal where the ball went right to their keeper."

Rudy has talked all year about his young team gaining experience as the season progressed

Minutewomen face rival UConn

By JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

After a home game against Boston University, the Massachusetts field hockey team is back on the road, as it takes on No. 15 Connecticut at 1 p.m. Saturday in Storrs.

The Huskies (5-3), always a big rival for UMass (3-6), will be looking to end their recent two-game losing streak that included losses to Villanova and Harvard, and should provide stiff competition for the Minutewomen.

UMass hasn't defeated the Huskies since the 2000 season, though the team is confident it can reverse recent history.

"We haven't fared well against them in the past [1-8 in the last nine meetings], but we're a better team this year," assistant coach Stephen Simpson said. "They're coming off a couple of losses, so I'm expecting them to be very competitive. Our players are very gung-ho for the game, and I think we can do really well."

"We just need to focus on our game plan and stick to what we've been doing in practice," sophomore midfielder Kristina DoRosario said.

The players did not seem concerned with the significance of the rivalry with UConn, and planned on treating it like every other game that they play.

"We treat all the games the same and just look to get a win," sophomore goalie Becky Letourneau said.

Saturday's game begins a stretch of eight out of nine on the road for UMass, something most teams would dread seeing on their schedule.

"It is really tiring," DoRosario said. "Especially when you're on the road for two or three straight days, it can get tough."

"It's just how it goes," Letourneau added, explaining that they have to work with the schedule they are given. "We just have to play our game and not let it get to us."

The current road trip runs into the beginning of Atlantic 10 Conference play for the Minutewomen, with games at Richmond and St. Louis, something that is certainly on the minds of the coaches and players as they finish their non-conference schedule.

"I know that I'm very excited for it," DoRosario said. "We've worked hard all season and I think we're ready to be the best that we can be."

"Everything during the season is geared toward the conference schedule, but as we prepare each week, we prepare for the next game," Simpson said. "We take care of what we need to take care of, but our schedule is built around developing for the Atlantic 10 games.

"[The UConn game] is a big test for us, so we're focused on the upcoming game for now."

Red Sox feeling heat after dropping to second

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Tim Wakefield has a simple take on Boston's postseason aspirations — win the AL East or most likely go home.

"I don't think we can get in another way," the Red Sox pitcher said. "In my opinion, we need to win the division to get in. There are too many other teams that are playing well."

Boston ended a stretch of 30 games in 30 days with a 7-4 loss to Tampa Bay on Wednesday night. The defeat dropped the defending World Series champions out of first place for the first time since July 18, and marked the second time in three days the Red Sox were beaten by the last-place Devil Rays.

The New York Yankees held a one-half game lead in the AL East going into their game Thursday night against Baltimore. Cleveland led the Red Sox by one game in the Wild Card race entering its game at Kansas City.

Thursday's off-day, Boston's final one during the regular season, might have come at a good time.

Center fielder Johnny Damon didn't play Wednesday after getting a cortisone shot one day earlier in his ailing left shoulder. Pitcher David Wells also received a cortisone shot for his sore right knee. Second baseman Tony Graffanino missed the past two games after straining his groin Monday.

"We're pretty beat up and banged up," Red Sox reliever Mike Timlin said. "We've been going quite a bit. I'm sure the guys are going to relish a day off. Hopefully heal up and cool down mentally."

After going 17-13 during their month-long stretch, the Red Sox open a three-game series at Baltimore on Friday night before returning to Fenway Park for a seven-game homestand. After four with Toronto, the Red Sox and Yankees wrap up the regular season with a three-game series Sept. 30-Oct. 2 that could decide the division title.

"It's not like we're that far behind," Wakefield said. "We have to play good in Baltimore, and go back home and play great at home."

The Red Sox have lost six of 11. Boston opened a season-high 5 1/2-game lead on Aug. 10 and led by four after Curt Schilling beat New York on Sept. 10.

Culpepper struggling early without Moss

By DAVE CAMPBELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

EDEN PRAIRIE, Minn. — Daunte Culpepper made major strides the past two years, developing better poise on the field and a stronger awareness of the game that unquestionably helped him become one of the league's best quarterbacks.

Two weeks into this season, it looks as if Culpepper forgot everything he learned.

Dissecting Minnesota's offensive problems following two embarrassing performances in defeats to Tampa Bay and Cincinnati, Culpepper acknowledged this week he's been tentative at times and has thrown balls he shouldn't have in attempts to spark his stagnant offense.

"That shows I'm not perfect. I've just got to keep battling through it," said Culpepper, who has eight interceptions and only one touchdown, and that came rushing. He threw just 11 INTs against 39 TDs in 2004 while setting several franchise marks, a few NFL records and earning his third trip to the Pro Bowl.

The Vikings play New Orleans on Sunday, and badly need a victory.

"Daunte can take us all the way," coach Mike Tice said, "but there are also a lot of parts to the car that have to be working in sync — and we've got to get that part corrected."

There's a long list of reasons suggesting why the 28-year-old Culpepper has significantly underperformed. Offensive coordinator and quarterbacks coach Scott Linehan left for Miami. Standout center Matt Birk had hip surgery and is out for the year. The running game has not been reliable. And then there's that receiver who wore No. 84 here and now plays in Oakland.

Can't worry about any of that, though. Plus, it's only been two games. Plenty of time left for Minnesota to figure out how to function without any of the aforementioned absentees.

"Everyone, Daunte included, needs to just do their job," new offensive coordinator Steve Loney said. "I don't think any one person needs to feel like they have to carry an offense on its shoulders."

Though it hasn't forced him to miss any practice time, allowing the team to leave him off the league's weekly injury report, Culpepper has been bothered by some soreness and swelling in his right knee. He said Wednesday that it's close to 100 percent and feels better than it has since the regular season began.

That might mean Culpepper could run more against the Saints and take

AFC title game rematch in Pittsburgh

By ALAN ROBINSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PITTSBURGH, Pa. — Now, the rematch of the rematch.

The Patriots and Steelers played two of the NFL's best games last season, with Pittsburgh ending New England's best-ever 21-game winning streak on Oct. 31 and the Patriots winning the one that really counted for the AFC championship in January.

Those games mean nothing now - as coach Bill Cowher said, how can the Steelers avenge any loss that ends a season? — but Sunday's game could signal whether the Patriots (1-1) are the team they were in winning three of the last four Super Bowls. Or, conversely, if Steelers (2-0) are the team to beat in the AFC after winning their first two games by 20-point margins, the first time in team history they've done that.

The Patriots are coming off a 27-17 loss at Carolina and must win to avoid their first two-game losing streak since December 2002. A season ago, they lost only twice in 19 games, counting the playoffs.

"I don't care what happened last week, last year, last month, what the overall record between the two teams was going back to 1947 or whenever they started playing each other, or who wins when the wind is blowing in from the north," Patriots coach Bill Belichick said. "I pay attention to what the matchups are for each individual game."

What's obvious is that Patriots vs. Steelers has become one of football's best matchups, and a regular one at that with five games in five years. And while this Week 3 game won't decide either team's season, it can begin to define it.

"If you want to consider yourself one of the best teams, you've got to knock off the best team — and, right now, they have that title," Steelers safety Chris Hope said.

Just as in their Halloween game a year ago, there's a long winning streak going. The Steelers ended the Patriots' record 18-game regular-season winning streak by winning 34-20, and now it's the Steelers who are closing in with 16 in a row.

The difference is the Steelers aren't the Super Bowl champions, as the Patriots were during their record run. As Steelers guard Alan Faneca said, "They got the rings and we went home."

Still, there are signs aplenty this could be a far more difficult run for the Patriots than in years past.

The running game that complemented quarterback Tom Brady's playmaking and quick thinking has done nothing, with Corey Dillon — a 1,635-yard rusher last season — held to 99 yards and a 2.7 average. The Patriots had an uncharacteristic three turnovers and 12 penalties last week, and even Brady didn't look very Brady-like with a fumble and interception.

"But I don't think we say, 'We've really got to play well this week because we lost last week,'" Brady said. "No, you've got to play well every week. If you don't play well against this team, you will get beaten."

While the Steelers' Ben Roethlisberger looked like the rookie

Red Cross speaks about new vaccines

By JAMIE MASON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

1.2 million deaths of children in Africa have been prevented due to the mass vaccinations performed by the Red Cross Measles Initiative program, said, Dr. Mark Grabowsky, the Senior Technical Advisor who lectured at UMass Saturday.

There has been a 91 percent decrease of measles cases in the first 17 African countries in which the program has been implemented, said Grabowsky.

"I want to make missionaries, but a different kind of missionary. I want students to be intrigued by Africa and diseases there so they will go there and collect truth and bring it back to the states," said Grabowsky.
